

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

Agreement—Construction—Nomination of Referee—Condition Precedent.

Where by the terms of an agreement, dated the 25th of May, the defendant agreed to purchase certain growing crops of the plaintiff, the price to be paid on the 5th of June, the valuation to be made by the 3rd of June by two persons, one named by each party by the 31st of May; and in case either party neglected or refused to nominate a referee within the time appointed, the referee of the other party alone to make a final decision:—Held, that the word "nominate" meant not only the choice of a referee, but the communication of the appointment to the other party; and that an appointment by the plaintiff of a referee on the 31st of May, and communication of that appointment to the defendant by letter, which reached him on the 1st of June, did not entitle the plaintiff to proceed ex parte within the meaning of the agreement.

Assumpsit on the following memorandum of agreement, dated the 25th of May 1847, between W. Tew and J. W. Harris:—"The said W. T. agrees to sell and the said J. W. H. agrees to purchase, at a valuation to be made as hereinafter mentioned, the crops in and upon a piece of garden ground, situate, &c., the price to be paid on the 5th of June next; the valuation to be made by two persons, one named by each party, and if they disagree, then by a third person to be named by them before entering upon the reference or valuation. It is agreed that such valuation shall be made by the 3rd day of June next, and that each party shall by the 31st day of May inst. appoint a referee; and in case either party neglects or refuses to nominate a referee within the time appointed, the referee of the other party alone may make a final decision. In case either party, or the referee of either party, shall neglect or omit to attend any reference, after notice in writing given to or left at the last place of abode of such party or referee, then the party or referee attending shall enter on the reference ex parte, and make a final decision."

The first count of the declaration, after setting out the agreement and mutual promises, averred that the plaintiff within the time in that behalf appointed, viz. on the 31st of May, nominated and appointed J. Cowdery to be his referee, and then and within a reasonable time gave due notice to the defendant of such appointment and nomination; and then averred that no appointment or nomination by the defendant of any person as referee on behalf of the defendant, according to the said agreement, whereof the plaintiff had any notice, was within the time so in that behalf appointed made; and thereupon he, the plaintiff, on

Bill of Exchange—Acceptor—Overdue Bill—Notice to Indorsee.

To a declaration on a bill of exchange, drawn by A. on, and accepted by the defendant, payable to A.'s order, and by A. indorsed to B, and by B. to the plaintiff, the defendant pleaded that he accepted the bill for the accommodation of A. and B, and without consideration, &c., and on the terms that it should not be negotiated after it was due, and that it was indorsed to the plaintiff after it was due, without the defendant's privity:—Held, that the plea was ill.

The declaration stated, that one John Sewell, on the 13th of September 1845, made his bill of exchange, in writing, and directed the same to the defendant, and thereby required the defendant to pay to the order of the said J. Sewell, 30*l.* value received, two months after date, &c.; and defendant then accepted the said bill, and the said J. Sewell then indorsed the same to one George Barclay, who then indorsed the same to the plaintiff, of all which the defendant then had notice, and then promised the plaintiff to pay him the amount, &c.

Plea—That the defendant accepted the said bill at the request and for the accommodation of the said J. Sewell and G. Barclay, and without any value or consideration, and there never was any value or consideration for the said indorsement to the said G. Barclay. Second, that the defendant accepted the said bill at the request and for the accommodation of the said J. Sewell and the said G. Barclay, and without any value or consideration whatever, and there never was any value or consideration for the said acceptance by the defendant, and the defendant so accepted the same upon the terms and conditions that the same might be indorsed and negotiated for the accommodation and use of the said J. Sewell and the said G. Barclay, only before the same became due and payable, and not afterwards; and defendant further says, that the said bill was indorsed to the plaintiff without the consent, privity, or default of the defendant, after the same became due and payable, and not before that time; and that plaintiff did not become the holder of the said bill, or entitled to the same, or to any interest or property therein, until after it so became due and payable as aforesaid. Verification.

At the Summer Assizes, 1846, the jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff on the first issue, and for the defendant on the second, a rule nisi having been subsequently obtained for judgment for the plaintiff on the said issue, non obstante veredicto,—

Willes shewed cause.—Though the plaintiff may have received the bill for a person to whom it had been passed by G. Barclay after it was due, yet the plea cannot be considered bad in point of law. A party who takes a bill after it is due gets no better title than the person who pays it to him: it is true that the mere fact of the bill being an accommodation bill will not alter the right of the plaintiff if he is to be taken as a holder for value—Sturtevant v. Fords (1); but here there is an agreement, to which Barclay is a party, to restrain the negotiability of the bill. And the declaration shews that the plaintiff derived his title from Barclay, who could not have sued on the bill. Want of notice of the agreement, on the part of the plaintiff, should have been replied.

Ring, contra.—It is admitted that the plaintiff must be taken as being a holder for value; and the question is, whether the condition introduced into the second plea will deprive him of his remedy? The mere circumstance of the bill being indorsed after it was due, would not be an answer to the action, the plaintiff having given value for the bill—Callow v. Lawrence (2), Hubbard v. Jackson (3), Chalmers v. Lanion (4). The plea, though it states that there was an agreement that the bill should not be negotiated after it was due, does not shew any circumstance that fixes the plaintiff with notice of this—Burrough v. Moss (5), White v. Walker (6). An indorsee for value has no means of knowing any collateral circumstance to prevent the negotiability of the bill.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—The plea seems to me to be consistent with this state of facts, namely, that the plaintiff might have had the bill indorsed to him by a party who had a good title at the time he took it.]

Charles v. Marsden (7) and Stein v. Iglesias (8) shew that knowledge by the plaintiff of the circumstances which prevent the negotiability of the bill should be alleged. (He was then stopped.)

Per Curiam.—We think the plea bad.

Nov. 18. } BOWEN v. OWEN.

Tender—Condition—Evidence.

Plaintiff being tenant to defendant at the yearly rent of 52l. sent a person to him with the following letter:—"I have sent by the bearer 26l. 5s. 7½d. to settle one year's rent. The defendant refused to take it, saying that more was due. No question was left to the jury:—Held, that the tender was sufficient.

Replevin. Avowry for 82l. 2s. 6d. parcel of 104l. for the rent due in respect of a farm, &c., called Nanty-foair, for the space of two years, ending the 29th of September 1845.

Plea, in bar, as to 55l. 10s. 4½d. parcel, &c., that no part of the said sum of 55l. 10s. 4½d. was in arrear, and as to the sum of 26l. 12s. 1½d. residue of the said rent alleged to be due, a tender.

At the trial, before Rolfe, B., at the Summer Assizes for Caermarthenshire, 1846, the plaintiff, in order to prove the tender, called Thomas Thomas, who proved that he called on the defendant on the 8th of January 1846, with a letter which he received from the plaintiff, and delivered to the defendant, and which was as follows:—

"Dear Sir,—I have sent by the bearer, Thomas Thomas, 26l. 5s. 7½d. to settle one year's rent of Nanty-foair.

"Yours, &c., John Bowen."

(7) 1 Taunt. 224.

(8) 1 Cr. M. & R. 565; a. c. 4 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 5.

The witness further stated, that he told the defendant that he had the 26l. 5s. 7½d. in his pocket ready to pay him, but the defendant refused to take it, saying, that more was due. The defendant objected that, according to the terms of the letter, a condition was imposed, namely, that the sum should be taken as paid in full for a year's rent, and would estop him from disputing that the remainder had been paid, and that what took place did not amount to a legal tender. The jury found that nothing was due beyond the sum tendered, and the learned Judge was of opinion that the plea of tender was not proved, and directed a verdict for the defendant on that plea, giving leave to the plaintiff to enter a verdict on that plea, if the Court should be of opinion that, as matter of law, the facts as proved supported the plea.

Chilton now shewed cause.—A tender should be of a precise sum, without any qualification or condition. Here, if the defendant had accepted the money, clogged with the condition that it was to be taken as all that was due for a year's rent, he would have been excluded from shewing that the remainder of the year's rent, which was admitted to be 52l., had not been paid—Eckstein v. Reynolds (1). This is not like Read v. Goldring (2), where the tender was made unconditionally, and the only question was as to the extent of the agent's authority. The plaintiff might have insisted on the question being left to the jury—Marsden v. Goode (3). The Court must look at the written instrument, which imposes a condition—Evans v. Judkins (4), Lord Hastings v. Thorley (5), Sutton v. Hawkins (6), Cheminant v. Thornton (7), Peacock v. Dickerson (8).

Watson (Lush was with him), contra.—It was not said, either in the letter or by the witness, that the defendant was not to be paid the sum tendered, unless he would receive it in full satisfaction. The money is offered, but the defendant refuses to take it, because he contends that there is more due—that occurs in almost every case of tender.

[COLERIDGE, J.—It must be taken that the tender is made in the terms contained in the letter, which was for the Judge to construe.]

The Judge was wrong in holding that the letter imposed a condition.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Suppose when the letter was delivered, the money mentioned in it had been offered, and the defendant had said, I will take the money, but I will not take it for more than half a year's rent, and had, in fact, kept the money.]

It was perfectly open to do so; he may take the money, and repudiate the condition. If the person who goes with the money were upon this to refuse to hand it over, then, of course, it would be no tender. This case is like Bull v. Parker (9), where Wightman, J. decided, on the authority of Henwood v. Oliver (10), that the legal effect of a tender was not defeated by its being expressly made, "in full discharge of the account" sent by the plaintiff.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—In Bull v. Parker I certainly had an impression at first that the tender was not complete.]

That case cannot be distinguished from the present. (He was then stopped.)

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—We all agree. We think that a person who goes to make a tender goes for the purpose of extinguishing a debt; and, where the money is offered, the party to whom it is offered may put it into his pocket, and that he ought to do so. The fact of his taking the money is no admission of itself that no more is due to him. If the party who goes to make the tender says, "I won't pay you unless you give me a receipt in full," that would be no tender at all; but in this case nothing of that sort occurred. I think that the view taken by the learned Judge at the trial was not in conformity with the two cases lately decided, which have been referred to,

(9) 2 Dowl. N.S. 345; s.c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 93.

(10) 1 Q.B. Rep. 409; s.c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 158.

and the distinction suggested would only give rise to a lawsuit in every case.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question is, whether the terms of the letter were such as to impose a condition on the party accepting the money accompanied by the letter. I think that no condition was imposed, and that the tender therefore, was good. I own, at the same time, that the case partakes of something of hardship, as the letter states that the amount offered is the full amount of a year's rent. My difficulty is, that this might go in any other proceedings to establish as against him an admission that the smaller sum was the amount of a year's rent.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I consider this as not being a conditional tender; and I can only give the same reason for my opinion as induced me to decide the case of Bull v. Parker in the Bail Court. I decided that case on the authority of Henwood v. Oliver, which, I think, was correctly decided, and was not in principle distinguishable from the case then before me or from the present. It is important to refer to the judgment of my Brother Patteson in that case; he says "The defendant who makes a tender always means that the amount tendered, though less than the plaintiff's bill, is all that he is entitled to demand in respect of it. How then would the plaintiff preclude himself from recovering more by accepting an offer of part accompanied by expressions which are implied in every tender? Expressio eorum quæ tacite insunt nihil operatur. If the defendant, when he paid the money, had called it part of the amount of the plaintiff's bill, he would thereby have admitted that more was due; and the effect of the tender would have been defeated."

ERLE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The party who tenders money has a right to exclude any presumption against himself that what he pays is not all that is due from him. If, indeed, he imposes a condition that the sum to be received is to be taken as all that is due, and that a general acquittance is to be given, then the tender is clogged with a condition which cannot legally be imposed.

Nov. 3, 16. } ABSOLON v. MARKS.

Promissory Note—3 & 4 Anne, c. 9.—
Uncertainty.

A note made by several persons payable to "our and each of our order," and indorsed by one of these persons, is a good promissory note within 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9.

Assumpsit by indorsee against maker of a promissory note. The plea set out the note, which was as follows:—"Six months after date we jointly and severally promise to pay to our and each of our order the sum of 750*l.* for value received," [signed by the defendant and four other persons.] It then averred that the said note was made as well by defendant as the said persons in the said note named, who were real persons, and that the indorsement in the declaration mentioned was an indorsement in blank, and not a special indorsement or an indorsement in full, and was an indorsement by defendant alone.

The replication traversed that the indorsement was by defendant alone.

A verdict having been found for the plaintiff, on this issue, at the Summer Assizes for Kent, 1846,—

Peacock obtained a rule to arrest the judgment, on the ground that this was not a good promissory note within the statute 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9, against which—

Crowder and Wordsworth appeared to shew cause, and referred to Wood v. Mytton (1), as governing the present case; when the Court called upon

Peacock, in support of the rule.—There is a point in this case which did not arise in Wood v. Mytton. This note is uncertain, as it is made payable to the order of certain persons and each of them, so that any one of them might give a title by indorsement. Uncertainty in the payee vitiates a note. Blanchenhagen v. Blundell (2) is directly in point. There a note payable on the face of it to A. or B, or his or their order, was held not a good note within the statute, because it was not payable in certain either to A. or B; but the claim of either, or the indorser of either, might be defeated by payment to the other, and that if it was not within the statute when issued, subsequent events could not make it so.

Crowder and Wordsworth, contra.—The principle of Wood v. Mytton clearly applies; and this became a good note when it was indorsed by the defendant: the previous ambiguity was then rendered certain. The construction must be, that the note is made payable to the order of us or each of us. In Blanchenhagen v. Blundell the note could only be made certain by the act of a stranger to the note in its inception, whereas here it may be done by one of the makers of the note.

LORD DENMAN, C.J., on a subsequent day, delivered judgment.—This was an action on a promissory note, made by several persons (one of whom was the defendant), and purporting to be payable to the order of three several persons and each of them. One of these persons indorsed to the plaintiff. An objection was raised that this was not a good promissory note, on account of the uncertainty in the payee, which, it was said, was not cured by subsequent indorsement; and the case of Blanchenhagen v. Blundell was referred to. We paused for the purpose of considering that case, and we are of opinion that there is no uncertainty in this note, as the indorsement by one of the payees (which is found as a fact by the jury) has rendered it certain. There is, therefore, no ground for arresting the judgment.

Pleading—Bill of Exchange—Days of Grace—F frivolous Demurrer.

A declaration by indorsee against acceptor of a bill of exchange, payable three months after date, "which period has elapsed;" alleged a promise by the defendant to pay according to the tenour and effect of the bill. Breach, that the defendant has disregarded his said promise, and has not paid the said sum, &c. A demurrer, that the declaration did not sufficiently shew that

(4) 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 446.

(2) 2 B. & Ald. 417.

the three days of grace had elapsed before action, was set aside as frivolous.

Action by indorsee against acceptor of a bill of exchange.

The declaration stated that one P. made his bill of exchange in writing, and directed the same to the defendant, and thereby required the defendant to pay to his order 71*l.*, three months after the date thereof, which period has now elapsed; and the defendant then accepted the said bill, and the said P. then indorsed the same to the plaintiff, of which the defendant had notice, and then promised the plaintiff to pay him the amount of the said bill, according to the tenour and effect thereof, and of his said acceptance. Yet the defendant hath disregarded his said promise, and hath not paid the said sum of money or any part thereof, &c.

Demurrer assigning for causes, that the declaration ought to allege that the defendant had not paid the bill when due, and also that the three days of grace had elapsed before the commencement of the action. An order setting aside this demurrer as frivolous had been made by Patteson, J., at chambers, who was of opinion that the days of grace were included in the three months alleged to have elapsed.

Phipson now moved for a rule to shew cause why the order of the learned Judge should not be rescinded.—The breach varies from the form given in Reg. Gen. Trin. term, 1 Will. 4, which is, that the defendant did not pay the bill when due; that imports that the bill was not paid after the lapse of the days of grace, which by the custom of merchants are superadded to the time limited for the currency of the bill as part of the contract.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The breach is, that the defendant disregarded his said promise, which is to pay according to the tenour and effect of the bill.]

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Surely the breach is, that the defendant did not pay at the time when according to the custom of merchants he was bound to pay.]

It is submitted, that on special demurrer this breach is not equivalent to that. The previous allegation "which period has now elapsed" does not exclude the supposition that the action was brought before the days of grace had expired. In a case of Flight v. Turner, before Alderson, B., at chambers, a demurrer to a similar declaration was upheld. He referred to Brown v. Harraden (1).

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—In this case there was a motion to rescind an order of my Brother Patteson, by which he set aside a demurrer as frivolous. We paused for the purpose of consulting him, and in consequence of a case, which was referred to as having been decided by Mr. Baron Alderson at chambers, and said to be on a similar point. My Brother Patteson does not waive in the opinion which he before held; and we cannot help thinking that the question decided by Mr. Baron Alderson was not the same as the present. However that may be, we concur in thinking this demurrer frivolous. We wish to add, that we are always very unwilling to interfere with the decision of a Judge in a case of this kind, when he has had all the circumstances brought before him, and has considered that the justice of the case required the demurrer to be set aside.

1847. } THE QUEEN v. THE INHABITANTS OF LEEDS.
Nov. 13. }

Appeal—Prior Order of Removal—Quashing for Deficiency of Examination—Estoppel—Decision on the Merits—Evidence.

*An order of removal from P. to L. was founded on examinations, which stated that the pauper rented a tenement of above 10*l.* for a year, and paid rent during his tenancy. On appeal, the Sessions confirmed this order, subject to a case on the point, whether the examinations were defective for not shewing that "the" rent was paid by the pauper. The case directed that if this Court should consider the objection to the examinations fatal, the order was to be quashed "for deficiency of the examination" whereon it was founded. The Court of Queen's Bench, after argument, quashed the order of Sessions and order of removal.*

(1) 4 Term Rep. 148.

On appeal against a subsequent order removing the same pauper from P. to L. upon the same settlement, the appellants objected that the respondents were estopped by the decision in the former case, (which was set out in the examinations,) and rested their objection upon production and proof of a copy of the record in the Crown Office, shewing that the former order had been quashed. The respondents did not offer any evidence to shew that the judgment did not proceed on the point of settlement. The Sessions held that the respondents were not estopped.

The appellants then tendered evidence to shew that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench proceeded on the ground that the former examinations were insufficient in the point of shewing a settlement, which the Sessions held to be inadmissible (subject to the opinion of this Court); but it being admitted, that if this evidence could be received, the decision did proceed on that ground, they further asked, whether such a decision was conclusive:—Held, first, that the quashing of the prior order "for deficiency of the examinations" was equivalent to a general quashing, and that the respondents were not estopped by the former judgment, either party being at liberty to shew the grounds on which it proceeded.

Secondly, that evidence of the grounds of the decision of this Court was admissible.

Thirdly, that the decision in the former case was on a point of settlement, and conclusive.

1847. } HARVEY, PUBLIC OFFICER, ETC.
Nov. 11. } v. SCOTT, PUBLIC OFFICER, ETC.

Joint Stock Banking Company—Execution against retired Members—Scire facias—7 Geo. 4. c. 46.—Return—Fraud—Limiting Execution.

In order to issue a sci. fa. against retired shareholders in a joint-stock banking company under 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. s. 13, it is sufficient if reasonable and bona fide at tempts have been made to obtain satisfaction from the existing shareholders; and it is not essential that executions should have been issued against every existing shareholder, if it appear probable that such executions would have been ineffectual.

Judgment was signed against the public officer of a banking company in an action brought on contracts entered into at various dates between August 1845 and January 1846. The name of B. appeared as a shareholder in a return made the 24th of March 1845 and in all subsequent returns up to September 1845, when it was omitted. It was stated that this last return was informal, and that it was believed B. was still a shareholder. No return of B.'s retirement was ever made:—Held, to be prima facie evidence that B. was a shareholder when the contracts were entered into.

The fact that B. was not then a shareholder may be pleaded to the sci. fa.

It is no answer to the application that there has been a fraudulent transfer of shares from a person who might have been proceeded against, but to which the plaintiff is not shewn to have been a party.

The plaintiff is not compelled to proceed against an insolvent shareholder, who is entitled in equity to reimbursement from other solvent persons.

If a sci. fa. issues against a person who was a shareholder when part only of the contracts recovered upon were entered into, the Court will limit the execution against him to the amount for which he is liable.

Judgment having been signed in an action of debt against the public officer by default for the nominal debt in the declaration, the Court will grant leave to issue a sci. fa. on that judgment against former shareholders upon an undertaking not to levy for more than is really due.

Rules had been obtained in Trinity term last, calling upon W. Pawson, John Brookes, John Ridley and John Cargill, and several others, to shew cause why writs of scire facias on the judgment obtained by the plaintiff in this cause should not be issued against them respectively, to enable the plaintiff to have execution upon the said judgment.

It appeared from the affidavits on which the rule was founded that the action, which was in debt, had been brought, on the 3rd of February 1847, against the defendant, as public officer of the Newcastle-upon-Tyne Joint Stock Banking Company, to recover 33,550*l.*, due from that bank to the London and Westminster Bank, and that judgment was signed by default in that action for the nominal debt of 136,701*l.* and costs, on the 3rd of March following. The Newcastle Bank stopped payment on the 23rd of January 1846, and was utterly and entirely insolvent and had no assets or property whatever; on the 5th of May, writs of sci. fa. were issued against ten persons, whose names were given, all of whom were then shareholders in the said bank, and judgment was signed against them, for default of appearance, and writs of fi. fa., issued upon these judgments, had been returned nulla bona; that from inquiries made as to the property and situation in life of these ten persons, it was apparent that nothing would be obtained from the executions against them. The affidavits then set out particulars as to each of these ten persons, all of whom were stated to be "worth nothing," and that at the date of the issuing of the said writs of sci. fa. the only other shareholders in the Newcastle Bank were the persons mentioned in a list annexed, who, together with the said ten persons, were the persons named in the return made by the bank on the 19th of March 1847, who were all described in this list as being either dead or worth nothing, and that nothing would be obtained if executions were issued and put in force against all or any of them; that before the judgment in this action was obtained, all the shareholders who possessed any property whatever ceased to be shareholders, and returns to that effect were filed under the statute; that there were no assets or property of any nature or kind whatsoever belonging to the said bank, and that the only means of recovering the said debt were by forcing payment from those persons who were shareholders when the contracts upon which the said judgment was signed were entered into, but who had since retired from being shareholders. The action was brought on thirty-five bills of exchange indorsed by the Newcastle Bank to the London and Westminster Bank, at various dates from the 4th of August 1845 to the 8th of January 1846, except that in the thirty-fifth count, which was indorsed on the 4th of May 1846. The affidavits stated that at the time when the contracts on which judgment was obtained were entered into (except the contract mentioned in the thirty-fifth count), Eliza Ann Pawson (by the name of Eliza Ann Beverley), John Brooke, John Ridley and John Cargill were respectively shareholders in the Newcastle Bank, the name of the said E. A. Beverley having been inserted in the return made the 2nd of March 1844, and in all returns from that date until the return of the 26th of March 1846, wherein it was stated the said E. A. Beverley had ceased to be a shareholder. William Pawson married E. A. Beverley in the latter part of the year 1844. The name of John Brooke appeared in the return of the said bank made on the 24th of March 1845, and also in all subsequent returns, until the general return made on the 4th of September 1846 (a copy whereof was annexed, which did not contain the name of J. Brooke). That deponent was advised and believed that the last-named return was informal and improper, and that the said J. Brooke continued to be a shareholder until the next general return, made in March 1846, and that deponent had been informed by the officer at Somerset House, who has the custody of the return of joint-stock banks, that no return had been filed under schedule B. of 7 Geo. 4. c. 46, of the said J. Brooke having ceased to be a shareholder in the said bank. The name of John Ridley was inserted in the return of the 2nd of March 1844, and appeared in the subsequent returns until the 8th of April 1846, in which he was stated to have ceased to be a shareholder; and the name of John Cargill was inserted in the return made on the 24th of March 1845, and appeared in all subsequent returns, until that of the 8th of April 1846, in which it was stated that he had ceased to be a shareholder. The affidavits stated that the whole of the debt of 33,550*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.*, and interest, remained due, except 900*l.* received since the recovery of the said judgment, and that this application was not made in collusion with the directors or shareholders of the Newcastle Bank; that three years had not elapsed since the shareholders who have so retired as aforesaid, or any of them, ceased to be members of the said firm.

Watson and Sir J. Bayley now shewed cause, on behalf of Pawson, who made no affidavit in answer to the rule.—It ought to appear that all steps have been taken to make the judgment available against all those who were shareholders at the time when it was obtained; as that is a condition precedent to taking steps against former members. By 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. s. 13, this power is only given in case “any execution against any member for the time being shall be ineffectual;” that implies, that all means must be first exhausted to put the judgment in force against all the existing shareholders—Eardley v. Law (1). This point has been before the Court of Common Pleas who differed in opinion—Field v. McKensie (2). It is quite consistent with these affidavits that no bond fide attempts have been made to levy under the writs of fi. fa. issued against the ten persons named. The sheriff would return nulla bona, if they were merely lodged in his office.

Sir J. Jervis (Attorney General) and Bovill were not called on to support this rule.

Per Curiam (3).—We are satisfied that enough has been done to entitle the plaintiff to the scire facias in this case.

Watson and Cleasby then shewed cause on behalf of Brooke, on affidavits stating that he was not a member of the Newcastle Banking Company, at the time when the causes of action in the declaration mentioned, or either of them, accrued in respect of which this action was brought, or at the time when the contracts, or either of them, were entered into, upon which judgment was obtained; that since the stoppage of the said bank one H. B. the manager, and G. T. G. the solicitor and one of the managing directors of the bank, transferred to the said company the shares of several persons (naming them), particularly of one T. C. Gibson, who were members of the said banking company at the time of its stopping payment, without any authority to do so, and for the purpose of preventing the creditors from enforcing payment against such persons, and that such alleged transfers were without valid consideration, and fraudulent, and null and void; and in the case of the said T. C. Gibson, were made in collusion and concert with the said G. T. G. and H. B.; and that such persons were present members of the said banking company, and ought to have been exhausted by plaintiff, before having recourse to Brooke; that J. S. Pidgeon, who was mentioned in the affidavits in support of the rule as one of the present members of the company, was actuary of the English and Scottish Law Life Assurance and Loan Association, which consists of persons capable of paying, and had, as such actuary, on the 6th of September 1843, certain shares assigned to him as trustee for the said association, by virtue of which he was still a member of the said company, and entitled to be indemnified by the said association against any liability incurred on their behalf, for which purpose he had lately filed a bill in Chancery against the association.—First, the affidavits of the plaintiff do not shew that Brooke ought to be made liable. He is not shewn to have been a shareholder in August 1845, when the contracts were entered into. His name appears in the return of March 1845, but not in that of September 1845, and he may have ceased to be a member at any period between March and September.

[COLERIDGE, J.—They say the September return is improper; and independently of that it stands upon the deponent's advice and belief that Brooke was a member in September.]

His own affidavit denies that he was so. He says, “he was not a member when any of the causes of action accrued, or when any of the contracts were entered into.”

[COLERIDGE, J.—It would have been so simple to say when he ceased to be a member.]

Prima facie, as there is no return subsequent to August shewing him to be a shareholder, that is enough, without his being obliged to give the very date of his retirement. The statement as to information and belief that he continued a member, merely means that there was no proper return made of his retirement. This being an application to the discretion of the Court, the applicant ought not to come with such vague materials.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—We do not think they are vague at all.]

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Brooke may plead to the scire facias that he was not a partner when the contract was entered into.]

Then the transfer of shares from the members named in the affidavits was collusive, and the plaintiff ought to shew that he has endeavoured to obtain satisfaction from them, as they are still substantially shareholders. As to Pidgeon, proceedings ought also to have been taken against him; for though he is stated himself to be worth nothing, he holds shares, as trustee, on behalf of a large company, and they would be liable to him for the amount recovered against him. This point cannot be pleaded as a defence to the sci. fa.

[ERLE, J.—Surely you may shew that you are only a shareholder of the second class; and that all steps have not been taken against those of the first class.]

It is submitted that the Court must be satisfied on that head before granting the sci. fa.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—In a similar case where the fact came out on affidavits in answer, we directed an issue—Bosanquet v. Woodford (4), why should it then not be pleaded?]

It could not be pleaded that the judgment would have been effectual to a certain amount only against Pidgeon; and, besides, though perfectly solvent when the executions were delivered to the sheriff, he may be insolvent now.

[ERLE, J.—The important time is when the application is made. It would be a good answer to this action, if you shewed us that execution issued against Pidgeon would produce satisfaction of the debt.]

In effect that is shewn by these affidavits. But this rule is wrong in form; it is for a sci. fa. to issue execution on the judgment obtained in the action; and it appears that Brooke was not a partner at the time when the contract declared on in the 35th count was entered into. He is not, therefore, liable to the debt arising out of that contract, or to be taken under this judgment, which is entire, and neither damages nor costs can be severed. It is like the case of proceedings against bail, where the verdict must be conformable to the affidavit of debt—Firth v. Harris (5).

The Attorney General, in support of the rule (Bovill, who was with him, was not heard).—As to the last point, the sci. fa., being under a statutory power, may be limited to that part of the judgment to which Brooke is liable. As to the other objections, Brooke was a member in March 1845; and the presumption is that he continued to be so, until he is shewn to have ceased, and the void return of September 1845 does not do away with that presumption. If he really was not a member in August, we may plead that to the sci. fa. Then if there was collusion in the transfer of Gibson's shares, that may be pleaded—Phillipson v. Earl of Egremont (6). Lastly, it is no answer that proceedings have not been exhausted against all persons who were members between the time when the contract was entered into, and when judgment was signed; it is sufficient to take bond fide steps against all who were members at the time of judgment. Pidgeon is shewn to have had no legal assets, which is all that the statute applies to. He might be entitled to recover from the insurance company in equity, but the plaintiff is not bound to wait for the result of a suit in Chancery and so let the three years expire. All that is necessary on such a motion as this is, that the Court should see that there is a real case for further proceedings being allowed.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—We are all of that opinion. The proceeding by scire facias was introduced into the act for the purpose of giving a party the opportunity of contesting his liability in a legal mode. Here the judgment has been proved to be ineffectual to a certain extent—it is not necessary to shew to what precise extent—it is sufficient if the whole debt has not been raised. In that case the judgment creditor may go on against those who were shareholders at the time when the contract was entered into. Then is Mr. Brooke proved to our satisfaction to have ever been a shareholder, and not to have ceased to be so at the time when the contract was made? Mr. Cleasby argues that he does not appear to have ceased; but I think it is good law that if he is shewn to be a member in March 1845, he will be presumed to continue a member until he is proved to have retired (7). Now, in order to prove that he had ceased to be a member in August his affidavit is relied on, but I do not know what he means by saying he was not a member when the contract was made, or when the causes of action accrued: he may mean, that under some view which he takes of the law, he had then ceased to be a member; he might have stated distinctly on what day he ceased to be a member, for that must be within his knowledge: we cannot act upon some view of the law he may take. Then, as to Gibson, he really has nothing to do with the matter. Any fraud practised in the way suggested would not relieve the other party from his liability. If the circumstances are such as to relieve Brooke from his liability, he may plead them to the scire facias (8), or any matter which would shew that the statute does not apply to him; or perhaps he may come to the Court to set the proceedings aside. Otherwise, we must decide that there is fraud, without hearing the party against whom the fraud is alleged. The last point is, that the affidavit itself does not make out a case against Brooke, because it shews that for some part of this judgment he cannot be liable. But I have no doubt that we can restrain, in some way or other, the judgment, so as to prevent it being put in force against him as to this part. Probably, the mode suggested by the Attorney General will best effect this purpose. We should, of course, watch the proceedings, and take care that he is not a sufferer for anything for which he is not properly liable; but we should be defeating justice if we did not say that a party, having been once liable, continues to be so until he shews that his liability has ceased.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The clause of the statute appears to apply to two bodies of persons—those who were shareholders at the time when the judgment was recovered, and those who were shareholders at the time when the contract was entered into. Now, it is a condition precedent to proceeding against the second class, that the judgment must have been attempted to be put in force against those of the first class. Assuming Gibson to have been within the first class—which is not shewn by the affidavits—and assuming the proceedings to be fraudulent, the parties engaged in getting him out of that class are not connected at all with the present plaintiff, and their proceedings, therefore, cannot affect this question. The statute, without specifying any mode, enables the Court to authorize execution against the second class of persons; and it has been decided that the proper mode is by scire facias (9), and we are to decide under what circumstances we will allow the proceeding. We must see that we do not injure either party by granting this power on insufficient materials; but, if a prima facie case is made out, the scire facias ought to go, in order that the matter may be properly sifted.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I quite agree. If we were to say that this was not a prima facie case for a scire facias to issue, I think it would be a doctrine extremely dangerous for depositors with joint-stock banks. The first point made is that Brooke was not a shareholder at all at the time of the contract. On that question, it appears to me that his affidavit is by no means satisfactory; and, besides, he may plead to the scire facias that, in truth, he was not a shareholder at that time, and therefore he will not be substantially injured by this decision. But it is said there is a shareholder who made a collusive transfer of his shares, and that he ought to have been proceeded against. How can the plaintiff know that? It is not suggested that he was a party to the fraud: it is enough that he has tried to make the judgment available against those who were shareholders at the time when he obtained judgment; but it is said he has not issued execution against every person, to see whether he has assets or not. I think quite enough has been done to shew that he has attempted bond fide to recover the debt against the existing shareholders. Next it is argued that Pidgeon might have been compelled to pay the debt, because he has some equitable claim against an insurance company. It seems to me the statute did not contemplate such a proceeding as that; but we are to exercise our discretion in the matter, and say whether we think there is reasonable ground for insisting on payment from a person in that position, and we clearly think there is not. As to the last point, that the execution cannot issue, because Brooke was not a shareholder at the time when the whole subject-matter of the judgment was contracted, it must be recollected that this scire facias is under the statute, and provided as a remedy against persons who are not at common law liable under the judgment. It seems to me there will be no difficulty in limiting the execution so as to make it proper in such a case as this.

ERLE, J. concurred.

Rule absolute.

On a subsequent day,—

Manisty shewed cause on behalf of Ridley and Cargill, on affidavits stating the same facts as in the case of Brooke, but he did not argue any of the points before decided. —There is one point which has not been brought before the Court: the judgment is signed against the public officer for the whole debt laid in the declaration, though only 33,550*l.* is due; the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to have a judgment against the shareholders for more than is really due, but he should enter a nolle prosequi or a remittitur as to the residue. This is not like the case of an ordinary defendant who might have come in at the trial and shewn how much was due. Here parties, strangers to the action, are to be brought in by the equitable jurisdiction of the Court. The judgment for the whole sum binds the property of the shareholders, though no execution can issue except by leave of the Court. This was decided recently in the Common Pleas. Besides, the sci. fa. being in the nature of an execution must follow the judgment. The party will be injured by having a judgment registered against him for a greater sum than is due.

The Attorney General, contra.—No difficulty can occur, as the execution will be limited to the amount due, on the principle laid down in the former rule. The judgment being suffered to go by default, it was taken according to the usual practice for the debt in the declaration.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I do not see why we could not issue a writ of inquiry to ascertain the amount actually due.

WIGHTMAN, J.—In every case of debt, judgment is taken for the whole sum claimed, and it is set right afterwards. I see no difficulty in granting leave to issue this scire facias upon an undertaking not to issue execution for more than is due.

Manisty assented to this.

Rule absolute; plaintiff undertaking not to levy for more than is due.

On the 13th of August 1846, a summons was taken out on behalf of the plaintiff in error, to shew cause why a commission should not issue to examine on interrogatories certain witnesses residing at Enghien les Bains, Seine et Oise, in the kingdom of France. A copy of this summons was served on the attorney for the defendant in error, who attended, and opposed the summons on the ground that there had been a former commission, which was still unexecuted, and claimed the costs of the former commission, to which the attorney for the plaintiff in error objected, on the ground that the defendant in error had not joined in the former commission (1). The following order was then made by Pollock, C.B.:—

“Greville v. Stulz and } Upon hearing on both sides, I do order that a commission do issue herein to examine Adelaide Vandenhende and Celina Hugnegny, as witnesses herein, on behalf of the plaintiff in error, who now reside at Enghien les Bains, Seine et Oise, in the kingdom of France, on interrogatories. That the commission, interrogatories and depositions when taken, be returned to me at my chambers, in Rolls Garden, Chancery Lane, London, under the hands and seals of the acting commissioners, and that office copies thereof be read in evidence on the trial, saving all just exceptions, without production of the originals, and that all questions of the costs of the former commission be reserved.

“Dated the 14th day of August 1846.”

A copy of this order was served on the attorney for the defendants in error on the same day, and the commission issued accordingly under the seal of this Court, directed to Thomas Gill, Thomas Pickford, and Thomas Lawson (therein respectively described) as Commissioners to examine Adelaide Vandenhende and Celina Hugnegny, witnesses upon certain interrogatories to be exhibited to them as well on the part of R. F. Greville, Esq., the plaintiff in error, as on the part of J. Stulz, &c., defendants in error in a certain cause, &c. The commission commanded the said Commissioners, or any two of them, on or before the 24th of October next, at a certain day and place, or certain days and places, to be appointed by them for that purpose, “to cause the said witnesses to come before you at Paris, in the kingdom of France, and

(1) The order for the former commission was made by Wightman, J., the defendant in error having refused to join in it. clerk or clerks, interpreter or interpreters, translator or translators, according to his or their several religions. Witness, Thomas Lord Denman, at Westminster, the 19th day of August, in the tenth year of our reign, A.D. 1846."

A copy of the interrogatories was forwarded to the attorney for the defendant in error, and a notice served on him of executing the commission at the house of Mr. Thomas Lawson, No. 10, Rue Royale St. Honoré, in the city of Paris, at eleven o'clock, A.M., on the 1st of October 1846, at which time it was accordingly executed. The attorney for the defendants in error attended the opening of the commission, at the chambers of the Lord Chief Baron, and inspected the depositions, and bespoke copies thereof, which were accordingly furnished to him, and he never made any objection to the regularity of the proceedings at any time before the hearing of the cause.

The cause was tried, on the 5th of November 1846, before Patteson, J., when the above order and commission were put in evidence, whereupon the counsel for the defendants in error objected that the commission was invalid, as it was not founded on any order which named the Commissioners, or gave any directions as to the time or place of examination. The learned Judge considered that it was doubtful, but received the commission; which, as well as the interrogatories, was read. The return of the Commissioners was then proposed to be read; it was as follows:—

"Depositions of witnesses, &c., produced, sworn, and examined on &c., at &c., before us, &c., we, the acting Commissioners, under the said commission, before we acted in or were present at the swearing or examining of any witness having taken an oath, &c., and also the interpreter by us employed to interpret the oaths and interrogatories administered and exhibited to the witnesses who did not understand the English language, out of English into the French language, having before acting in the said commission been first duly sworn before us well and truly to interpret, &c., and having done all such other things as we are directed by the said commission to do before entering upon examination of the two witnesses under the said commission.

"The examination of Adelaide Vandenhende, residing at, &c., Enghien les Bains, in the kingdom of France, a witness produced, sworn and examined before us, the said Commissioners, on the part of the plaintiff in error. [Then followed her answers in English to the several interrogatories.] The other examination had a separate heading in precisely the same terms, mutatis mutandis.

(Signed) Thos. Gill, Thos. Lawson, Commissioners."

It was objected, that the depositions could not be read, as it was not stated that the witnesses had been examined apart; that the name of the interpreter employed was not given in any part of the proceedings; and that it did not appear which (if either) of the witnesses were examined through the interpreter, or whether they were examined in French or English. The learned Judge thought himself bound to receive the evidence, as, in the absence of positive proof to the contrary, it was to be assumed that everything was rightly done under the commission, according to the authority of The Queen v. Douglas (2). The depositions were accordingly read, and the plaintiff in error obtained a verdict.

Barstow, in Michaelmas term 1846, obtained a rule, calling upon the plaintiff in error to shew cause why there should not be a new trial on the grounds insisted upon at the trial; against which—

Martin and E. Beavan now shewed cause.—The first objection is taken to the commission, which is said to have issued without proper authority; and that there ought to have been a second summons and a second order naming the Commissioners, and specifying the time and place for taking the examination; but the commission itself is the authority for taking the examination—1 Will. 4. c. 22. s. 4.—and it has issued perfectly regularly in the present case, and according to the course of practice where the opposite party does not join in the commission. Steinkeller v. Newton (3) is not in point: there, the proceedings took place without any notice to the opposite party, and fraud was imputed.

(2) 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 417.

(3) 1 Sc. N.R. 148; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 262.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The commission can only be issued by us under a statutable authority, which does not appear on the face of it, and you must therefore prove the order: if so, this objection arises.]

The commission having issued under the seal of the Court, and tested by the Lord Chief Justice, will be presumed to have issued rightly. A scire facias under the 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. can only issue after a rule of court, but in proceedings on the scire facias it is not necessary to shew that such a rule has been made. A commission may go to India under 13 Geo. 8. c. 63. s. 44. on motion in court, but that need not be stated—The Queen v. Douglas.

[PATTERSON, J.—There, a mandamus issues, and is the act of the Court. My difficulty here arises from the words of the statute, that the details as to the time, place, and manner of examination are to be directed by the Court or a Judge, and are not merely to be inserted in the commission by the officer of the court without authority.]

[COLERIDGE, J.—The plaintiff himself has put in the order here; he cannot then turn round and say it is immaterial.]

Atkins v. Palmer (4) shews that the only question is, whether the Commissioners have substantially discharged the duty imposed upon them. In a case of Entwistle v. Deat (5), tried at the sittings, at Guildhall, after last Trinity term, the same objection as the present was raised to a commission, and the order was called for but not produced; and the Lord Chief Baron, who tried the cause, thought that he must assume that the commission had issued properly. But this order is sufficient without naming the Commissioners. The 1 Will. 4. c. 22. s. 4. applies to two cases: one where the examination is taken within the jurisdiction where the Commissioners must be named in the order; and the other, where the examination takes place out of the jurisdiction where they need not be named. In the latter case, the witnesses need not be named in the order—Cow v. Kinnersley (6).

[COLERIDGE, J.—They need not all be named; but some must, in order to shew it is not a mere fishing commission.]

In Clay v. Stephenson (7) the oath to be taken by the commissioners was dispensed with. Doe d. Thorn v. Phillips (8) may be relied on by the other side; but that only shews that in a motion to the Court the name of the commissioner must be given; it is different in orders obtained at chambers, where frequently the parties do not agree until afterwards on that point. The practice in equity is the same as has been here pursued—Gresley on Evidence, p. 70. But the defendants were here parties to the order being made, and did not make any objection to it; they cannot after lying by now object to the commission.

[COLERIDGE, J.—They admit the order to be good so far as it goes, but say there ought to be another order supplying the deficiency of the first.]

Next, as to the name of the interpreter being given in the return to the commission. That cannot be necessary, as it would have been of no advantage to have done so.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—It never appears that he interpreted at all; he is only stated to have been employed to do so. We cannot presume that an interpreter was needed; both the witnesses may have understood English.]

The same answer applies to the objection, that it is not stated which of the witnesses were examined through an interpreter; it does not appear that any were so examined.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—You may pass over that.]

The last point is, that the witnesses were not examined apart; but it will be presumed that the commissioners did all they were bound to do; they state that they "did all such things as they were directed by the commission to do." The examinations are returned separately, and with distinct headings, and are each signed by the Commissioners—The Queen v. Birmingham (9).

Barstow, in support of the rule.—The Court has no power at common law to issue this commission—Attorney General v. Bo- vett (10). The statutable authority must therefore be strictly pursued, and there must be some order made directing the time, place, and manner of the examination. This very objection was taken in Steinkeller v. Newton, and the Court there decided that the commission had issued without authority.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The statute does not require that the order should name the Commissioners: may not the Court name some person itself?]

[COLERIDGE, J.—The general practice is, if the parties differ as to who the Commissioners shall be, the Judge who makes the order leaves them to agree upon somebody.]

Still, when they have agreed, they must come for an order to ratify their choice. But the order should at all events state in what particular place the examination is to be taken: it merely says that the witnesses reside in France.

[COLERIDGE, J.—I learn from the Master that if such a rule or order issued for a commission, and it were brought to the office, they would not draw up the commission until the parties had agreed upon the Commissioners, and the time, place, and manner of holding the examination, or there had been an order obtained for that purpose.]

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I regret that we cannot get over this objection. The order is the authority for taking the examination at any place out of the jurisdiction. Here, it does not name any place where the commission is to be executed, as it appears to me it ought. Every possible presumption should be made in favour of the proceedings having been rightly conducted, but this defect is one which we cannot presume to be so cured.

PATTERSON, J.—As this commission was issued by order of a Judge, there ought to be something from which we may see that it was executed at the place directed by the order. Now, there is nothing here to enable us to do so. In the case referred to before the Lord Chief Baron at Nisi Prius, the order was not produced, and therefore it was presumed to be sufficient to warrant the commission which was produced; whereas here, the order is produced, and does not specify any place where the commission is to be executed. We can therefore make no presumption in that respect. It is for the Judge who makes the order to say what the particular circumstances are under which the commission is to be executed. In many cases the parties will agree as to these details, and may then apply to the Judge to ratify their agreement; if they do not agree, and the first order does not mention those details, I think they must get a subsequent order for the purpose. Nothing of the sort has been done here.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The order being put in, it becomes necessary to look to it, and see if it warrants the commission: if it do not, the commission falls to the ground. I am clearly of opinion that the order should name the place. No one can read the statute without seeing that its meaning is, that all the circumstances under which the commission is to issue are to be settled on a preliminary application to a Judge or the Court. In commissions issued within the jurisdiction, it is expressly provided that the first order must state who the Commissioners are; but it is not so in the case of a foreign commission. The order in that case issues, so to speak, in blank, but that must be afterwards supplied. I am not sure that a commission does not ex vi termini mean that somebody must be named to execute it. Here, it is contended that the party may take an order to the officer of the court, and put in the name of any person he chooses to execute the commission. I cannot think such is the meaning of the statute; therefore I think this order was insufficient.

WIGHTMAN, J.—If this case had rested solely on the commission, I should have thought there was a great deal in Mr. Martin's argument; but here, the order of the Judge is put in, which is defective in not stating the place where the commission is to be executed, which is a most material part of the order. Any defect in that particular might have been supplied by a subsequent order; but none such appears to have been made. There seems, therefore, to be no authority to issue this commission at all.

Warrant of Attorney—Judgment—Affidavit.

Upon motion to enter up judgment upon a warrant of attorney more than a year old, it is not necessary to shew to the Court that the defendant is now alive, if the defendant has agreed to dispense with the necessity for so doing.

This was an application to enter up judgment against the defendant, upon a warrant of attorney more than a year old. The affidavit, upon which the rule was moved, stated that the deponent "had seen the defendant alive, and conversed with him within the period of three months now last; and that he verily believed that the defendant, shortly after the deponent saw him, went to reside, and that he now resided, in Paris, in the kingdom of France." The warrant of attorney itself contained the following clause: "it is hereby also declared, that, in order to enter up judgment upon, and by virtue of the within written warrant of attorney, it shall not be necessary to make any affidavit of the fact of the said Sir W. Massey Stanley being alive at or shortly before the time of entering judgment, or to obtain a Judge's order or rule of Court to warrant such judgment, and notwithstanding the within warrant of attorney should be a year old, or upwards, at the time of the entry of such judgment, any rule or practice of the Court to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding."

Bros., in support of the rule.—First, the affidavit sufficiently shews that the defendant is alive—Bayley v. Western (1).

[PATTESON, J.—In that case it was not known in what part of France the defendant resided; here he states that he resides in Paris. You might have sent some one over there to inquire whether the defendant was alive.]

But, secondly, even if the affidavit were insufficient in this respect, the defendant having himself waived the necessity of making it, the plaintiffs are entitled to this rule.

PATTESON, J.—It has been expressly held that a party may dispense with the necessity of a scire facias to revive a judgment—Morgan v. Burgess (2); and I see no reason why he may not also dispense with the usual affidavit in this case. You may take your rule.

Quo Warranto—Costs—9 Anne, c. 20.—Coroner for Borough.

Upon a quo warranto information for exercising the office of coroner for a borough (appointed under 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76.) judgment having been given for the Crown,—Held, that the relator was not entitled to costs by the 9 Anne, c. 20.

This was an information in the nature of a quo warranto for exercising the office of coroner of the borough of Wigan.

In Trinity term last (June 5), the Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for the Crown on the first and fourth issues, and for the defendant on the second and third (3). This judgment was entered up by the relator with costs.

Cowling, on a former day, in this term, obtained a rule nisi calling upon the relator to shew cause why so much of the judgment as awarded costs to be paid by the defendant to the relator should not be set aside. He cited The King v. Williams (4), The King v. M'Kay (5).

Martin and Pickering now shewed cause.—The coronership is an "office" within the meaning of that word in the statute 9 Anne, c. 20. It is found by the special verdict that previous to the passing of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. the office of coroner was held by the mayor by virtue of his office. At that time clearly, therefore, it was a corporate office—Com. Dig. 'Officer' (G); as much so as the office of Recorder—Com. Dig. 'Franchise' (F) 24. If a corporate officer then before the 6 & 7 Will. 4, does the fact of this appointment having been under that statute make any difference? It is submitted that it does not. By the 62nd section of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. the town council are to appoint the coroner; and by 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 68. s. 3. he is required to lay his accounts before the town council, and is to be paid by the treasurer out of the borough fund. In the case of The King v. Williams, relied upon in moving for this rule, the defendant had not usurped a corporate office, he had merely exercised a non-corporate right. In The King v. M'Kay the place in which the office was, was not a town corporate. So also in The King v. Hall (6), it was held that a commissioner of a court of requests was not a corporate officer; and in The King v. Wallis (7) the same was held with respect to a constable. All these are cases very different from the present. Secondly, the defendant having succeeded upon two of the issues, is entitled to his costs upon all—The King v. Downes (8). Thirdly, this is a question which ought not to be decided by the Court upon a summary application like the present; but the defendant should be left to his remedy by writ of error upon the judgment—The King v. Williams.

Cowling, contrà. —If the defendant is entitled to costs at all, he is doubtless entitled to his costs of all the issues; but it is submitted that the office of coroner is not a corporate office within the meaning of the statute 9 Anne, c. 20, and therefore that he is not entitled to costs. There is no necessity whatever for a corporation to have such an officer; and by the 62nd section of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. it is only in the event of a grant of Quarter Sessions having been made to a borough that the corporation have power given to them to appoint a coroner. If there be no separate Court of Quarter Sessions for the borough, the county coroner is required by the 64th section to act for the borough. The coroner, therefore, need not be a member of the corporation at all: he may be a perfect stranger. He is not an officer appointed annually, but is to hold his office during good behaviour. He does not submit his accounts to the corporation, but to the Quarter Sessions, that is to say, to the recorder. Nor are his duties at all connected with the corporation. He is, in point of fact, an officer of the Crown, and subject to the controul of the Secretary of State, to whom by the 63rd section he is required to make a return of the inquests held. It is true that he is appointed by the corporation, and is paid out of the borough fund, but so is a police constable, and yet he is not a corporate officer within the meaning of the statute. Suppose the corporation have an advowson situate within the town corporate, would a rector appointed by them be a corporate officer? or would the county coroner acting for the borough where no borough coroner has been appointed, be a corporate officer? The statute of Anne does not, in truth, apply to offices of a freehold nature, but to such only as are subject to annual election. In the case of The King v. Williams, as reported by Lord Kenyon (9), Lord Mansfield says, that the statute of Anne "does not extend to every usurpation of offices which may be out of a corporation, as stewards of leets, &c." The act is uncommonly clear and express as to this point, and the word "franchise" in the title must be interpreted from the body of the act, which restrains it to freedoms. That statute has always been construed with strictness. Thus, the place in which the office is exercised must be a corporate town—The King v. Richardson (10), The King v. Wallis, The King v. M'Kay. The case of The King v. Hall is directly in point. If the relator is not entitled to costs, this Court will interfere in the manner proposed by the rule. In the case of The King v. Williams the only course was to bring a writ of error, for the judgment there came from the Court of Great Sessions in the county of Denbigh. In The King v. M'Kay the present course was the one pursued; and if this Court decides to refuse the relator his costs, let him bring his writ of error.

not called upon to express any opinion as to whether, under the original charter of incorporation of the borough of Wigan, the coronership was a corporate office within the meaning of the statute 9 Anne, c. 20. The effect of the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 76. was to repeal the provisions of that charter with respect to this appointment. The defendant in this case was appointed by virtue of the 62nd section of that statute, which enacts, that "the council of every borough in which a separate Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace shall be holden shall, within ten days next after the grant, &c. appoint a fit person, not being an alderman or councillor, to be coroner of such borough so long as he shall well behave himself in his office." The question, therefore, is simply this: "Whether or not the office of coroner, as created by the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 76, is a corporate office within the meaning of the statute of Anne. And it seems to me that it is not: but that it is essentially an office held under the Crown, the legislature having studiously prevented the holder of it from being dependent upon the corporation. It is true that he is appointed by the corporation, but this fact, it is clear, is not sufficient to make him a corporate officer. I think, therefore, that the prosecutor of this information is not entitled to costs. I was asked, in the event of such being my opinion, to allow the present judgment to stand, and to leave the defendant to his writ of error, as was done in the case of The King v. Williams; but I do not think that I ought to take that course, for I see no more difficulty in the prosecutor bringing a writ of error upon a judgment without costs, if he should be advised that such a judgment is erroneous, than in the defendant bringing error upon a judgment awarding him costs. For these reasons, I think, that this rule should be made absolute.

Habeas Corpus—Infant—Guardian—Power of Attorney.

Upon an infant, a boy of the age of nine years, being brought up before the Court by habeas corpus, it appeared that upon the occasion of her husband's death, the mother then residing in India, gave over the child into the care of her late husband's mother, who subsequently died, leaving all her property to this grandchild and his brother, and appointing two persons her trustees and executors, and the guardians of the child; these persons acted, and had continued to act, as guardians, and were recognized as such, and approved of by the mother, and their conduct as guardians was not impeached in any way; she, however, marrying again, and still residing in India, suddenly executed, conjointly with her husband, a warrant of attorney, authorising certain parties, therein named, to demand and receive the custody of the child. This demand had been made upon and refused by the guardians, and in consequence of such refusal application was made, under this warrant of attorney, for the habeas corpus. Under these circumstances, the Court refused to disturb the custody of the child.

Semble—that a party who is of right entitled to the custody of an infant cannot, by warrant of attorney, empower another person to apply to this Court to change the custody.

A writ of habeas corpus had been issued, directed to Henry Potts and James Hutchins, commanding them to bring up the body of Edward Preston, an infant of the age of nine years. The writ was obeyed, and the child brought up, when, upon the affidavits filed on both sides, the following facts appeared:—"Edward Preston was the son of a Mrs. Templer by a former husband, who died in 1840, leaving her a widow with two children, and in indifferent circumstances. Mrs. Templer was resident in India. Mrs. Mary Ann Preston, the mother of Mr. Preston, offered to take charge of the children, and after some letters had passed between the parties, Edward Preston was, in the year 1841, sent over from India by his mother to Mrs. M. A. Preston. In June 1843 the grandmother took the child to Germany with her, and placed him at school there, and shortly afterwards returned to England, where she died in December 1843. By her will, made on the 19th of April 1841, she left her entire property to trustees, for the use of her two grandchildren, and by a codicil, executed on the 20th of October 1843, appointed Mr. Potts and Mr. Hutchins trustees of the property and executors of her will. She also appointed these persons the guardians of her grandchildren. Both gentlemen proved the will, but Mr. Hutchins took the more active part in the matter. At the Midsummer vacation in 1844, the child was brought home from Germany, and was placed at school in England by Mr. Hutchins; but afterwards, the boy becoming ill in health, he was sent to Hastings, by the advice of a medical man, for the benefit of the sea air. Whilst there he was constantly seen by the friends of Mr. Hutchins; and he corresponded regularly with his mother. In 1845 Mrs. Preston, the mother of the child, married her present husband Mr. Templer. From the time of the grandmother's death down to as late as the 29th of July 1846, several letters had been received by Mr. Hutchins from Mrs. Templer expressive of her satisfaction at and gratitude for his care of her child.

However, on the 6th of March in this year, a warrant of attorney was executed by Mr. and Mrs. Templer, authorizing Robert Wilson "to apply to Henry Potts and James Hutchins, &c., to deliver up the said Edward Preston to him or to such person as he might appoint to receive the said Edward Preston, and to receive and take possession of the said Edward Preston, and to receive and take possession, or authorize and empower accordingly to receive and take possession of the said Edward Preston; and to apply to the said Henry Potts and James Hutchins for all sums of money, &c. due to them for the maintenance of the children under the will of the said Mary Ann Preston; and to examine and investigate accounts, and to make the children wards of Chancery if thought necessary, and generally to do all things for the purposes aforesaid." It was under this warrant of attorney that the application for a habeas corpus was made, and it was proposed to place the child into the custody of a Mrs. Allen; who, however, was sworn in the affidavits filed on behalf of Mr. Potts and Mr. Hutchins to be a person in such a condition of life as to render her altogether unfit for such a purpose.

Bovill now appeared for Mr. Potts and Mr. Hutchins. — By this application, the Court is asked to say, that this child has not arrived at years of discretion; and if not, then to place him in the custody of those who have a right to receive him—Ex parte Greenhill (1). There is no such person here. The father of the child is dead; the mother is resident abroad; there is no authority known to the law by which an agent or attorney can be appointed to demand such custody in the place of the parents: nor are the circumstances of the case, as they appear on the affidavits, such that the Court would remove the child from the custody of Mr. Hutchins, who has not put the child under any improper restraint, and who, according to the testimony of Mrs. Templer herself, has treated the child always in a satisfactory manner. The boy is in the gallery of an adjoining court; he is nine years of age; let the Court see and question him, and ascertain whether it is his wish to leave Mr. Hutchins, and go under the care of those to whom it is proposed by the applicants for this writ to place him. That course was pursued in In re Ann Lloyd (2).

Bramwell appeared in support of the application.—The real applicant here is the mother of the child, who is entitled by law to its guardianship—Co. Lit. by Hargrave, 88, b, n. 3. Does it make any difference that Mrs. Templer is not here to make the demand in person? If it did, a parent who is abroad could never obtain possession of her child without undertaking a voyage to this country. It is a general principle of law, that if a party have a right, that right may be delegated to another. In Com. Dig. tit. 'Guardian,' D, it is said, "If a guardian by reason of nurture delivers the infant to another for his instruction, he may retake him." Here, although Mrs. Templer acquiesced in the appointment of these gentlemen as guardians for a time, she is now anxious to remove her child from their custody and place him in the custody of another guardian. The course pursued by the Court in the case of In re Ann Lloyd is not applicable to the present. The child there was a girl between eleven and twelve years of age; and considerable stress seems to have been laid upon the fact that the child was illegitimate, and that the mother had no right to its custody. The rule to be deduced from all the cases is, that the Court will satisfy itself who is the person entitled to the custody of the child, and will order the child to be delivered up to such person—Ex parte M'Clelland (3), The King v. Greenhill, Lyons v. Blenkins (4), The King v. Johnson (5), The King v. Isley (6).

Nov. 22.—PATTERSON, J. now delivered judgment.—This was an application made on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Templer, for a writ of habeas corpus to bring up the person of a child of the age of nine years, and who was the son of Mrs. Templer by a former husband. At the time of the application, I was much struck with the novelty of the circumstances under which it was made; the mother and her husband residing in India, beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, and having executed a warrant of attorney empowering another party to demand the custody of the child. No precedent was cited in support of the application, nor am I aware that any such is to be found.

But the case does not entirely rest upon that ground. In other circumstances it is very peculiar. It appears that several years ago, whilst Mrs. Templer was residing in India, her husband, a gentleman of the name of Preston, died, leaving her a widow, with two children, the elder of whom, the subject of the present application, being at that period of the age of two years. Her husband's mother, Mrs. Mary Ann Preston, being a woman of some property, offered at that time to take charge of the two children, and to bring them up; and after some letters had passed between the parties, the child in question was sent to England, and was received by his grandmother. With her the child remained for some years, and afterwards was taken by her to Germany, and placed at a school there. The grandmother returned to England and shortly afterwards died, leaving by her will her entire property to her two grandchildren; and by a codicil appointing a Mr. Potts and a Mr. Hutchins her executors and trustees of the property so devised to her grandchildren, and she also appointed those gentlemen to be the guardians of the children. Of course, Mrs. Preston had no power to make a testamentary guardian; but, nevertheless, after her death, Mr. Hutchins entered upon his duties as such, took charge of the child, sent him to school, and by the advice of medical men afterwards removed him to Hastings, for the benefit of the sea air, at which place he was living at the time this application was made. Some correspondence from Mrs. Templer is set out in the affidavits, in which she seems to express some anxiety as to what had become of the child after the grandmother's death, but upon those inquiries being answered, she appears to have acquiesced in the appointment of Mr. Hutchins as the guardian of the boy, and to be much obliged to him for the care he was taking of him. But it does appear that she was not well satisfied with the amount allowed by the trustees for the maintenance of the other child who had remained with her in India; but no complaint was made at any time by her as to the treatment of this boy. Of a sudden, however, without any reason being assigned, a warrant of attorney is sent over to this country, authorizing certain parties not only to demand the boy of Mr. Hutchins, but to do a great many other things; amongst others, to call upon the trustees to render an account of the property devised by Mrs. Preston, and specially to apply to the Court of Chancery to make the children wards of that court. No adequate motive for these hostile steps appears on the face of the affidavits; I do not believe that the real history of the transaction has been brought before me, but, as I before observed, some question of money matters is probably the real foundation for these proceedings. The affidavits which have been filed in answer, state that Mr. Hutchins was informed by Mr. Harrison, one of the attornies, that the intention was to take the child from him, and to place him with a Mrs. Allen; and then the affidavits proceed to shew that Mrs. Allen is in an inferior condition of life, and is altogether a person into whose care it would not be right to place the boy.

Inasmuch, however, as there was no opportunity of answering this affidavit, I am not disposed to attach much weight to it. Such, then, being the circumstances of the case, I have looked into Mr. M'Pherson's book upon the Law of Infants, which was handed up to me by Mr. Bramwell, and in which all the authorities upon the subject are collected; and I can find none in which an application of this sort has been granted, upon a demand being made by a person acting under a warrant of attorney from the parents of the child, and in the absence of any such precedent, I much doubt whether the Court would under any circumstances grant the application. It may be, that if the parents are resident abroad, and wish to have the custody of their child, they must come to this country, and in person make the demand. Apart from this question, however, I do find a case cited in that book, which, in many of its circumstances, resembles the present. I mean the case of Lyons v. Blenkin, cited at p. 138 of Mr. M'Pherson's book. There, "a grandmother provided for her granddaughters by the devise of lands and by pecuniary legacies, and intrusted to her daughter, the aunt of the infants, the management of their property and the discretion of providing for their maintenance and education out of it, and also appointed her their guardian." So, here, you have money left to the child by his grandmother; trustees appointed by her; an appointment so far as she can make it of a guardian, and acquiescence in such appointment by the mother; and, then, without any reason being given, a sudden dissatisfaction with such guardianship. In that case, Lord Eldon not having chosen to decide the question upon habeas corpus, the father presented a petition for the restoration of the infants to him; but his Lordship considered that the father by his consent had enabled the guardians to act, and he refused to withdraw the children from the custody of their aunt. There is another case of Ex parte Hopkins stated, in which an uncle took three nieces with their father's consent into his house, maintained them, and at his death left them considerable legacies. They remained under the guardianship of one of the executors of the testator, and Lord King refused upon the application of the father summarily to deliver over the bodies of the infants into his custody. These authorities are quite sufficient to justify me in saying, that under the peculiar circumstances of this case, I am not justified in changing the custody of this child. There is no surmise of ill treatment, or that the child has been improperly brought up; and if there be any disagreement as to money matters, that should form the subject of an application to the Court of Chancery, but is no ground upon which I, sitting here in a court of common law, am authorized to order the child to be given up to the attorneys of the mother.

Whilst the case was being argued, I was asked by Mr. Bovill to see the child, and to learn from him into whose custody he would wish to be placed. It is always a difficult matter to say at what age a child may have discretion enough to exercise his will properly in this respect, but it seemed to me almost a mockery to ask a child of nine years of age whether he would sooner remain with the person who had brought him up or go to a perfect stranger. I, therefore, declined to see and question the child. But upon the other grounds which I have stated, I think that this rule must be discharged.

11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 1.

In trespass for entering the plaintiff's dwelling-house, the defendant pleaded, that at the said time when, &c., S. held certain premises, situate at, &c., as tenant thereof to the defendant, under a certain demise thereof, made on, &c., by the defendant to S., for the term of, &c., from thence next ensuing, upon which a yearly rent of 60l. was reserved by quarterly payments, on &c.; that half a year's rent was owing from S. to the defendant, and that after the said rent became due, and while it was unpaid, S. fraudulently removed certain goods from the demised premises to prevent the defendant distraining, and in concert with the plaintiff deposited the said goods in the said dwelling-house of the plaintiff, in which, &c., and justified entering the plaintiff's house within thirty days after the removal, for the purpose of seizing the said goods as a distress, there being no sufficient distress upon the demised premises, under 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 1.

On special demurrer, it was held that the plea contained a sufficient statement of the defendant's right to distrain.

Trespass for breaking and entering the dwelling-house of the plaintiff, and making a great noise, &c., and continuing there for a long space of time, to wit, &c., under the false and unreasonable pretence that the defendant had a right to enter and seize certain goods therein as a distress for rent.

Second plea, that one Eliza Spencer, on, &c., to wit, a long space of time then last past, and from thence until and at the said time when, &c., held and enjoyed certain premises, situate and being in the parish of St. Pancras, in the county of Middlesex, as tenant thereof to the defendant Harrison, under and by virtue of a certain demise thereof, before then, to wit, on the 29th of September 1843, made by the said defendant Harrison to the said E. Spencer, for the term of three years from thence next ensuing, upon which demise a certain yearly rent, to wit, the rent or sum of 60l. was reserved and made payable by the said E.

Spencer to the said defendant Harrison, by four even and equal quarterly payments, to wit, on &c., during the said term; that just before the said time when, &c., to wit, on Lady-day then last past, a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 30l. of the rent aforesaid, for two quarters of a year of the said demise, ending on the day and year last aforesaid, became and was due, owing, and payable from the said E. Spencer to the said defendant Harrison, and then and from thence until and at the said time when, &c., remained and continued due, in arrear, and unpaid to the said defendant Harrison; that just before the said time when, &c., that is to say, after the said rent became and was due and payable, and when the same was actually due, in arrear, and unpaid, and within thirty days next before the said time when, &c. to wit, on &c., the said E. Spencer fraudulently and clandestinely conveyed away and carried off and from the said premises so held and enjoyed by the said E. Spencer, as such tenant thereof to the defendant Harrison as aforesaid, certain goods and chattels, then being the proper goods and chattels of her, the said E. Spencer, and in her possession, to prevent the defendant Harrison from distraining the same for the said rent so before and at the time of the said removal actually due, in arrear, and unpaid as aforesaid, and for that purpose and with the privity and consent of the plaintiff, conveyed the said goods and chattels into the said dwelling-house of the plaintiff, in the said declaration mentioned, and placed and deposited them there; for which reasons and because the said rent still remained in arrear and unpaid, and because there was no sufficient distress upon the said premises so held by the said E. Spencer as aforesaid, whereon the said defendant Harrison could distrain for such arrears of rent, and because the said goods and chattels which had been so fraudulently and clandestinely conveyed away and carried off by the said E. Spencer as aforesaid, still remained and were in and upon the said dwelling-house of the plaintiff, in the declaration mentioned, and in which &c., to which the same had been so conveyed as aforesaid, the said defendant Harrison, in his own right, and the said other defendants as the servants of the said defendant Harrison, and by his command, afterwards, and while the said rent so remained due, in arrear, and unpaid as aforesaid, and within thirty days next after the said goods and chattels were and had been so fraudulently and clandestinely conveyed away and carried off as aforesaid, that is to say, at the said time when, &c., entered into the said dwelling-house in which, &c., the outer door thereof being then open, and stayed and continued therein a short and reasonable time, in order to seize and take the said goods and chattels so therein then being as aforesaid, as a distress for the said arrears of rent so due and owing unto the said defendant Harrison as aforesaid, and did thereupon, at the said time when, &c., and within thirty days next after the said goods and chattels had been and were so fraudulently and clandestinely conveyed away and carried off as aforesaid, in the said dwelling-house in which, &c. take and seize and detain the said goods and chattels so there found, and then being the goods and chattels of the said E. Spencer as aforesaid, as a distress for the said arrears of rent then due and unpaid as aforesaid, and according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, as they lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, and using no improper force and violence, and staying and continuing in the said dwelling-house in which, &c. no unnecessary or improper time on that occasion, which are the same trespasses in the said declaration mentioned. Verification.

The third plea was in the same form, except that the demise was stated to be made to, and the rent due from, E. Spencer the younger.

Demurrer to the second and third pleas, on the following grounds:—That no title in Harrison to distrain for the said rent, nor the nature, quantity, or quality of his estate or interest in the demised premises, is shewn; that it does not appear that Harrison had any reversion expectant on the determination of the demise, and also that the quantity, quality and description of the goods, alleged to be removed into the dwelling-house of the plaintiff, are not set forth; and that the pleas are uncertain, and want particularity.

Huddleston, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad, for not stating the nature, quality, or quantity of the defendant's interest in the demised premises; this, it was said in Bowler v. Nicholson (1), would be a fatal objection, if taken, as here, on special demurrer. See also 2 Wms. Saund. 285, a. k. Grimstead v. Marlowe (2) shews the distinction between a declaration and a plea: in the former the plaintiff may declare generally on his possession; but, in the latter, a legal title must be set forth—Pearle v. Bridges (3), Com. Dig. tit. 'Pleader,' C, 41, E, 22, 3 M, 26. This plea is analogous to an avowry before 11 Geo. 2. c. 19; in which case the title must have been pleaded fully—Silly v. Dally (4).

[WIGHTMAN, J.—The plea alleges that Spencer held under a demise from the defendant; that may be traversed.]

That is not sufficient: it should be averred that the defendant had the reversion in the demised premises, so as to entitle him to distrain; it is consistent with this plea that he demised all his interest to Spencer. Hooker v. Nye (5), which may be relied on in support of the plea, only shews that this objection will not prevail on general demurrer.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Is it not sufficient to follow the words of section 1. of 11 Geo. 2. c. 19?]

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Pleas are pleaded over and over again in this form—Thornton v. Adams (6), Bach v. Meats (7).]

[COLBRIDGE, J.—Hooker v. Nye and Bowler v. Nicholson were actions between landlord and tenant; and the pleas were framed with reference to section 22, not section 1, of the act; and, in the latter case, the objection was, that the plea was defective in particularity, not in omitting to state title. This plea is much fuller, and gives the dates and names of the parties to the demise.]

Littledale, J., in Bowler v. Nicholson, alludes to sect. 1. of the statute, as that under which the plea is framed. Secondly, these pleas do not sufficiently describe the goods which the defendant entered to seize; and the plaintiff is not able to discover to what particular goods he is to point this evidence. He ought not to be compelled to prove that all the goods in the house are his own. In Anthony v. Haney (8) and Patrick v. Cole-rick (9) the goods were described.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The plaintiff is alleged to have assisted in the removal, and must therefore know which the goods are.]

Crompton, contra.—This plea is in accordance with the form adopted ever since the passing of 11 Geo. 2. c. 19; and as it sets up a statutable authority, it is enough if it follows the words of the statute. The analogy drawn from an avowry before the statute will not hold; for in replevin the defendant is an actor, but in trespass he merely justifies his act, and the statement of the tenancy is mere inducement and collateral to the defence: this plea does not set up matter of title, but an excuse for committing the trespass complained of. It is like the case put in Com. Dig. tit. 'Pleader,' 3, M, 16: "If the defendant pleads molliter manus in defence of his possession, he need not shew by what title he was possessed; for it is only inducement to the plea." The statute 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 1. requires, that there should be a demise whereon rent is reserved; that is here alleged with the requisite particularity of the term, date, and names of parties. That was the nature of the objection on which Bowler v. Nicholson was decided: no point was there made as to the want of statement of a reversion. The statute gives a new right to landlords to be exercised under the circumstances there stated. If the legislature had considered that it was necessary to plead specially, a concise mode of pleading would probably have been provided, as is the case in other defences given under sections 21. and 22. But, next, there is a sufficient statement of a reversion; the rent is said to be "reserved." Prima facie a "demise" implies a reversion; where the whole interest is passed it is more properly an assignment. Preece v. Corrie (10) shews, that there could be no right of distress in such a case, and therefore the goods could not be removed to avoid a distress.

[LORD DENMAN, C. J.—Do the precedents omit the statement of a reversion? That seems necessary to the defence under the statute, which only dispenses with a deduction of original title, not with a statement of a present right?]

In Hooker v. Nye it is held, that if there is no reversion in the defendant it ought to be replied.

[COLERIDGE, J.—You must shew a right to distrain as a foundation for the right to enter, and therefore you must shew a reversion.]

The statement that Spencer held under and as tenant to the defendant, means that the defendant had the reversion; otherwise it would be an assignment. Lastly, as to the description of the goods, the plea follows the words of the statute, and is sufficient.

Huddleston, in reply.—The statement that Spencer held as tenant to the defendant, does not shew any right of distress. If all the defendant's interest had been passed to Spencer, she might still hold as tenant at a rent; though not being incident to a reversion, it could not be distrained for —Pollock v. Stacey (11).

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The legislature, by 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 22, thought the old practice in replevin unreasonable, and gave a general form of avowry for rent in arrear. That is quite a distinct matter from the present, which arises under a different clause of the same statute. Bowler v. Nicholson only decided that section 22. cannot affect defences under section 1; which gives a new right in case of the fraudulent removal of goods by tenants of lands, upon the demise of which any rent is reserved for the purpose of preventing a distress. Here the declaration alleges a breaking of the plaintiff's house; the defendant pleads that in the house were goods, removed by his tenant to avoid a distress for rent due and reserved under a demise. It appears to me that this is sufficient to make out a defence under that section, the words of which are followed by the plea. I had some doubt at first whether it was quite sufficient, because section 1. does not set out all that is requisite to a complete defence. There must be a reversion in order to justify a distress. Mr. Crompton's answer is, that the plea would be inconsistent unless there was a reversion in the defendant, and I think we ought to give effect to that argument. Prima facie, at least, where the tenant is said to have removed his goods to avoid a distress, it must be presumed that rent for which a distress might be made was due. And Hooker v. Nye is a sufficient authority that such prima facie statement is sufficient, and that the plaintiff ought to reply any answer he may have to it. Preece v. Corrie supports this view, for it establishes, so far as it goes, that a party may be tenant without there being any reversion. Notwithstanding, therefore, the expressions used in Bowler v. Nicholson, this plea does state sufficient to justify the defendant under the statute.

PATTERSON, J.—This is an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, brought by a person wholly unconnected with the premises in respect of which the rent is alleged to be due. Then the defendant pleads a defence under section 1. of 11 Geo. 2. c. 19, which is not like an avowry under section 22, but states the terms and date of the demise, and the name of the tenant. It is true the defendant does not state his own title, but he states a demise to E. Spencer, and that rent became due and was in arrear, and that she removed the goods to the plaintiff's premises in order to avoid a distress. I think this pretty sufficiently shews that Spencer entered on the demised premises, and was in possession, for she removed the goods to prevent the landlord distraining. Then it is said, that without a statement of the defendant's title, no right to distrain is shewn. No doubt at common law in avowing to an action of replevin this would be so; but I do not know that it would be necessary to do so at common law in justifying in trespass. I always understood there is a distinction between replevin and trespass in this respect, and for this reason, that in the former action the defendant is an actor, setting up a claim, and not merely a party defending himself. I quite agree with the note in the last edition of Saunders; it is very guardedly expressed. I do not think that a plea stating merely that A. held as tenant to B. under a demise theretofore made, would be good if pleaded to an action of trespass. I cannot agree with the observation of Lord Lyndhurst, in Hooker v. Nye, that this is the usual form of the plea; I think the demise ought to be stated with greater particularity. However, here the defence is under section 1. of the statute, and the words of the plea follow the words of that section. The statement of the tenancy is collateral matter only, this being an action by a perfect stranger to the demised premises, and the goods having been removed from other premises; therefore it was not necessary to state it with all the allegations of title, even admitting (which I do not) that such a statement is ever necessary in trespass. The only point which weighed with me at all was, whether there was any thing amounting to a statement of a reversion in the defendant. I think, taking all the words of the plea together, it is sufficiently stated; for it is said that rent was reserved on a demise, and that the goods were removed to prevent a distress. If there was no reversion it ought to have been replied. As to the case of Bowler v. Nicholson, I do not think any of the Court intended to express an opinion whether such a plea would or would not be good on special demurrer. It is necessary to determine that point now. I should have thought, in this particular plea, it would have been enough to have said that Spencer held the premises under a demise theretofore made; but none is here stated, and therefore, even on special demurrer, the plea is good.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion after some hesitation. I should be sorry if, to defeat a technical objection, the law should be strained. Two principles are relied on: one that mere collateral matter need not be pleaded; the other, that enough must be shewn to justify the act complained of. I think there is no difficulty here in reconciling these two principles. Mr. Crompton made use of a very apt illustration of a party defending his own possession, in which case he need not set out his title, but he must shew enough to justify his conduct. Applying that principle to the present case, it appears to me that if the defendant had stated his title as at common law, beginning with a seisin in fee, it would have been purely collateral to this defence. At the same time, it is necessary that enough should appear on the plea to shew that the defendant has a right to distrain. Now, the plea follows the terms of section 1. of the statute. No doubt the framers of that statute thought they had stated enough on the face of that section to give a landlord the justification intended. That is something in support of this plea. Another strong argument is, that since the time when the statute passed the precedents have been uniform. Then, we have Hooker v. Nye, which, subject, as it may be, to the observation made by my Brother Patteson, is, at all events, an authority as to the reversion and right to distrain being implied from the words used. It is here stated that the goods were removed to avoid a distress, and that there were no goods remaining on the premises to countervail the rent due, and then, what is very important, that the plaintiff was acting in concert with Spencer to remove the goods from the premises. This seems to import that the landlord had a reversion, and followed the goods for a distress. It seems to me, therefore, that there is quite enough stated to shew a right of distress in the defendant.

WIGHTMAN, J.—It appears to me that this form of pleading is certainly admissible in the present case. I feel that great weight is the distinction made between actions of replevin and trespass. In the former, at common law, the party justifying was obliged to set out a complete title; but a distinction always obtained between justifying for taking cattle damage feasant, where it was enough to rely on possession, and to state that the cattle were doing damage in the close in which, &c. Here the defence is given by statute, which expresses under what circumstances the goods may be followed. The plea uses the terms of the act, and something more; there is a certain particularity adopted in pleading this defence, and a right to distrain is implied in the statements. And there could be no such right to distrain unless there were also a reversion, although the statute does not in terms shew any necessity for stating the reversion. The plea shews a prima facie right at least to follow the goods.

For this Hooker v. Nye is an authority, if any be necessary. On the other points, I agree with the rest of the Court.

Pleading — Payment — Satisfaction — Costs.

Defendant pleaded non assumpsit to all but 12l. To 11l., parcel of the 12l., payment and acceptance in satisfaction, after action brought. To the residue, payment of 1l. into court. The plaintiff traversed the payment of the 11l., and took the 1l. out of court. It appeared by the evidence that the amount due to the plaintiff, at the commencement of the suit, did not exceed 12l., and that 11l. was paid after action brought, and accepted by the defendant in satisfaction of that amount:—Held, that the plaintiff after the payment of the 1l., was not entitled to proceed for costs, in respect of the 11l.; but that the defendant was entitled to have the verdict entered for him, and to the general costs of the action.

A rule nisi had been obtained for entering the verdict for the defendant, and for striking out the damages of 1s., which, by the order of Maule, J., at the trial of the cause, had been entered for the plaintiff. [The pleadings and facts are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.]

Talfourd, Serj. and Keating shewed cause.—Though the jury have returned a general verdict substantially for the defendant, yet the Judge, seeing the legal effect of the finding, has ordered the verdict to stand for the plaintiff. It is true that a debtor after payment of the debt cannot be called upon to pay damages; but here the plea is not pleaded in bar of the damages, and the case is therefore distinguishable from Corbett v. Swinburne (1).

Cooke, contra.—The plaintiff might have taken the 1*l.* out of court, together with the costs of the action at that time, and the case would then have been the same as if 12*l.* had been paid into court. The plaintiff should not have traversed the payment of the 11*l.* after action brought. That plea has been found in the defendant's favour; and, after payment of a debt, a party cannot sue for nominal damages—Beaumont v. Greathead (2).

The judgment of the Court was subsequently delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—In this case the first count has been disposed of in favour of the defendant. The question upon the second and third counts is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to any damages. The learned Judge ordered an entry of 1*s.* damages, and gave the defendant leave to apply for a rule to rescind that order, and that rule we are now to decide. The second count is in assumpsit, for use and occupation, for 20*l.* The third count is on an account stated, and is in effect included in the second count. The pleas are, first, as to all except 12*l.* (omitting fractions), non assumpsit. Second, as to 11*l.*, parcel of 12*l.*, in bar of further maintenance, that the defendant, after writ, and before declaration, paid, and that the plaintiff received that sum of 11*l.*, in satisfaction thereof and of all causes of action in respect thereof. Third, payment of 1*l.*, residue, into court. The replication, as to the first plea joins issue; as to the second plea traverses the payment and receipt; and as to the third plea takes the 1*l.* out of court.

The evidence shewed as to the first plea, that the defendant, at the commencement of the action, was not indebted beyond the sum of 12*l.* for the cause of action declared on. As to the second count, that after the writ had been issued, but before the defendant or the plaintiff were aware of it, and before declaration, the defendant paid, and plaintiff received, the sum of 11*l.* mentioned in the plea.

The plaintiff admitted, that if the writ had not been issued, this payment and receipt would have proved the common plea of payment in bar of the action as to that amount; but contended, that it would not prove this plea in bar of the further maintenance of the action, because at the time it was received the plaintiff had become entitled to the costs of the writ, and that the plaintiff did not receive it in satisfaction of the costs, as he did not know that he was so entitled, and upon this ground we understand the learned Judge directed the entry of 1*s.* damages for the plaintiff.

But it appears to us, that, upon these pleadings and facts, the defendant was entitled to succeed on both issues, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to any damages as the plaintiff failed to establish a right to more than the sum admitted; the verdict on the first issue, raising this question, should be reversed, and entered for the defendant. The second plea raises the question, whether 11*l.* had been paid and received in satisfaction of so much of the cause of action as amounted to 11*l.*; and the evidence shews that it was so, and entitles the defendant to a verdict thereon. There appears no reason for requiring that the plea should state, or the evidence shew, that this sum was received in satisfaction of any costs, for the costs of the writ, which were all the costs incurred when this payment was made, are offered to the plaintiff by the third plea. If the defendant had paid no money to the plaintiff, he clearly might have paid 12*l.* into court, in bar of the further maintenance of the action as to that sum, and if the plaintiff chose to admit that no more was due, he might take it, and the costs of the action; but if he chose to claim more, the costs of the action would abide the result of such claim.

By paying part to the plaintiff, after writ issued, we think the defendant was in not a worse situation than if he had paid nothing; that he was not obliged to pay the 11*l.* twice over, but was at liberty to say that his liability had not exceeded 12*l.*; that 11*l.* had been discharged by payment, and that the remaining 1*l.*, with the costs of the writ and action, were at the option of the plaintiff, if he gave up any further claim. If the plaintiff had given up any further claim, he would have the costs of the writ only once; and if he made a further claim, the entire costs of the writ were to depend on that claim in the ordinary way. Then, as the defendant has succeeded in respect of that claim, he is entitled to the general costs of the action. The rule, therefore, must be made absolute, for entering the verdict on the general issue for the defendant, and for striking out the damages, and for delivering the postea to the defendant.

Rule absolute.

Assumpsit—Consideration—Pleading.

A declaration stated that the defendant was possessed of a ship, and the plaintiff was a master mariner, having interest at N, for loading a vessel; and it having been proposed that the defendant should give the plaintiff the command of the said ship, for a voyage to the West Indies and back, it was agreed that in consideration of the plaintiff having interest in N, for loading a vessel, the defendant would give the plaintiff the command of the said ship, with the understanding that the plaintiff would use all possible exertions for the benefit of the ship and owners; and that for such services the defendant would pay the plaintiff 8l. per month during the command by the plaintiff, and other sums during the voyage, with outward and homeward primage. Allegation of mutual promises. Averment, that the defendant gave the plaintiff the command of the said ship, and that he set out on the voyage, and carried and delivered an outward cargo; that the plaintiff arrived at N, and finding that a homeward cargo could not be obtained without disadvantage, he proceeded to R, and there took in a homeward cargo, and delivered the same at London, and then resigned the command to the defendant, who accepted the same; that from the time when the command was given to him till he so resigned it, the plaintiff used all possible exertions for the benefit of the said ship and owners. Breach, non-payment by the defendant of the monies due to the plaintiff. Plea, that the plaintiff did not use all possible exertions, &c., modo et formâ:—Held, on demurrer, that the declaration imported a sufficient consideration; and that the plaintiff, having taken the command of the ship, might maintain the action.

Held, also, that the plea traversed only part of the consideration, and was, therefore, insufficient.

Assumpsit. The first count stated, that whereas, at the time of the making of the agreement after mentioned, the defendant was possessed of a certain ship or vessel called the Cuba, then lying at the port of London, and the plaintiff was a master mariner, having interest in the island of Nevis, in the West Indies, for loading a vessel; and it having been proposed by the plaintiff to the defendant that the defendant should give the plaintiff the command of the said ship, for a voyage to the West Indies and back, thereupon, heretofore, to wit, on &c., by an agreement in writing then made between the plaintiff and the defendant it was agreed, that in consideration of the plaintiff having interest in Nevis aforesaid for loading a vessel, he, the defendant, would give the plaintiff the command of the said ship called the Cuba, with the understanding that the plaintiff would use all possible exertion for the benefit of the said ship and owners thereof; and that, for such services, the defendant would pay the plaintiff the sum of 8l. 8s. per month, during the command by the plaintiff, and also 5l. per month, during the said voyage, for finding the cabin in requisites and cuddy stores; and also 30l. for horse-hire and contingent expenses in the West Indies, with outward primage, and the usual and customary homeward primage. The cabin to be at the service of the plaintiff, as also the profit of passage-money (if any) therein, the plaintiff finding all the requirements thereof; and the said agreement being so made, afterwards, to wit, on &c., in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, then promised the defendant to observe and perform all things which, according to the said agreement, were by and on the behalf of him, the plaintiff, to be observed or performed, the defendant promised the plaintiff to observe and perform all things which according to the said agreement were by and on the behalf of the defendant to be observed or performed. Averment of due performance by the plaintiff of all things which according to the said agreement were, by and on behalf of him, to be observed or performed; that in pursuance of the said agreement, the defendant gave the plaintiff the command of the said ship, and that he set out in command of the said ship from London aforesaid, on the voyage aforesaid; that the said ship carried an outward cargo from London aforesaid, to be delivered at divers ports and places in the course of the said voyage, to wit, to be delivered at the island of Canary, on the coast of Africa, and at the said island of Nevis, and at the island of St. Kitt's, in the West Indies aforesaid ; that the plaintiff safely delivered the said cargo at the destination thereof, to wit, at the several places last aforesaid ; that the sum earned by the said ship for freight in respect of the said outward cargo amounted to 120*l.* ; that the plaintiff having so as aforesaid set out on the said voyage, duly performed and completed the same, and having so completed the said voyage resigned the command of the said ship into the hands of the defendant as hereinafter mentioned ; that in the prosecution of the said voyage the plaintiff arrived at the said island of Nevis, and finding that a homeward cargo was not likely to be obtained there for the said ship, without disadvantage to the said ship and owners from delay, the plaintiff in the execution of the said voyage proceeded thence with the said ship to the island of Porto Rico, in the West Indies, and there procured a full homeward cargo for the said ship, to wit, a cargo of 474 hogsheads of sugar ; that the plaintiff having procured the said cargo, took in the same at Porto Rico aforesaid, and set out home and carried the said cargo from Porto Rico aforesaid home, to wit, to London aforesaid, and arrived there heretofore, to wit, on &c., and safely delivered the said cargo there, and then resigned the command of the said ship into the hands of the defendant, who accepted the said resignation ; that during all the time from the time when the command of the said ship was given him, until the time when he so as aforesaid resigned the said command, the plaintiff used all possible exertions for the benefit of the said ship and of the owners thereof ; that the said time during which he had the command of the said ship amounted to six months, and that the time during which the said voyage continued amounted to six months ; that the plaintiff found the cabin during all the said voyage in requisites and cuddy stores, and incurred great expenses for horse hire and contingent expenses in the West Indies, to wit, 30*l.* ; that outward primage is at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. upon the sum earned for freight in respect of the said outward cargo, and the usual and customary homeward primage upon the said homeward cargo is at the rate of 6*d.* for every hogshead so as aforesaid carried from Porto Rico aforesaid, and delivered at London aforesaid : of all which premises the defendant from time to time had notice ; that although the sum of 53*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.* has accrued due to him from the defendant in pursuance of the said agreement, at the rate of 8*l.* 8*s.* per month for every month during the said command by him of the said ship, to wit, for six months, at and after the rate aforesaid ; and although the sum of 26*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* has accrued due to him from the defendant in pursuance of the said agreement, at the rate of 5*l.* per month for every month during the said voyage, to wit, for six months, at and after the rate aforesaid ; and although the sum of 30*l.* has accrued due to him from the defendant in pursuance of the said agreement for horse hire and contingent expenses in the West Indies aforesaid ; and although the sum of 6*l.* has accrued due to him from the defendant in pursuance of the said agreement for primage on the said outward cargo, at a certain per-centage on the amount earned for freight, to wit, on the sum of 120*l.*, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. upon the said sum of 120*l.* ; and although the sum of 11*l.* 17*s.* has accrued due to him from the defendant in pursuance of the said agreement for the usual and customary homeward primage on the said homeward cargo, at and after the rate of 6*d.* per hogshead for every hogshead of sugar of the said homeward cargo so carried and discharged and delivered as aforesaid ; and although the defendant has from time to time had due notice of all the premises, and although a reasonable time has elapsed before the commencement of this suit for payment by the defendant to the plaintiff of the said several sums of money respectively ; and although the defendant has been often requested to do so, yet the defendant has disregarded his said promise, &c. Counts for work and labour, for commission on goods sold by the plaintiff for the defendant, for goods bought by the plaintiff for the defendant at his request, for money paid, and on an account stated.

Fourth plea, that the plaintiff did not use all possible exertions for the benefit of the said ship, or of the owners thereof, in manner and form as the said plaintiff hath above in the said first count of his said declaration in that behalf alleged.

Demurrer. The grounds specially stated were, that the fourth plea treats the matter therein traversed, namely, that the plaintiff hath used all possible exertion for the benefit of the said ship and owners as a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to recover upon the said agreement, whereas, in truth and law, it is not a condition precedent thereto; that the said plea traverses an immaterial averment, and offers an immaterial issue; also, that it is uncertain whether the said plea denies or confesses the contract or promise in the said first count stated; and the defendant ought to have made it appear whether he denies or confesses the same. Joinder in demurrer.

Mills, in support of the demurrer.—The plea treats it as a condition precedent that the plaintiff should use all possible exertions to procure a cargo; but this is clearly an independent stipulation on the part of the plaintiff, a failure to perform which would give the defendant a right to be compensated by damages, but will not deprive the plaintiff of his remedy against the defendant. Stavers v. Curling (1) is directly in point. But it may be contended, that the declaration does not shew any consideration for the defendant's promise. Looking to the whole declaration, it is clear that the consideration, expressed on the face of the agreement, is, that the defendant should render to the plaintiff the command of the vessel. As to mutuality, that is imported by the word "agreement"—Mouniford v. Horton (2).

Ogle, contra.—There is no valid consideration for the defendant's promise. The introductory averments in the declaration will only explain, but not add to, the subsequent part; and it does not appear there is any mutuality. The plaintiff could not be forced under this agreement to take charge of the ship.

[PATTESON, J.—There are cases where an action will lie without mutuality,—on a guarantie, for instance. If the plaintiff here does take the command of the ship under the agreement, surely he may maintain an action for his services, although the defendant could not compel him to take the command.]

That would be on the count for work and labour, not on the special count.

[COLERIDGE, J.—What is called a special count is really an indebitatus count unnecessarily expanded. The agreement to use all possible exertion is nothing more than the ordinary duty of the master; and if you strike that out, there remains an agreement that if the plaintiff will become master, the defendant will pay him for his services, and an averment that the plaintiff did become master.]

The count rests entirely on the agreement; and the case ought to be considered as if the action was commenced the day after the contract was made.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—That is not so. We must consider the action brought the day after the work done. In the case put by my Brother Patteson, of a guarantie, no action lies till the goods are supplied.]

Then the plea is good. The defendant was to pay the plaintiff "for such services"; those include the using all possible exertions as part of the conduct of the ship. The plaintiff has made this part of the consideration for the promise; and therefore it may be traversed.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—After some doubt I think this declaration may be sustained. If the plaintiff has done the work, and the defendant has had some benefit from it, he is bound to pay for it, although he may not have received all the benefit which he would if the work had been done with all possible exertions.

PATTESON, J.—This is a very legitimate mode of pleading, to state the agreement in hæc verba, and then allege mutual promises. It is every day's practice to do so in cases on policies of insurance. The question is, whether we can collect from the declaration any and what consideration. The words "in consideration of the plaintiff having interest at Nevis," must be taken only as giving the reasons for the agreement. That is evident from the preceding part of the declaration. Then we must look at the whole of the agreement, and it amounts to this, that the plaintiff having interest at Nevis, should be put in command of the vessel, and should use all possible exertions to get a cargo, and that the defendant should pay him for such services. The plea traverses only part of the consideration, and is therefore insufficient. It then comes to the question, whether the declaration is good on general demurrer; and I think it is—it is such as any person of ordinary sense would understand, and that is sufficient.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion on both points. On the plea I never felt any doubt. If it had shewn that the whole of the consideration had failed, it would have caused the promise to fail also. However, it only alleges a partial failure, and that will not do away with the promise. As to the first point, my only doubt was as to the mode of stating the agreement, which is not very technical. I have no doubt that the meaning of the agreement is, that if the plaintiff would take charge of the vessel, and would use his best exertions to get a cargo, the defendant would pay him at the rate mentioned. Until the plaintiff had taken the command, no action could be brought against the defendant; but where he has once done so, I think it quite clear he may maintain an action for his services.

WIGHTMAN, J.—The objection to the declaration is, that there is no mutuality shewn. That objection might be entitled to great weight if the case rested on the contract unexecuted. But here the plaintiff has done all that the contract contemplated he should do. Such a contract in its inception is obligatory on one party only, as in the instance of a guarantee; but if the person who is not bound does act under the contract, a right of action accrues to him against the other. On the plea, I agree with the rest of the Court.

ROGERS v. BRENTON.

Custom—Mine—Minerals—Lex Loci—Stannaries of Cornwall—Bounding—Renewal of Bounds—Profit in alieno solo.

A custom for a miner or bounder to enter and work land, in search of minerals, (such working not having been commenced or prosecuted by the owner or other person) rendering a portion of the produce to the lord or owner of the soil, and giving due notice of his proceedings, is not an illegal or unreasonable custom; and the interest so acquired by virtue of the custom is, if the bounder continues in possession and works the mine, such an interest in the mine as may be recovered in ejectment; but such customary right cannot exist unless there be a bonâ fide continuing by the bounder to search for ore: and, therefore, where the plaintiff declared on his possession of a certain "tenement," to wit, "the right to dig and get ore, found and being within certain tin bounds," and charged the defendant with disturbing him, and carrying away the ore, &c.,—Held, that although the statement of the plaintiff's right might properly describe that which existed when he first took possession of the bounds under the custom; yet in order to make out his right as claimed he must shew a bonâ fide continuing to work the mine, and that the annual renewal by new cutting the turves, however useful for ascertaining the limits, could not be considered as equivalent to such working.

Held, also, that such a claim was to be tried as a custom limited in local extent, and not as the local law of a particular district.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff, before, &c., to wit, on the 6th of January 1839, and from thence continually until the commencement of this suit, was lawfully possessed of, and entitled to, and ought to have had and enjoyed the tenement following, that is to say, the right and liberty to get, dig, raise, and carry away for his, the said plaintiff's own use, the tin and tin ore found and being within a certain place or plot of ground, called the Ruby Tin Bounds, situate in the parish of Wendron, in the county of Cornwall; yet the defendant, well knowing, &c., but contriving to injure and disturb, &c., whilst &c., wrongfully, &c. dug, got, raised, and carried away divers large quantities, to wit, twenty tons of tin and tin ore, found and being within the said place or plot of ground hereinbefore described.

Second count, trover for tin and tin ore.

Pleas—first, not guilty.

Second, to first count, that the plaintiff was not lawfully possessed of, nor entitled to, nor ought he to have had or enjoyed the said tenement in that count mentioned, that is to say, the right and liberty to dig, get, raise, and carry away for his the said plaintiff's own use, the tin and tin ore found and being within the said place or plot of ground, modo et forma.

Third, to the second count, not possessed of the tin and tin ore.

The cause was tried, before Wightman, J., at Westminster, at the Sittings after Trinity term, 1843. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to a certain share in tin bounds, called the Ruby Tin Bounds, in the county of Cornwall. These "bounds" had been held, as of right, for many years, and had been made the subjects of sale and settlement. It was contended that the bound-owner having marked out bounds, and paid a trifling fine to the lord of the manor, had a right to set the mine at work. The right to a mine once bounded, if not worked, was stated by witnesses to be kept alive by annual renewals. The renewal was by turning up a turf at the four corners, and many instances were mentioned in which bounds had been left unworked for eighteen or nineteen years, and then worked again; but the ordinary mode was, if the mine was not worked, to renew within a year and a day. The defendant was a captain of a mine which had been seven or eight years at work, and had taken ore which the plaintiff claimed as being within his bounds. The defendant did not dispute the right of the bounder to work; but contended that his right to get ore only continued so long as by the stannary laws he should "work his tin-work by himself, his wages man or farmer, paying toll once a year and a day, or otherwise continuing his working in driving an adit and sinking a shaft, and withal preserving the four corner bounds;" and that the annual renewal of turning up four turves is only to preserve the boundaries, and identify and divide one man's pitch or set from that of another man, and does not create or preserve a title to bounds; if the bounds were left unwrought for forty or fifty years, the right was lost; also that the right to bound could in no case be claimed over the inclosed lands, but over the wastes alone. A verdict having been found for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, in Michaelmas term, 1843,—

Sir W. W. Follett (Solicitor General) applied for a rule nisi to enter a nonsuit according to the leave reserved. First, on the ground that the evidence did not support the custom, as alleged in the declaration. Secondly, that the custom, as alleged there, would exclude the interest of the lord of the manor, and was, therefore, bad. The proof was that if the owner did not work the mine, any tinner might, rendering the lord his share of ore got; but here it was not proved or pretended that the plaintiff, the bound-owner, continued to work the mine. Thirdly this is a custom to take a profit in alieno solo, and clearly bad—Blewett v. Tregonning (1). There ought also to be a new trial, as the stannary laws, which were admitted, were not evidence to support the custom. Also the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

A rule nisi having been granted, in Hilary term, 1845,—

Kelly, Smirke and Montague Smith shewed cause.—The defendant, who was a mere wrong-doer, disputes that which he calls a custom; but which, in reality, is part of the general law of Cornwall, recognized in many judicial decisions, and the basis of many family settlements and purchases. It is analogous to the law of gavelkind, peculiar to particular counties, and traces its existence to a time anterior to that when Cornwall became an integral part of England. It may be shortly stated to be a right in "tinnerns" to take and set apart any particular portion of the waste, within the manor of the Duchy of Cornwall, and to plant and set bounds there, and to work the mines under the places so bounded, rendering to the "Duke of Cornwall every fifteenth dish of ore;" it being an incident of the custom, that the mines, when not in work, should be annually renewed. It is objected that this is a custom, and a bad custom; but it is not a mere custom to take profit in alieno solo; it is a right which may be, and has been, made the subject of ejectment, and may be considered as a right to a certain portion of the soil itself, with certain limitations—Doe d. Lord Falmouth v. Alderson, fully reported in Smirke's Stannaries of Cornwall, p. 39.

[COLERIDGE, J.—That was the case of a mine actually at work.]

But still the question raised was, whether the interest of the bound-owner, like that of an outstanding termor, did not bar the plaintiff. In Doe d. Hanley v. Wood (2) nothing was proved on the part of the plaintiff but a licence to take ore. The observations of Abbott, C.J. are in the plaintiff's favour. With respect to the bounder's interest, the law appears to be settled by Vice v. Thomas, Smirke's Stannaries of Cornwall, 1843, pp. 4, 32. In that case the petitioner set out his title as grantee of bounds for twenty-one years; and in giving judgment, in that case, the Lord Warden, assisted by the Judges, expressly decides that the interest of a bound-owner is recoverable in ejectment. In Doe d. Lord Falmouth v. Alderson it was not denied that such a right as that claimed by the plaintiff might exist. In that defendant, who being a bound-owner, who had been let in to defend for a mine (3), failed to establish his right as against the plaintiff, on the ground that the bounds had not been properly kept up. In the course of the argument, on shewing cause against a rule for a new trial in that case in November 1836, it was objected by the counsel for the plaintiff that the claim of the defendant was in right of a custom to take a profit in alieno solo, which was bad. —Grimstead v. Marlow (4), on which it was said, by Parke, B., "There is nothing in that objection. The custom is alleged to be part of the common law of Cornwall;"

and, in giving judgment, he observed that "the interest of the bound-owner (the defendant) depends on the custom, and ought to be found by a jury. I pronounce no opinion upon it. With respect to the mode of acquiring and preserving the right, the stannary laws are tolerably clear. To obtain the right de novo, proclamations are indispensable; but ancient bounds require none. To preserve the latter it is necessary for the bounder or others in his behalf either to renew annually, or, as it seems, to work within them, keeping up the visible marks of the old corners. If by either of these modes of preserving the right, a possessory interest in the tin mines was, on the 1st of July 1835, vested in a third person, it is an answer to this action." The documentary evidence of the custom is fully set out in the appendix to Rowe v. Brenton (5).

[COLERIDGE, J.—Can the bound-owner, by going through the form of renewing, without working at all, defeat the rights of the public at large? If so, the custom might operate to prevent anything being got from the mine by any one.]

It is not to be assumed or supposed that the right will be abused. The custom is not more unreasonable than the custom for the tanners to agree with the Duke of Cornwall that they are to take to the mines on payment of toll, without any obligation on these tanners to work the mines.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The custom might operate so as to allow any bound-owner to prevent the ore getting into the market, with a view to keep up the value of some other mine, and create a monopoly.]

That might be said of the ownership of the mine itself. Besides, the custom had its origin in times when commercial rivalry was little thought of, and is not to be impugned by arguments derived from the present state of society. In former times it is not likely that adventurers would have begun to work at all, without some sort of title to protect them.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—It was objected, at the trial, that the custom was bad for uncertainty as to the extent to which bounds might go. For anything that appears, any man, according to the custom, might bound the whole county.]

The same may be said of the custom of requiring fines without limit to amount on renewal of copyholds.

As to the question of taking profit in alieno solo. In Tyson v. Smith (6) the same objection was made, and Blewett v. Tregonning was referred to. In that case under the custom a right was, in fact, claimed to take a profit in the soil of another, but it was held good; and Tindal, C.J. in giving judgment, says, "A custom is not unreasonable merely because it is contrary to a particular maxim or rule of the common law, for Consuetudo ex certâ causâ rationabili usitata privat communem legem (Co. Litt. 113, a), as the custom of gavelkind and borough English, which are directly contrary to the law of descent; or again the custom of Kent, which is contrary to the law of escheats." Blewett v. Tregonning was founded on Gateward's case (7), which was a question of common. This is a lex loci. In Doe d. Thomson v. Pearce (8), Gilbert v. Tomison (9), Arkwright v. Cantrell (10), and Beresford v. Bacon (11), similar customs have come under discussion. In the last case the plea setting up the custom was held ill, but that was on the ground that it was not alleged to exist in a county or parish, but in a particular close; and it is true that a custom de non decimando would not be good for one parish or manor, but it would be good for a county—Gwillim, p. 373, 21 Edw. 4. fol. 28, 22 Edw. 4. fol. 8, Vin. Abr. tit. 'Custom,' Newton v. Shafto (12). All the requisites of a custom are well put in Cuddon v. Estwick (13), and they exist here. The case of the Stannaries (14) recognizes a similar custom. In The Mayor of Lynn v. Taylor (15), a custom for the freemen of Lynn to take gravel in the locus in quo to ballast their vessels was held good, being for the benefit of navigation; and Gateward's case was held not to apply. In the judgment in that case the mining customs of Derbyshire were referred to and recognized. It is said that the custom is unreasonable; but of the reasonableness the Court cannot judge. Supposing a custom was set up for the Duke of Cornwall to enter on all mines and take the ore, making only a compensation for the superficial damage, which is the case in every country in Europe except England, can it be said that such a custom would be unreasonable? Can this Court say that that which is the custom of every other country is an unreasonable custom? If so, the custom set up by the plaintiff is à fortiori reasonable, for it provides for ample notice to the landowner, and it is only in default of his interference that the bound-owner's right can attach, and he cannot be called upon to have the mine always at work. But, in point of fact, the bounds in this case were constantly renewed and the mine at work at intervals. The defendant entered six or seven years ago and worked the mine; no evidence was given as to the party under whom he claimed, but the action is now defended by the lessee of the duchy. The plaintiff's family have exercised the right ever since the Conquest; and Gateward's case is not like this, as this is not a profit à prendre, but a claim to the soil itself.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—At the trial that was put as an à fortiori argument against the custom.]

Here ample consideration is paid to the lord by the bound-owner; that also distinguishes the present case from Gateward's case as well as from Blewett v. Tregonning, Bac. Abr. tit. 'Custom,' (D). Besides, great expense is incurred by the bound-owner in working the mine and searching for the ore—Smirke, p. 39, Doe d. Lord Falmouth v. Alderson. A custom which might be bad in one vill, might yet be good in another—Vin. Abr. tit. 'Custom,' (E), pl. 7 and 8, 'Copyhold,' (K), 4, 6, and 7, Co. Litt. 43, b, Hoskins v. Robins (16). The essence of the custom is the continual renewal. It is not unreasonable even as against the lord—Hicks v. Gardiner (17), Horton v. Beckman (18).

There is no real distinction between this case and that of copyhold, which having originated in a custom to hold land at the will of the lord has grown up into a right to hold it against him—2 Black. Com. 95. The custom has been assumed to exist, and has been recognized as legal in The King v. the Inhabitants of St. Agnes (19), Crease v. Barrett (20), Crease v. Sawle (21).

Sir T. Wilde, Crowder and Butt, contra. —This claim goes beyond any that has been sanctioned by any Court. It amounts to a claim of a right to divest the lord of a great portion of his estate by the mere act of taking up a few turves; and more than that, if after getting up these turves, and never perhaps working the mine at all, the claim as made is of the right to enter upon the tenant or owner who is working, and take from him all the ore he may have raised. Such a custom cannot be supported. In addition to this, it is uncertain. First, as to the necessity of the renewal of the bounds; secondly, as to the time of such renewal; thirdly, as to the mode of bounding—Gray's case (22), Lovelace v. Reynolds (23), Pad-dock v. Forrester (24). As to that, the usage as proved was, according to some witnesses, that when a mine was once bounded, neither working nor renewal was necessary. If there was any evidence to support the custom, it was so uncertain and contradictory that the defendant would, at all events, be entitled to a new trial. This is likened to the case of gavelkind; but gavelkind was the common law of England once, and has been frequently recognized by parliament. Vice v. Thomas is no decision in favour of such a right as claimed in this declaration. In Doe d. Lord Falmouth v. Alderson the question was, whether the bounds were ancient bounds, and the Judge left to the jury the question suggested by the Court. That case only shews that the plaintiff can only recover on his own title; and the right thus claimed was an easement only. If the Court cannot trace the origin of the custom, they will look to its incidents, and judge whether it be reasonable. The extent of the district over which it is said to prevail cannot affect the question of its reasonableness. The question in Newton v. Shafte arose out of circumstances of border history. No case has been cited where such a custom as this, or indeed any other custom, was held to be reasonable, on the ground that it applied to a large district. The case of Arkwright v. Cantrell does not touch the present. In Gilbert v. Tomison the custom was different and was not disputed—Doe d. Thomson v. Pearce. Broadbent v. Wilks (25), where all the incidents of a custom are fully gone into, is a strong authority for the defendant. There is nothing in the custom as laid to compel the boulder to render any portion to the lord. If the plaintiff can recover in the present case, he may equally recover against the lord.

At the sittings after Hilary term, 1846, the Court intimated an opinion that the case ought to be allowed to go down to trial again, the Judge who tried the cause not being altogether satisfied with the verdict; they were, however, requested by the defendant's counsel to give judgment on the question of the validity of the custom itself, which was raised in the rule for a nonsuit.

LORD DENMAN, C.J., subsequently delivered the judgment of the Court.—The remaining question in this case, which the Court is now called on to decide, turns upon the validity of a custom or local usage, on which the plaintiff must rely to establish the most important allegation in his declaration, which the defendant expressly traverses by one of his pleas. The plaintiff declares on his possession of a tenement, which he describes as "the right and liberty to dig, get, raise and carry away the tin or tin ore found and being within a certain place or plot of ground, called the Ruby Tin Bounds"; the second plea denies this, and in part proof of it the plaintiff has offered evidence of, and the jury have found the existence in fact of the following custom:—That any tinner within the county of Cornwall may acquire the right to the tin within certain limits, according to the conditions, and following the rules, which will be found particularly stated in Rewe v. Brenton (26); and that the right, when so acquired, may be preserved by an annual renewal of the bounds; and that it is not necessary for its preservation that the minerals, if any, within the limits, should be sought after, and the land worked for mineral purposes, by the bound-owner or on his behalf.

The defendant contends that such a custom cannot exist in law, and, consequently, that the right laid in the declaration is not proved. The argument has proceeded on two grounds: the plaintiff contending, first, that, considered as a mere custom, to be tried by the ordinary tests, this is not unreasonable; and, secondly, that it is not properly a mere custom so to be tried, but that it is the local law of an extensive district, anterior, it may be, in origin, to the date when Cornwall became part of, and subject to, the general law of England; and that its effect is not to create merely an easement to be enjoyed in the land of another, but a tenement.

Although a decision on the second ground might dispense with a consideration of the former, it will be found from the nature of the inquiry more convenient to examine both in the order in which they are stated. In the great case of mines in Plowden, 310, 340, the Judges, as is well known, decided by a very large majority, that even where the gold or silver in a mine of base metal, as tin, in the land of a subject, is of less value than the base metal, the mere circumstance of its existence there causes the prerogative of the Crown to attach upon it, and makes it a mine royal,—and that the Crown has liberty to dig for it, place it on the surface, and carry it away. This resolution, however, clearly did not satisfy the learned reporter; he seems to have thought it proceeded from "ignorance of the nature of base mines;" all of which he surmises to contain some proportion of the richer and royal metals—gold or silver. The decision of the case, however, he observes, did not turn on this point, for that, as the defendant there had pleaded, the intendment, which was to be the best for the Queen, must be that the gold and silver in the mines in question was of sufficient quality and value with reference to the base metal properly to qualify the whole mine as a mine of the royal metals. Another resolution, therefore, of all the Judges in the same case (p. 336) remains untouched—"that if the ore or mine in the soil of the subject be of copper, tin, &c., in which there is no gold or silver, in this case the proprietor of the soil shall have the ore or mine, and not the Crown by prerogative."

We have adverted to this case, and these resolutions, with a view to the important position, from which the whole argument must start, the ownership, namely, of the tin mines, and from whom derived; and in this sense it is material to observe, that although the principal part of the precedents and authorities cited in the argument in Plowden were drawn from Devon and Cornwall, yet even there these were not urged as having any peculiarity of local history which distinguished them either from each other or from the rest of England; on the contrary, they were used as applicable to the case in hand of a mine in Cumberland; and in the judgment no distinction whatever was adverted to between the Stannary districts inter se, or between them and any other mineral tract in England.

Nothing has been alleged in the present case to bring this mine within the description of a royal mine; and we think it would be wrong to encourage the slightest doubt that, apart from all question of boundary, the ownership of a tin or copper mine in Cornwall is in the owner of the freehold of the soil, ratione soli, by the common law of England, applicable to it, as to any other mineral district in any other part of England.

Upon this ownership, however, the custom of bounding has been engrafted, and to the extent to which both sides are agreed to admit it in fact there can be no doubt that it is most reasonable, fulfilling every requisite of a good custom. In substance it is this:—the mine is parcel of the soil; the ownership is in the owner of the soil; but it is a parcel which to discover and bring to the surface may ordinarily require capital, skill, enterprise, and combination; which while in the bowels of the earth is wholly useless to the owner as well as to the public, and the bringing of which into the market is eminently for the benefit of the public. If, therefore, the owner of the soil cannot or will not do this for himself, he shall not be allowed to lock it up from the public; and therefore in such case (unless where by inclosure he may seem to have devoted the land to other important purposes inconsistent with mining operations, such as agriculture or building,) any tinner, i. e. any man employing himself in tin mining, may secure to himself the right to dig the mine under the land, rendering a certain portion of the produce to the owner of the soil.

It is right to observe in passing, how every step even in this strong invasion of the rights of ownership still is made with reference to them. In the first place, the lands to be bounded (we speak of a supposed original case of bounding) must be wastrel; if it be several and inclosed, it must have been anciently bounden while wastrel, and so in the language of the country "assured for wastrel;" the liability must have first attached on it therefore before inclosure and devotion to other useful purposes. Then after the tinner or boulder has commenced by cutting the turves, and so marking out the limits within which he will work, proceedings are to be taken in the Stannary courts, of which the owner has notice—and sufficient time is allowed before the boulder's title becomes complete—during which the owner may still intervene and preserve his rights entire, so as he will exercise them for the benefit of the public. If he abstain from any interference, it may be well considered that he has consented to the boulder's proceedings;—and the customary render of the portion called toll-tin may be a very sufficient consideration to him for what he gives up of his original exclusive rights.

When by the completion of the boulder's proceedings in the Stannary court his title is perfect, the question next material to be considered is, what is its legal character and amount? It is claimed on the present declaration as a "tenement;" it is contended by the defendant that it amounts to no more than an easement,—and as such is bad in point of law. In the case of Vice v. Thomas, reported by Mr. Smirke, the petitioner claimed under the bound-owner; he stated that J. S. Enys "was lawfully possessed of the tin bounds after mentioned," and granted to him by indenture "liberty, licence, and power to dig, &c., throughout his tin bounds in Polbarrow mine, within certain described limits of the said mine," with liberty to dig drifts, shafts, &c. He then averred that in pursuance of the liberties granted he began to dig, work, and search for tin and tin ore within and under the said bounds,—and erected machinery,—and continued to dig till a certain time, when he discontinued, but with full intention of returning when convenient to him, and with that intention left his machinery standing upon the same bounds;—that he had raised large quantities of tin, disposed of it to his own use, and paid the toll and farm respectively. He then complained of a forcible entry and dispossession by the defendants. It is necessary to state the petition thus minutely, in order to apply the judgment, which follows:—"The next question then to be considered is, whether it is right to assume that the possession of the mine might have been recovered in ejectment. The vice warden, in deciding this case, did not express any doubt that possession of the mine might be recovered in ejectment; his proposition was merely this, that a court of equity had concurrent jurisdiction with a court of law. The cases cited at the bar during the argument shew, that ejectment will lie for a mine in circumstances like those in the present case, and I consider that such is the law of the case"—p. 35. (27)

The judgment from which we have made this extract is of the highest authority;—the case was very learnedly and ably argued, and H. R. H. the Lord Warden was assisted by five most eminent Judges. And this extract is the hinge on which the whole decision turned. But it certainly was not intended to lay down anything contrary to former decisions of the common law courts. The case of Doe d. Hanley v. Wood was cited in the argument, where a grant by deed not to be distinguished from that in Vice v. Thomas was held to operate not as a lease, but only as a licence to enter and work :—but it was truly answered, that there the Court had only to construe the deed ; here, the Lord Warden had to decide on the interest of the grantee, who had entered and worked and been in possession, which possession he had never abandoned, but by his machinery was still maintaining. And such a case the Court in Doe v. Wood expressly excludes from the effect of its then decision. However, in Doe d. Earl of Falmouth v. Alderson, the defendant in ejectment entered into a consent rule to defend “for a certain tin bound in the parish of — (setting out the abutments) containing a certain mine, &c.” It was objected, and the Court held, that a tin bound as such was not recoverable in ejectment ; and Parke, B. asked the defendant’s counsel why he could not defend for a mine lying within certain bounds called tin bounds ?—evidently having present to his mind the same distinction which had been taken in Doe v. Wood, and was adopted by the Court in Vice v. Thomas, between a mere right to work acquired by bounding, and the interest of a bounder in possession and actually working a mine. This cause—the defendant adopted the suggestion of the Court—went to trial (in the summer of 1846), before Mr. Baron Alderson. It appeared that Lord Falmouth was the owner of the soil,—the land had been bounded,—there was a mine within the bounds,—they had been duly renewed for a period extending as far back as living memory could go, and the mine had formerly been worked by the bound-owners. In 1834, for some months the defendant had attempted to discover ore, but afterwards abandoned the mine and removed his machinery. In 1835, Lord Falmouth granted a set to another party, who entered and worked successfully,—upon whom the defendant entered, and forcibly expelled him. It must be presumed, though it is not stated, that there was in the declaration a demise by Lord Falmouth’s lessee, as Lord Falmouth himself was clearly out of possession by his own grant. At the trial the defendant did not shew himself to be the assignee of the bounds, but his counsel contended that the evidence of outstanding bounds was in itself a defence, as an outstanding term would be, whether the defendant had any interest in them, or claimed under the owner, or not. This of course assumed that the bound-owner’s interest, though he should not be in possession, is a possessory interest, not a mere incorporeal liberty or easement ; and the question thus raised was not presented to the jury. Our Brother Parke says, “The first question is, whether the interest of the bound-owner is such a possessory interest as would enable him to bring ejectment, or whether he has a mere liberty to enter and get the mineral ; the next question is, whether such an interest, if any, was in him at the date of the demise in the declaration ; the interest of the bound-owner depends on the custom, and ought to be found by a jury.”

The case went down to a second trial in the summer of 1837, before my Brother Patteson ; and upon the first point, according to Mr. Smirke’s report, p. 42, (28), he stated the question to be, “whether, by the custom, the bound-owner has only an easement, that is, a right to enter and dig for tin, the possession of the soil and rest of the mine remaining in the lord, or whether he has such an interest and title in the mine that he may, for the purpose of getting tin, exclude the lord from the possession. It is difficult to see how this is to be put as a question of fact, but I am bound to do so : and if it should turn out to be, as I incline to think it is, rather a question of law, the Court above will know how to deal with it.” The jury found that the bound-owner had not a mere easement, but a right to the mine. And the Court was not moved to review this part of the direction ; indeed, the counsel for the defendant scarcely could quarrel with it ; the finding upon it was in their favour, and the verdict in the cause was for the plaintiff on the other question raised in it.

In this case of Doe v. Alderson, it is to be observed that the question did not arise upon any pleading, but upon the effect of evidence—what interest it was that the evidence taken altogether shewed to be actually in the bound-owner ; and this may have been a mixed question of law and fact, and so properly for the jury. In the case before us the plaintiff has expanded the right, which he claims, on the face of the record; and that being so, it must be for the Court to pronounce on its effect. And there can be no doubt that the claim on the face of this declaration not only falls short of asserting any possessory interest in the soil, but wholly excludes it.

Nor can the plaintiff maintain that the bound-owner's right by the custom goes beyond the statement in the declaration,—and yet may prove it,—any more than he who claimed a right of common or a right of way over land could prove either by shewing a title to the land itself; for, as in those cases, although the land-owner may of course consume the herbage, or walk across the land, yet such incidents to the ownership are distinct in law from rights of common or way; so here, the right claimed is claimed as a tenement distinct and complete in itself, and separate from possession of the soil, or ownership. We are very far from saying that the plaintiff has in his declaration narrowed improperly the customary right of the bound-owner, as it stands immediately after the delivery of possession to him by the Stannary bailiff,—and apart from the actual possession and working of a mine. In several of the cases this fact has been relied on by the bound-owner, that possession was awarded upon the completion of the proclamations by the Stannary court, and delivered under a writ of possession. Mr. Smirke, in his careful report of Vice v. Thomas, p. 77 (28), has given us the form of a writ of possession after the third proclamation: it recites the judgment for the owners, “quod recuperent possessionem bundarum sive operis stannarii prædicti, vocati,” &c.; and then commands the bailiff to deliver the possession of the bounds or tin-work in the same words. This, therefore, throws no light on the legal character of the bounds, nor proves that any possession of the land passes. One test, perhaps, may usefully be applied. It is well known that the “stannary” customs, as the name imports, were confined to tin only; copper mining is of comparatively modern introduction into Cornwall; it is now discovered that the two metals are frequently found within the limits of the same work;—but we apprehend that it never has been contended that the boulder, merely as such, working a tin mine, and extracting copper from it with the tin, has any right to the copper. If not to the copper, how can it be argued that he has any right except to the tin which he does extract, and to that which he may extract so long as he remains bound-owner, i. e. so long as those rights which he has first acquired by the custom are preserved to him by the custom, i. e. by his due compliance with all those rules which the custom imposes for their preservation?

This, then, brings us to the point which was more especially contested on the argument—whether this customary right can exist without continuing bond fide to search for tin, and to work the land for mining purposes within the inclosed limits;—whether it is sufficient merely to renew the bounds annually by a new cutting of the turves, as at the commencement. Assuming for the present the validity of the custom, if the bond fide working within the bounds be made a part of it, and assuming that it is a custom, which is to be tried by the tests established by the common law, for ascertaining whether a custom be good or not, it appears to us that without this qualification it cannot be sustained. Customs, especially where they derogate from the general rights of property, must be construed strictly, and, above all things, they must be reasonable. Bounding is a direct interference with the common law rights of property;—it takes from the owner of land, who is unable or unwilling at a particular moment to dig for tin under his waste land, the right to do so, it may be for ever, and vests it in a stranger, making only a customary render in return;—it empowers the stranger not only to extract the mineral from beneath the surface, but to enter on the surface, and cumber it with the machinery, buildings, and refuse stuff, which the operations below occasion,—and all this without the least regard to the convenience or interests of the owner. The only things which make this reasonable are the render of the toll-tin to the owner, and the benefit to the public received thereby in the extraction of the mineral from the bowels of the earth;—both these are not only lost, but the latter, it may be, positively prevented, if the boulder may decline to work, and yet retain the right to exclude the owner. Instead of insuring that the minerals should be brought to the surface, the custom so construed may be made the means of keeping them locked up within it, and at the same time of preventing any improvement on the surface. Many bounds may become the property of the same owners, who may think their interests best served by limiting the supply and diminishing competition,—while the owner will decline to expend his capital on building, or agricultural improvements, because at any moment the bounder may renew his operations, and entirely and without compensation defeat the purposes of his expenditure. If it be said that the public good is best served by that regulated supply which best serves the private interests of the bounder—that whenever it is for the interest of the public that the mine should be worked, the interest of the bounder will be to meet the demand by an adequate supply—and that when the mine is not worked, it is only because it is for the interest equally of both that it should not be,—without admitting or denying the truth of these assertions, one answer is, that where such a state of things has existed so long and so decidedly as to amount to reasonable proof that the original purpose with which the bounds were inclosed has been abandoned, it is unreasonable to maintain the bounds themselves. It may have been that the owner did not inclose the land or work for the mineral himself only on account of a temporary inability, or the temporary existence of the same causes which the bounder now alleges as the ground for his ceasing to work : why, then, is he to lose his earlier and better right for ever, and under the same circumstances the bounder to preserve his? Another answer is drawn from regarding the original purpose of the custom, which was not founded on the doctrine of demand and supply, but on the expediency simply of bringing the mineral to the surface for the use of men. Another, if another be needed, is, that a render of a portion of the mineral to the owner of the land, is part of the consideration on which the bounder's right was originally founded ;—it is part of the compact, without which it may be that the land-owner would never have consented to the bounds ; and it is of course quite independent of such considerations as that of working profitably to the miner.

The condition that the bounds shall be annually renewed by new cutting the turves is useful for keeping the limits well ascertained, and also preserving the evidence of ownership ; but it is no substitute for the working itself, considered as the ground on which the reasonableness of the custom rests.

When the evidence in this case is referred to, the variations and uncertainty in which those are involved, who contend that the bound-owner need not work, strongly favour the conclusion in law to which we have arrived. The jury, indeed, have drawn a conclusion of fact from the whole—which, as such, we should not feel disposed to disturb—for it was their province to draw it from the statements submitted to them. But on reading the report, and finding among other things that there is a conflict among the witnesses who, from professional habits, might have been supposed best able to speak to the point, whether even an annual renewal of the bounds be necessary to preserve the ownership in the bounds, and also that much reliance seems to have been placed on the fact, entirely inconclusive, that owners of lands have in many instances not proceeded as for forfeiture of the bounds, where the mines have not been worked, we see every reason to believe that the unqualified right now claimed is but an abuse of the original limits of the custom, inconsistent with its object, and not to be sustained on any principle.

Thus far we have assumed that the custom, qualified by the condition of bond fide working, is good in law ; but it was strongly argued, that tried by one well-established rule, it could not be sustained. It was said, and truly, that the bounder takes a profit in the soil of another, and that a right to do so cannot by law rest on custom. This doctrine was affirmed in Blewett v. Tregonning, in which the earlier cases from Gateward's case downwards will be found collected. The plea in that case, on which the question arose, was framed evidently with a view to escape from the resolution in Gateward's case ; but the Court would not admit the distinction in fact, and held the plea bad after verdict. But it is a misapplication of the doctrine to apply it to the case now before us—that stands on just, though strictly technical reasoning, which may be well collected from the judgment in

Day v. Savage (29). That which is matter of interest, as the taking a profit from the soil, must for its existence have some person in whom it is ; and a flux body, which has no entirety or permanence, cannot take that interest, which by the supposition is immemorial and permanent, because from its nature it cannot prescribe for anything. Necessity, however, will controul this. The case of common of pasture exemplifies both the rule and the exception. In itself it is an interest—it is the taking a profit from the soil—it is properly matter of prescription. If the copyholders of one manor will claim it in the wastes of another, they must, because they can, do so, by prescribing in the name of their lord, who, in the eye of the law, by reason of his estate has such a permanence as enables him to prescribe ; but if they claim it in his wastes, they cannot prescribe in their own names and rights, by reason of the want of permanence, nor can they in their lord's name, for he cannot claim common in his own land ; they are, therefore, from necessity allowed to claim it by custom. But what is the necessity ?—that growing out of the original compact, when they received permission to cultivate for their own benefit, and on condition of certain services, certain portions of the lord's land ;—that compact included the right of commoning on the lord's waste, and the law will not suffer that right to want a legal character, and so be without the means of its legal enforcement, though at the expense of strict legal reasoning. In the same way the right now in question must have originated in each instance in a virtual contract ;—the owner has permitted the tinner to enter and work, when he will not work himself, or devote his waste exclusively to other purposes by inclosure, on the condition that the tinner shall render to him a certain portion, fixed by custom, of the produce of the mine. Here, as in the instance of a common, the thing is in its nature to be claimed by prescription only, but they who have it, and ought to have it in justice, cannot prescribe for it ;—from necessity, therefore, that the undoubted right may not be defeated, they shall be allowed to claim it by custom.

Having arrived at this conclusion, we have only to consider the remaining point made by the plaintiff, that bounding was not to be tried merely as a custom limited in local extent, and as an exception on the general rules of the common law ; but as the local law of a distinct and extensive district, having its origin, it may be, earlier than the time when Cornwall became a part of England, or subject to its general laws. This point was argued, with much learning and ingenuity, by Mr. Smirke ; but we think his argument failed in respect of such historical certainty in fact, as is necessary to build any legal conclusions on ; further, assuming that difficulty overcome, we think it failed in legal authority. We have already observed in the commencement of our judgment, that in the case of mines, no distinction was made between a mineral tract in Cumberland and one in Devon or Cornwall—nor any between the stannaries in those two counties—the law as to the former was gathered from the precedents as to the latter. Whatever local usages may have prevailed in ages too distant for history or the legal antiquary to trace their records with certainty, Cornwall has been for so many centuries dealt with as parcel of the kingdom of England, that they must now, and can only in English courts of justice be dealt with according to the principles of the common law. This does not in any way conflict with our allowance of such local laws as gavelkind, or borough English, or tenant right : such as these we try by ordinary principles, and, having regard to their origin we find them not unreasonable. And so with the usages in mineral districts, not alone in Cornwall, but the King's Field in Derbyshire, Dean Forest, and others, have theirs, and they will be allowed ; their reasonableness being tried by tests the same, not in fact, but in principle, as we should apply to other local usages,—by a reference to their history, origin, and the local peculiarities on which they are to operate.

But even had it been clear that bounding was a law of Cornwall before it was parcel of England, yet there are authorities to shew that we could deal with it only on the same general principles which we apply to the testing of other customs, those we have just mentioned. An instance of this sort is to be found in Vin.

Abr. 'Customs,' H, fol. 10, which will be found in the Year Book, 34 Hen. 6. p. 27, of a custom in the Isle of Man, not indeed in judgment there, but which shews the manner in which English Judges reasoned upon such customs as to their lawfulness. But a case precisely in point is the celebrated one of Tanistry in Davis's Reports, p. 28, where the custom of descent, though of undoubted antiquity, anterior to the introduction of the English law, was reasoned upon and finally decided against on the principles of English law, because uncertain.

The ground of inconvenience, which might result from our decision in favour of the defendant, was not much pressed in the argument before us; but we collect from the report, that it appeared in evidence that tin bounds had for a considerable period been made the subject of conveyance, settlement, and devise; and it is possible, therefore, that inconvenience may result where there has been such a neglect of working as to forfeit the title to them. We have not been insensible to this, and have given it our consideration; but it has not appeared to us to warrant a change in our conclusion, which ought to rest on legal grounds only: if the inconvenience be so great as may be apprehended, it is better that it should be remedied by the legislature than be made a reason for our coming to a conclusion which those grounds will not warrant. We do not apprehend, however, any real inconvenience; nothing that we have said compels the bounder to strictly continuous working,—such reasonable time for consideration, preparation, and due selection of plans and planes must always be allowed, as the nature of the undertaking reasonably requires; and when he has once bona fide worked, his ceasing to work for a time will be, therefore, open to explanation, so as to prevent forfeiture. It is only when the conduct of the bounder is such as to warrant the conclusion that he has ceased to be in good faith pursuing that object which alone justified his entry on the land, and which is the reasonable foundation of his title. The present is such a case: we understand it to be admitted that for many years the bounder has ceased to work, and cannot succeed unless the custom unqualified according to the statement in the commencement of our judgment, can be sustained. We are of opinion that it cannot; and therefore, our judgment must be, that a nonsuit be entered according to the leave reserved.

Nov. 17.

PARKER v. BAYLEY.

Insolvent—7 & 8 Vict. c. 96.—Refusal of Final Order—Fresh Execution upon same Judgment—Form of Process—Irregularity.

The defendant, who had been taken in execution upon a judgment, having obtained an interim order for his protection from process, under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, afterwards attended upon his first examination before the commissioner, who dismissed his petition under the 24th section, upon the ground of a debt having been fraudulently contracted. The defendant not being then in custody, the commissioner did not make any order remanding the defendant to his former custody, and the defendant therefore went at large. He was afterwards, on the 20th of August, taken in execution upon a fresh ca. sa. in the usual form upon the same judgment. Upon motion made on the 6th of November to set aside this writ, and to discharge the defendant out of custody,—Held, first, that under the 6th section of the above statute the plaintiff was authorized in taking the defendant in execution upon the same judgment. Secondly, that if there was any irregularity in the form of the process, the application to set it aside on that ground was made too late.

Semble—First, that such was the correct form of process to use. Secondly, that under the circumstances the commissioner had power to make an order remanding the defendant to his former custody.

The defendant in this case had been taken in execution upon a judgment recovered in this action, upon the 27th of June 1844.

On the 9th of September in the same year, the defendant filed his petition and schedule in the Court of Bankruptcy, under section 6. of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, and obtained his discharge, and an interim order for his protection from process. The 16th of October following was the day appointed for his first examination before the commissioner, and on the 15th of October an agreement in writing, but not under seal, was prepared by the defendant's attorney, by which the defendant proposed to covenant with his creditors generally that he should pay into the hands of the official assignee appointed to act in the matter of the petition, the weekly sum of 5*l.*, &c. This paper writing concluded thus: "We, the creditors of the said F. W. N. B. (the defendant) whose names are hereunto affixed, do hereby severally and respectively, and as our several and respective act and agreement, testify and declare our consent to and acceptance of the said proposal and agreement, and that we will, when so requested, sign, seal, and execute unto the said F. W. N. B. any further act or document that may be considered requisite for the carrying into permanent effect the aforesaid arrangement." Then followed the signatures of several of the creditors, the plaintiff amongst others. The defendant however never signed the document, and it was unstamped. On the 16th of October the defendant was opposed by a creditor who had not signed the above, upon the ground that the debt with him had been contracted by the defendant fraudulently; and this being proved to the satisfaction of the commissioner, he dismissed the defendant's petition upon that ground, and refused to make a final order. The defendant not having been brought up in custody was allowed, after this adjudication, to depart; and he remained at large until the 28th of August in the present year, when he was again taken into execution, upon a fresh writ of ca. sa. upon the same judgment.

On the 9th of September following a summons was taken out at chambers, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the defendant should not be discharged out of custody, he having been previously taken in execution upon the said debt, and discharged by consent; but the learned Judge before whom it was attended refused to make any order. On the 16th of September, another summons was taken out, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the writ of ca. sa. should not be set aside for irregularity, and why the defendant should not be discharged out of custody, &c. This summons was attended before the same learned Judge, and dismissed with costs. The defendant's affidavits were silent as to there having been any application to a Judge at chambers at all; but the above facts appeared in the plaintiff's affidavits. On the fifth day of term this Court was moved, and a rule nisi granted in the same terms as contained in the last-mentioned summons.

Bovill shewed cause.—This execution is perfectly regular. The 6th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. expressly provides, "that after the time allowed by the interim order has expired, the defendant may again be taken in execution upon the judgment." The commissioner perhaps had jurisdiction to remand the defendant back to custody, and to make an order for such purpose, when, upon the ground of fraud, he had dismissed the defendant's petition under the 24th section; but not having done so the plaintiff was at liberty again to arrest him, and a fresh writ of ca. sa. was the proper form of process. The second execution is the creation of the act of parliament, and the 6th section does not require either an alias ca. sa. or a scire facias; nor is any express mode of arrest given by that section. With respect to the agreement, it amounts to nothing; it is not under seal, it is unstamped, not signed by the defendant, and as soon as the defendant had his final order refused him, became altogether inoperative. Secondly, if there is any irregularity in the form of process, the application to set it aside has been made too late. It does not appear by the defendant's affidavits that there had been any summons taken out and attended at chambers so as to explain the delay. This is a fatal objection—Goren v. Tute (1). Again, by the plaintiff's affidavits it appears that this matter has been twice heard before the same Judge at chambers; the defendant therefore has already exercised his right of appeal against the first order—Thompson v. Becke (2).

Charnock, contrà.—The ca. sa. upon which the defendant was arrested, and is now in custody, is a nullity. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. prescribes one mode only by which a defendant under the circumstances of this case can be again taken in execution; and that is by an order of the commissioner under the 24th section, which provides, "that in every such case wherein any such petitioner shall have been a prisoner in execution, and discharged out of custody by order of the commissioner, &c. such petitioner shall be remanded by an order of the commissioner to his former custody"—Ex parte Partington (3). Not having pursued that course, the plaintiff had no power whatever to take the defendant under a ca. sa. Secondly, if he had that power the form of writ was irregular; it should have recited all the circumstances of the case. There has been no delay sufficient to prevent the defendant taking this objection.

PATTESON, J.—There is no difficulty in this case. It is quite clear that the petition of the defendant was not dismissed upon the ground of any arrangement having been come to between the defendant and his detaining creditors. Doubtless, the agreement in question was prepared by the defendant to induce the commissioner to accede to the proposal contained in it; but when the defendant appeared upon his first examination the commissioner refused to be a party to any such arrangement, being satisfied that a debt contracted by the defendant with an opposing creditor had been contracted fraudulently, and he refused the defendant his final order expressly upon that ground. I think that the commissioner might then, under the 24th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, have made an order remanding the insolvent, although he was not then brought up in custody; and perhaps that would have been the better course to have pursued: he did not, however, make any such order. But the 6th section provides, "that after the term allowed by any such interim order, or any renewal thereof (as the case may be), shall have elapsed, such petitioner shall not by such discharge be protected from being again taken in execution upon such judgment, but such judgment shall remain in full force and effect notwithstanding such discharge." It is said that the statute does not provide any particular mode in which this enactment is to be carried into effect. Although that may be the case, still this Court will give effect to the terms of the statute, and by some form of process or other carry out its enactments. The case most analogous to the present is that of an escape; and there if a defendant taken in execution upon a ca. sa. escape, the sheriff may again arrest him upon another ca. sa. upon the same judgment. A scire facias is not necessary in this case, for this writ is applicable only when a year and a day have elapsed without any execution of the judgment having been had; here the defendant had been taken in execution. It appears to me, therefore, that the issuing of a fresh writ of ca. sa. was the right course to pursue. But if it were necessary that the writ should have set out all the circumstances of the case, that is ground only of irregularity; and then the defendant has come too late to set it aside, for it has been expressly decided by the Court of Exchequer, in the case of Goren v. Tute, that unless it appear by the defendant's affidavits that an application has been already made to chambers so as to account for the delay, this Court cannot take notice that such application has been made. Upon this point the defendant's affidavits are altogether silent; and I must therefore take it that no step was taken to set aside this writ from the 28th of August to the 6th of November. Upon the ground, therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled under the 6th section to issue this writ of ca. sa., and that if there has been any irregularity in the form adopted that has been waived, I think that this rule must be discharged, and with costs.

1847.
Nov. 25.

Sequestration — Sequestrari Facias — Amendment—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 17.—Interest on Judgment.

In 1834 a writ of sequestration was sued out by the plaintiffs, indorsed to levy the amount of the judgment debt recovered; in 1838, the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. was passed, by the 66th section of which judgments are to carry interest; in 1839 other execution creditors of the defendant lodged writs of sequestration with the Bishop. Under these circumstances, the Court refused to grant an application of the plaintiffs, that their writ of sequestration should be amended by a claim for interest since 1838 being indorsed thereon.

Quære—Whether, under the writ as it stood, the Bishop would be bound to satisfy the plaintiffs this interest.

The plaintiffs in this case, having, in the year 1834, recovered a judgment for 2,270*l.* against the defendant, a beneficed clerk, sued out a writ of sequestrari facias, directed to the Bishop of Peterborough, and indorsed, to levy the amount of the debt. On the 16th of August 1838, the statute, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, was passed, by the 17th section of which it was enacted, "that every judgment debt should carry interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum, from the time of entering up the judgment, or from the commencement of this act in cases of judgment then entered up and not carrying interest, until the same shall be satisfied, and such interest may be levied under a writ of execution on such judgment." On the 2nd of December 1839, the Bishop received a writ, at the suit of another execution creditor, for a debt of 1,140*l.*; on the same day another writ for a debt of 614*l.*; and on the 28th of December 1839, and the 5th of December 1840, two further writs, at the suit of other creditors. The full amount of the debt had not yet been levied under the first writ. In the early part of this term a rule nisi had been obtained on the part of the plaintiffs calling upon the Bishop of Peterborough and the defendant to shew cause why the writ of sequestrari facias should not be handed to the plaintiffs or their attorney, in order that the claim for interest upon the said judgment, since the 1st of October 1838, might be indorsed thereon.

Bovill, for the Bishop of Peterborough, now shewed cause.—It is a fatal objection to this application that the four other execution creditors have not been brought here; their rights would be affected materially if this rule were made absolute. From what period is the proposed indorsement to take effect? If it is to take effect from the date of the original writ, it would be illegal, for at that time no interest upon a judgment could be levied; if specially indorsed, as of the present date, and authorizing the Bishop to levy interest as from the 1st of October 1838, it would over-ride the claims of the other creditors. The course for the plaintiffs to have adopted was upon the passing of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. to have ruled the Bishop to return the writ; and, after such return had been made, to have issued a fresh writ, indorsed to levy so much of the debt as remained unsatisfied, together with the amount of interest claimed.

Aspinall appeared for the defendant.

Phipson, in support of the rule.—Undoubtedly the claims of the other execution creditors will be displaced if this application is granted; but that is the necessary effect of the 17th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. They take their rights under the respective writs which they have issued, subject to the right of the plaintiffs, as altered by that statute. There has been no abandonment by the plaintiffs of their right to interest; for at the time of the writ issued, under which they claim, they had no power to indorse upon it a direction to levy interest. It is submitted, that so long as such writ is in force, as it appears the present is, this application should be granted. It is an application in case of the Bishop, for it may be that he is bound to satisfy the plaintiffs their claim for interest under the writ as it stands.

ERLE, J.—My opinion is that I ought not to make this rule absolute. The question does not arise, and, therefore, it would be extrajudicial in me to give any opinion upon the point, whether, under the writ as it now stands, the Bishop is bound to satisfy the plaintiffs their interest upon the judgment. But I think, that, if in the year 1847 I ordered a writ, sued out in 1834, to be altered by an indorsement to levy interest being made upon it, I should in effect be issuing a new writ, which would take priority over those which have been in the hands of the Bishop since the years 1839 and 1840; for each of the parties who sued out those writs has taken an interest in the rents and profits of the defendant's benefice, subject only to the original rights of the first sequestrator. I have the less scruple in discharging this rule, because when the act of parliament passed the duty of the plaintiffs was either to have caused the writ to have been then amended, or to have ruled the Bishop to return it, and have then sued out a fresh writ for the debt remaining due, and the amount of interest claimed. For these reasons, I think that I ought to leave the plaintiff to enforce his claim as he best may, without specially interfering on his behalf in the matter.

Rule discharged.

BAIL COURT.
1847. } BROWNE v. BURTON.
Nov. 24; Dec. 12. }

Deed, Execution of—Warrant of Attorney—Fraudulent Preference.

A deed or other writing speaks from its execution, and not from the day of its date.

Where, therefore, a warrant of attorney, bearing date the 24th of February 1847, was executed by the defendant upon the 20th of March in the same year, and the defeasance stated that the warrant of attorney was given to secure payment of the money "on the 20th day of March next," it was held, that such payment did not become due until the 20th of March 1848, and execution having issued previous to that time, it was set aside.

Upon motion, by the assignees, to set aside a warrant of attorney given by the bankrupt, the Court will not enter upon the question, whether the same was given by way of fraudulent preference.

In this case a warrant of attorney, bearing date the 24th of February 1847, was executed by the defendant on the 20th of March. By the defeasance it appeared that the warrant of attorney was given to secure the payment of "the sum of 285*l.* on the 20th day of March next, with lawful interest for the same, from the date hereof." After the defendant had executed the warrant of attorney, he retained it in his possession until the 29th of March, when he delivered it to the plaintiff. On the 30th of March judgment was entered up, and execution forthwith issued for the said sum of 285*l.* On the 19th of April the defendant became bankrupt. On the 10th of November a rule nisi was obtained on the part of the defendant's assignees, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the above-mentioned warrant of attorney and all subsequent proceedings should not be set aside upon the grounds—first, that the execution had issued too soon; second, that, according to the facts sworn to in the affidavits, execution had issued for too much; third, that according to those facts, the warrant of attorney had been given voluntarily and by way of fraudulent preference.

Barstow shewed cause.—First, it is submitted that it sufficiently appears from the defeasance, that the 20th of March, upon which the money was to be paid, was the 20th of March 1847. Secondly, it is admitted, that at the time the warrant of attorney was given only 10*l.* was due, and the execution, therefore, can only stand for so much; but that is no ground for setting aside the execution altogether. Thirdly, as to the third ground, it is one which the Court will not decide upon affidavits.

Prideaux, in support of the rule.—First, the execution was clearly issued too soon. A deed speaks from the time of its execution, and not from the day of its date. There was no power, therefore, to the plaintiff to enter up judgment and issue execution until the 20th of March 1848—Clayton's case (1), Oshey v. Hicks (2), Hall v. Cazenove (3), Steele v. Mart (4). Secondly, execution having been wilfully issued for too much, the Court will set it aside altogether. An amendment is only allowed to be made when the execution has issued for too much by mistake—Tilby v. Best (5), M'Cormack v. Melton (6). Thirdly, if the Court think that upon this point a fair doubt exists, then certainly it is a question for a jury.

[Barstow, upon the second point, begged to refer to the case of Williams v. Waring (7).]

Dec. 12.—PATTERSON, J. now delivered judgment.—One of the objections in this case was, that the execution was issued too soon; that the defeasance stating the warrant of attorney to be for securing payment "of 285*l.* on the 20th of March next, with lawful interest for the same, from the date hereof," and the warrant of attorney being executed on the 20th of March 1847, the principal money was not payable till the 20th of March 1848. If the warrant of attorney had on the face of it borne date the 20th of March 1847, that would undoubtedly have been so; and the question is, whether the circumstance of the date apparent on the face of the instrument being the 24th of February 1847, makes any difference. Now, the rule uniformly acted upon from the time of Clayton's case to the present day is, that a deed or other writing must be taken to speak from the time of the execution, and not from the date apparent on the face of it. That date is indeed to be taken prima facie as the true time of execution; but as soon as the contrary appears, the apparent date is to be utterly disregarded. Steele v. Mari is precisely in point. It is to be observed here, that by the language of the defeasance the principal was not to be paid on the very day of the execution of the instrument, for it provides for payment of interest "from the date hereof." Neither was this warrant of attorney, although executed on the 20th of March, delivered to the plaintiff until the 29th, nine days after the time when it is contended the principal secured by it had become due. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the rule of law is clear; that the 20th of March, mentioned in the defeasance, must be taken to be the 20th of March 1848, whatever may have been the intention of the parties; and that the execution being premature, the rule to set it aside must be made absolute, but not to set aside either the warrant of attorney itself or the judgment; and without costs, because the rule asks for too much. I am of opinion that I cannot enter into the question of fraudulent preference; and that, as to the excess in the execution, if good at all, the execution would only be set aside pro tanto.

The official assignee of an insolvent appointed under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. s. 1. may immediately on his appointment sue in his own name for an outstanding debt due to the insolvent; and the insolvent after such appointment cannot sue for it.

As witness my hand, this 9th of March, A.D. 1843. William Sayer (meaning the plaintiff). Witness," &c. That after the giving of such notice, and before the presenting of such petition, the plaintiff caused the same notice to be inserted twice, to wit, once on the 9th of March, A.D. 1843, and a second time on the 12th of March, A.D. 1843, in the London Gazette, and twice, to wit, once on each of the days and times last aforesaid, in a newspaper, at those times respectively circulating in the county of Middlesex, to wit, a newspaper called the Morning Post; that for and during the period of twelve calendar months next before, and at each of the said times respectively, of giving the said notice, and of causing the same to be inserted in the said gazettes and newspapers, the plaintiff had resided and did reside within the said county of Middlesex, and within the district in the said first-mentioned act mentioned and described as the London district, and that the plaintiff was not at any of the times of the giving or inserting of any of the said notices, or at the time of the presenting of the said petition, or at any time a trader within the meaning of the statutes at the time of the passing of the said first-mentioned act, or at any time in force relating to bankrupts; that afterwards and before the commencement of this suit, and before the passing of the said secondly-mentioned act, to wit, on the 16th of March, A.D. 1843, the said petition was filed in the said Court of Bankruptcy in due form of law, and according to the directions and provisions in that behalf of the said first-mentioned act; that upon the filing of the said petition, and before the commencement of this suit, and before the passing of the said secondly-mentioned act, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, John Herman Merivale, Esq., then being the Commissioner in rotation of the said Court of Bankruptcy, who, by an order of the said Court, theretofore, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, in that behalf made by the said Court, according to the directions and provisions of the said first-mentioned act, was appointed by the said Court to hear the matter of such petition, and to whom, by the said order of the said Court, the said petition was referred by an order of him, the said John Herman Merivale, then in that behalf made by the said J. H. M., in the matter of the said petition, gave to the plaintiff protection from all process whatever, either against his person or his property of every description, and by which said order the said J. H. M. then being such commissioner, directed and ordered that such protection was to continue in force, and that all process, except process for arresting or holding to bail under the authority of a Judge's order for that purpose, was to be stayed until the 28th of April, A.D. 1843, at two o'clock in the afternoon, being the time appointed for the appearance of the plaintiff at the said Court of Bankruptcy, in Basinghall Street, London, and for the final examination of the plaintiff, according to the form of the said first-mentioned act. And the defendant further says, that on the presentation of the said petition, and before the commencement of this suit, and before the passing of the said secondly-mentioned act, to wit, on the 10th of March, A.D. 1843, the said John Herman Merivale then being such Commissioner of the said Court of Bankruptcy so appointed to hear the matter of the said petition, in due form of law, and according to the directions and provisions of the said first-mentioned act, nominated and appointed George Green, then being an official assignee of the said Court of Bankruptcy, to be the official assignee of the estate and effects of the plaintiff, according to the true intent and meaning of the said first-mentioned act, and the provisions thereof in that behalf; that the said George Green always, from the time of the making of the said order, had been and still is the official assignee of the estate and effects of the plaintiff, and to all intents and purposes the sole assignee of the estate and effects of the plaintiff. Verification.

Special demurrer;—the point in the margin being that the plea did not shew that the estate of the plaintiff was vested in the assignee, in such a manner as to prevent the plaintiff from suing in this action, or that the official assignee ever interfered with or laid claim to the causes of action now sought to be recovered. (There were other special grounds of demurrer, shortly noticed in the argument.)

Joinder in demurrer.

Hawkins, in support of the demurrer.—Though the assignee takes all the insolvent's property, yet as the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. s. 1. does not confer, by express words, on the assignee any power to sue in his own name for debts due to the insolvent, this action is properly brought in the name of the insolvent. The statute (section 1.) vests in the assignee only "so much as can be obtained without suit."

[COLERIDGE, J.—Everything is vested in him; but he is only to take possession of that which can be got in without suit. I do not see why the fact, if it were so, that the plaintiff was suing on behalf of the assignees, might not have been replied. If all interest has passed out of the plaintiff, is he entitled to recover? Suppose there were a chattel, could the plaintiff succeed on the issue of Not possessed?]

Perhaps not; the right of possession of chattels is expressly given. The 7th section has the word "credit" for the first time, and also empowers the assignees to sue in their own names.

[COLERIDGE, J.—Suppose, between the first and final order, the insolvent brought an action, what is to become of it?]

This is such a case; it is casus omissus.

[COLERIDGE, J.—May not the 1st and 7th section be reconciled in this way—the official assignee is to get the insolvent's goods into possession before the final order, and afterwards to sue for debts due to him, but yet no power is in the insolvent himself to sue? Suppose a chattel of the insolvent at Dublin, in the hands of a third party: that in strictness might be something which is not recoverable without suit: is the insolvent to take it with or without suit?]

Perhaps a plea of not possessed might defeat the insolvent's action, but a chose in action is a different thing. If the insolvent's assignee sued on a deed, and it were pleaded that all interest had been assigned to a third party, the plea would be bad, and the plaintiff could not be called on to shew by replication that the action was brought for the benefit of the third party.

[PATERSON, J.—I see that one of the grounds of demurrer is, that the plea does not state that the action is not brought by the assignee in the insolvent's name.]

The insolvent might, for anything that appears, release the debt, and the statute does not make the payment to the assignee any discharge as against the insolvent. If no power is given to the assignee to sue, and as the act of parliament could not have intended that no one should sue, the right of action must remain in the insolvent. In Jeffery v. M'Taggart (1), the words were, "the whole estate and effects;" and Lord Ellenborough held that they did not convey to the assignee a right of suit. The plea is also bad in form; first, for not stating that there were any creditors; secondly, for not saying that the notice given by the insolvent was after the passing of the act; thirdly, for not shewing that the hearing was advertised in pursuance of the notice; fourthly, it does not shew any confirmation of the appointment of the assignee, or that the commissioner was still acting when the official assignee was appointed.

T. Jones, contra.—The stat. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. s. 1. vests in the official assignee of the insolvent all "his estate and effects;" the whole question is, whether those words include debts due to him. Now, the word "effects" is at least as comprehensive as "personal estate." And Wright v. Fairfield (2) is an express authority that the words "all the personal estate" would give the assignee the right to sue for damages. Then, if the plea primâ facie shews matter impeaching the plaintiff's right to sue, from whom should the statement come of matter which negatives the presumption that the action is brought by the insolvent for his own benefit? The rule of pleading is, that the averment of material matter must come from the party in whose knowledge it is—Winch v. Keeley (3), Dangerfield v. Thomas (4). Smith v. Coffin (5) was a real action. Then as to the formal objection: the notice is in the form given by the schedule, and must be taken to have been after the petition. As to the remaining objections, it is enough to say that everything necessary to give the commissioner jurisdiction is shewn.

Hawkins, in reply.—There is nothing to give the assignee a right to sue in his own name. In Wright v. Fairfield, the words were "present and future personal estate."

The word "future" points at something which may be recovered.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—What is to become of the property in the mean time? The object of the Insolvent Act is to preserve the property for the creditors; allowing the insolvent to sue would not promote that. Wright v. Fairfield is clearly against you.]

But the words "without such," which occur here, operate to shut out the assignee from a right of action in a case like the present. It could not be necessary to reply specially, when the plaintiff shews a good right of action. It does not follow that a payment to the assignee might not be a good payment.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. (after stating the pleadings).—It appears that the plea sets out all the particulars required to bring the plaintiff within the act of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and the appointment of the official assignee; and that is all that is necessary to be stated. I think all the objections in point of form were got rid of during the argument, except that which arises on the month's notice; and there really is nothing in that. The real question is as to the plaintiff's right to sue. Is the plea then in substance an answer? I think it is. I think the 1st section deprives the insolvent of all right to the debt, and of the power of suing for it. Such power cannot be in two persons at the same time; and the 1st section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. provides that "on the presentation of the petition all the estate and effects of the petitioner shall forthwith become vested in the official assignee, who shall take possession of so much thereof as can be reasonably obtained and possessed without suit, and shall hold and stand possessed of the same in like manner as official assignees hold and possess estates and effects under and by virtue of the statute relating to bankrupts." It is contended, that though, by the words of the act, the estate and effects of the insolvent vested in the official assignee, yet as he is only to take possession of so much as may be got in without suit, he cannot sue for that which is not reduced into possession. But I think that this is to make an unreasonable use of words in themselves not very reasonable. It seems to me that the direction given by them to the assignee is superfluous ; they have no more meaning than this : that the assignee is to get possession of all that he can, but are not meant to take away the right to sue. But, further, as the section proceeds to give the official assignee the same power as the official assignee under the Bankrupt Act, we must refer to the Bankrupt Act ; and Wright v. Fairfield is a distinct decision as to the nature of the possession of the assignees by virtue of it. The words " estate and effects " are, at least, as strong as " personal estate," which were the words there. In that case, Parke, J., though he does not take the same view as the other Judges, yet fully concurs in the judgment. Arguments have been ingeniously raised on the 7th section, which, by direct words, gives the official assignee and creditors' assignee the power of suit, after final order ; but if the 4th section had already done its work, we are not to limit the rights conferred by it, by reason of stronger words in a subsequent section, unless we have reason to think that the necessary meaning and construction is to take the right away.

An answer has been attempted on the ground of inconvenience ; but whatever weight may be given to that, we are not to decide that a man is not to sue for that which belongs to him ; and there would, on the other hand, be great inconvenience in allowing the bankrupt to sue, to the exclusion of his creditors. I think, then, that the insolvent could not reply that he sues on any particular ground, but is deprived of all right of suit.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is, whether a chose in action is taken out of the insolvent by the operation of the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. s. 1 ; secondly, if the official assignee can sue for it in his own name. The words used in that section are " estate and effects." It is important to remove all doubt as to their meaning ; and it is most convenient to hold that the official assignee should not wait for the consent of the insolvent in order to bring an action for a debt due to him. Now, the statute 1 Will. 4. c. 56. was not the statute which first created assignees ; that statute refers to the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. The words used in that statute were held to include all that the bankrupt could sue for. The word " future " does not carry the matter further, as that can only refer to after-acquired property ; and if the right of action would have passed to the assignee under the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. Reliance has been placed on the 7th section, but, I think, nothing more is intended than is mentioned in the 1st section. It is said the words " shall become vested " shew that they were not considered vested before ; but it is clear that that was not the meaning of the act, and the words " shall become vested " are also in the 1st section. The question is then clear on the act of parliament. If estate and effects include choses in action, it is difficult to apply the words " without suit." Suppose a debt owing to the insolvent by a third person, what is to be done with it ? Is not the official assignee entitled to it, though it might be one which was not reasonably expected to be got without suit ? or is the insolvent immediately to sue for it ? These considerations, I think, dispose of the second question. I give no opinion on the necessity or form of replication, but I think the plea good.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I think it unnecessary to give my views of the construction of the clauses of the Bankrupt Acts at any length, as I fully agree with my Lord and my Brother Coleridge. The substance of the plea is, that the plaintiff cannot sue, because the right of action is vested in another ; and the policy of the act of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, as well as of the other bankrupt and insolvent acts, is, that the bankrupt or insolvent shall not sue in his own name, unless for the benefit of his estate. If he could sue in his own name, especially when we consider that a month is to elapse before a final order is made, the creditors would probably find that very little was then left to be sued for. If there is anything in the argument on the part of the plaintiff, it would come to this, that if the insolvent's goods were in the hands of a third person, who refused to deliver them to the official assignee, he could not bring an action for them.

Dec. 4. } GENT v. CUTTS.

Replevin Bond—Condition to prosecute without Delay—Breach.

Debt on a replevin bond. The declaration stated a removal of the plaintiff into the superior court, on the 2nd of November, and a declaration in replevin on the 30th of April; an avowry, on the 9th of July; and the death of the plaintiff in replevin on the 16th of November; and charged as a breach that J. S. (the plaintiff in replevin) did not prosecute his suit without delay; but, on the contrary, delayed the prosecution of the said action for an unreasonable time, and until the said J. S. long after a reasonable time had elapsed for the trial, died before issue joined. This breach was traversed modo et formâ:—Held, that the plaintiff was at liberty, under this issue, to shew a delay in the proceedings prior to the delivery of the declaration.

Held, also, that the condition to prosecute without delay may be broken by a delay which does not exceed the time for proceeding allowed by the practice of the superior courts.

The declaration recited the bond taken by the sheriff, from J. Simpson, the tenant, and the present defendant, conditioned in the usual form, that the tenant “should appear at the next county court, and then and there enter his plaint, and prosecute his suit with effect, and without delay.” It then stated the delivery of the goods to Simpson, who, at the next county court, levied his plaint against the now plaintiff, and two others, for taking and detaining his goods, &c., which plaint was afterwards duly removed by Simpson into the Court of Exchequer, by writ of re. fa. lo. returnable on the 2nd of November 1843; that, afterwards, to wit, on the 30th of April 1844, Simpson declared in replevin against the now plaintiff and others his bailiffs, and that, afterwards, to wit, on the 9th of July 1844, the now plaintiff avowed taking the goods as a distress for rent, &c. Breach, that Simpson did not prosecute his aforesaid suit in the Exchequer without delay, but, on the contrary, delayed the prosecution thereof for a long and unreasonable time, and until the said Simpson long after a reasonable time had elapsed for the trial and determination of the said action, to wit, on &c., died before issue joined in the said action, whereby plaintiff was wholly prevented from obtaining a return of the said goods and chattels, which he might, ought, and otherwise would have obtained, and whereby the said bond became forfeited. Averment, that the sheriffs duly assigned the said bond to the plaintiff.

Pleas, first, that Simpson did not delay the prosecution of the said action for an unreasonable space of time, modo et formâ. Secondly, non est factum. Issues thereon.

The cause was tried, before Erle, J., at the sittings in Middlesex, after Michaelmas term 1846, when it appeared that the goods were replevied, and the bond given on the 29th of August 1843; that the plaint was removed into the Exchequer by re. fa. lo. issued on the 7th of September, returnable on the 2nd of November 1843, and that the present plaintiff, and the others, who were defendants in that action, appeared on the 1st of November 1843. On the 29th of February 1844, Simpson was ruled to declare; and, on the 13th of March, he obtained time to declare, until after delivery of copies of documents, in other actions, in respect of the same distress. Orders for further time were subsequently made, and ultimately, on the 25th of April, an order was made for Simpson to declare peremptorily, on the 30th of April, on which day the declaration was filed. The defendant in replevin avowed, on the 9th of July 1844, which was too late to enable the cause to be tried at the Summer Assizes; and on the 16th of November 1844, Simpson died. It was contended for the defendant in this action, that the plaintiff was, under the first issue, bound to prove a delay by Simpson subsequently to the delivery of the avowry. The learned Judge was of opinion that the declaration charged delay generally, and left the question whether there had been any unreasonable delay to the jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiff. In the ensuing term, Willes obtained a rule, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why there should not be a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and cited Harris v. Mantle (1), Seal v. Phillips (2).

Bovill and Wise now shewed cause.—This record does not admit that there was no delay prior to the declaration, but it states the facts which occurred and charges delay generally. The breach is, that Simpson delayed "the prosecution of the suit," not merely the delivery of the pleas in bar. If so, there was clearly a delay from the 2nd of November to the 30th of April, and again from the 9th of July to the 16th of November, and the jury were rightly asked whether these intervals were unreasonable. It cannot be necessary for the defendant in a replevin suit to non pros. the plaintiff, in order to enable him to proceed for a breach of the bond in delaying proceedings. Perreau v. Bevan (3) was cited.

Willes, in support of the rule.—The delay charged by this declaration can only be a delay which occurred subsequently to the 9th of July. The declaration omits any statement of an appearance by the defendant in the replevin suit. This shews what the meaning of it is. The general allegation of delay is controuled by the subsequent words, "on the contrary thereof, delayed the prosecution for a long and unreasonable time, and until the said Simpson, long after a reasonable time had elapsed for the trial, died"; that confines the plaintiff strictly to what occurred after the avowry. But no sufficient delay was in fact proved. The interval between the 13th of March and the 30th of April is accounted for by the Judge's orders, and cannot be included in the computation of time against this defendant. By the practice of the Court the plaintiff was not compelled to declare within Michaelmas term; and even if he had declared in vacation, and the defendant had avowed, and the plaintiff had pleaded in bar before Hilary term, the plaintiff could not have been compelled, according to the practice of the Court, to try before the Summer assizes.

The meaning of the condition is, that Simpson should bring the suit to a termination within a reasonable period, not that he should deliver any particular proceeding within a reasonable time. If he had omitted to declare until so late a time that the cause could not go to trial at the Summer assizes, that would be a breach; but it is not the case here.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I think there was no misdirection in the way my learned Brother left the case to the jury.

COLERIDGE, J.—The issue taken is, whether Simpson delayed the prosecution of the suit for an unreasonable time; and the point made is, whether evidence of a delay in declaring was admissible under that issue; and I think it was; and that, such evidence being given and unexplained, the jury were right in their verdict. It is quite beside the question whether the declaration is technically framed or not. Reliance is placed on the practice of the Court as to the time for taking the different steps; but that does not, I think, affect the right to recover on the condition of the bond. The rules of practice are pointed to actions in general, but circumstances may render a period unreasonable in one instance which would be perfectly reasonable in another.

ERLE, J.—The object of the replevin bond is to protect the landlord from damage by delaying unreasonably the action and preventing his having a return of the goods replevied, or the value of them. In the latter case the solvency of the sureties may be materially altered by delay. I think the plaintiff is obliged to go on, much as an attorney is who has engaged to use due diligence. That has not been done, and therefore the condition of the bond is broken.

 Nov. 11; } SMITH v. WETHERELL, CLERK.
 Dec. 12. }

Insolvent Debtor—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.
 s. 55—Provisional Assignee—Sequestration.

A provisional assignee, in whom a prisoner's estate and effects are vested by an order of the Insolvent Debtors Court, under the 37th section of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, has power where such prisoner is a beneficed clergyman, to apply for a sequestration under the 55th section of that statute.

The defendant in this case was a beneficed clergyman, who having become an inmate of the Queen's Prison for debt, the Court for the relief of Insolvent Debtors, upon the application of one of his creditors, made an order on the 17th of March 1846, vesting all the defendant's real estate and effects in Mr. Sturgis, a provisional assignee. No creditors' assignee was ever appointed. On the 3rd of June following, Mr. Sturgis, as such provisional assignee, applied to the Bishop of Peterborough, under the 55th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, for a sequestration of the profits of the defendant's benefice, which sequestration was, on the 6th of June, duly granted by the Bishop to Mr. Gates his secretary, on behalf of the provisional assignee. These proceedings were afterwards duly confirmed by the Insolvent Debtors Court, and an order made that the funds, when realized, should be paid into that court to the credit of the defendant's estate.

On the 6th of July 1846, the plaintiff issued a writ of sequestrari facias in this action; and, on the 8th of May last, obtained a rule that the Bishop should make a return of what he had levied under that writ. The Bishop certified the affidavit of the sequestrator under the former writ, which stated that there was at present in his hands a sequestration of the defendant's rectory, at the suit and instance of Mr. Sturgis, the provisional assignee of the estate and effects, &c., which was still unsatisfied, and which was issued and delivered to the defendant, previously to the issuing of the sequestrari facias by the plaintiff in this case.

NEW SERIES, XVII.—Q.B.

On the 29th of May a rule nisi was obtained on behalf of the plaintiff, calling upon the Bishop and the said provisional assignee to shew cause why the sequestration mentioned in the certificate of the Bishop to have been issued on behalf of the said provisional assignee, should not be set aside, and why the said Bishop should not forthwith proceed to execute the writ of sequestrari facias issued in this action, upon the ground that a provisional assignee had no authority to apply for a writ of sequestration under the 55th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110(1).

Martin and J. Addison shewed cause (Nov. 11).—The language of the 55th section is large enough to comprehend a "provisional assignee." Although, strictly speaking, a provisional assignee is not appointed by any formal order of appointment, yet the order of the Insolvent Debtors Court vesting the effects of the prisoner in the provisional assignee, under the 37th section, amounts in effect to an appointment, so as to satisfy the clause in the 55th section, which speaks of "the order appointing an assignee, &c." A provisional assignee has no authority to deal with the estate of any prisoner, until a vesting order has been made. The policy of the act would be altogether defeated if the construction contended for by the other side were to prevail. No reason can be suggested why a provisional assignee, dealing with the effects of a prisoner for the benefit of all the creditors, should not be entitled to apply for a sequestration of the prisoner's benefice. The effect of such a construction would be, that in every case where no creditors' assignee had been appointed, a particular creditor might obtain a sequestration for his private debt, to the prejudice of the general body—Bishop v. Hatch (2). The language of the corresponding section (s. 28.) of 7 Geo. 4. c. 57. was open to this difficulty, and has been expressly altered in this respect by the 55th section of the present statute.

Sir F. Thesiger and T. Jones, contra.—The only persons who are authorized to apply for a sequestration, under the 55th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, are the assignee or assignees of the estate of a prisoner, being a beneficed clergyman, who act under an order appointing him or them such assignee or assignees; for in the absence of such an order of appointment, the bishop is not warranted in granting a sequestration. It is submitted that there is no such order in the case of a provisional assignee, and, therefore, that no sequestration can issue upon his application. The provisional assignee is a standing officer of the Court, and although, by the 37th section, a vesting order may be made by the Court, vesting the estate and effects of the prisoner in him, he is not by that order appointed an assignee, for he was already such. On the other hand a general or creditors' assignee has no existence until called into being by the order of the Court appointing him under the 45th section. It is only to such an assignee that the language of the 55th section applies. If the section of the act be looked into, it will be found that almost universally, when the provisional assignee is intended, the word "provisional" is introduced, and that, where the word "assignee" stands without qualification, the general or creditors' assignee is intended. There is no hardship in the construction contended for; for the general body of the creditors can always protect themselves by causing a general assignee to be appointed. With respect to the case of Bishop v. Hatch, all that it decided was, that, under the 7 Geo. 4. c. 57, the profits of a benefice did not pass under the general assignment to the assignee.

Bosvill, for the Bishop of Peterborough, asked for costs, whichever way the rule might be determined.

[In the course of the argument the following acts of parliament were referred to: 1 Geo. 4. c. 119; 7 Geo. 4. c. 57, sections 11, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, sections 23, 24, 35, 36, 37, 42, 45, 51, 53, 54, 55, 62 and 63.]

PATTESON, J. now (Dec. 12) delivered judgment.—I have had much doubt as to the proper construction of the 55th section of the stat. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, on which this case depends. However, on the fullest consideration I can give the case, I am of opinion that the vesting order, as it is usually called, is an order appointing an assignee of the prisoner, in pursuance of the act, within the meaning of the 55th section. The object of that section is to prevent the income of a clergyman from being taken at once by a person over whom the ecclesiastical ordinary would have no authority, so as to provide for the due performance of the services of the church, in which the parishioners are interested, and it is therefore provided that nothing in the act contained shall entitle the assignee to the income of a clergyman; provided always, that it shall be lawful for such assignee to obtain a sequestration, "and the order appointing an assignee or assignees of such prisoner, in pursuance of this act, shall be a sufficient warrant for the granting of such sequestration." It is remarkable that this is the only section throughout the act, in which the words "order appointing an assignee" are to be found. The vesting of the estate of the prisoner in the provisional assignee is to be by order, and that order cannot be directed to any other person, so that there is no selection by the Court, and in some sense no appointment of the person to be assignee; but still the provisional assignee is not assignee at all of any individual prisoner until an order of the Court vesting the effects of such prisoner in him is made. The vesting order, therefore, does in some sense appoint the provisional assignee to be assignee of the prisoner in respect of whose effects it is made. The 45th section empowers the Court, but does not require it, to appoint a general assignee or assignees, and provides that where the appointment has been made and accepted, the effects of the prisoner shall by virtue of such appointment vest in the said assignee or assignees, without conveyance from the provisional assignee. This section does not direct the appointment to be by order of the Court; and it is remarkable that wherever in the act that appointment is referred to, the word "appointment" only is used, and not the words "order of appointment," or "order appointing," except only in the 55th section, which is in question. The distinction between an order and an appointment is only marked in the 45th section. It is true, that different powers are given to the provisional assignee and the general assignee by the different sections; and that for the most part, the words "provisional assignee" are used where that officer is intended, and the word "assignee" only where the creditors' assignee is intended. Yet this is not invariably so, for both are manifestly included in the word "assignee" in several sections (see sections 49, 62, 63, and others); whereas in other sections the words "provisional or other assignee" are used. Other comments on the one side and the other might easily be made on the words of the different sections of this act. I do not rely on such arguments, although I have anxiously examined the language of the act to see if it was possible to draw any conclusive argument from it.

The argument which weighs with me is this, that the main scope and object of the act is to divide the insolvent's property rateably among his creditors, and that this object will best be effectuated by such a construction of the 55th and other sections as will not give an opportunity for any particular creditor to intervene and obtain a preference over others. I see nothing in that section indicating any intention to distinguish between the provisional and general assignee, and I see no sort of reason for such distinction. The words of the section are large enough to include both, and the particular object of the section is quite beside any such distinction.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that the vesting order is an order appointing an assignee of such prisoner, and that this rule must be discharged with costs to the provisional assignee and the Bishop.

(1) Stat. 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 71, s. 33, enacts "That as soon as may be after the choosing of such valuer or valuers" (sect. 32.) (in cases where parochial agreements are entered into), "and after the confirmation of the said agreement, the valuer or valuers so chosen shall apportion the total sum agreed to be paid by way of rent-charge instead of tithes, and the expenses of the apportionment, amongst the several lands in the said parish, according to such principles of apportionment as shall be agreed upon at the meeting at which the valuer or valuers shall be chosen, or if no principles shall be then agreed upon for the guidance of the valuer or valuers, then, having regard to the average titheable produce and productive quality of the lands, according to his or their discretion and judgment, but subject in each case to the provisions hereinafter contained, and so that in each case the several lands shall have the full benefit of every modus and composition real, prescriptive and customary payment, and of every exemption from or non-liability to tithes relating to the said lands respectively, and having regard to the several tithes to which the said lands are severally liable; provided that it shall be lawful for the said valuers, when an even number is chosen, by any writing under their hands, to appoint an umpire before they proceed upon the business of such apportionment, and the decision of the umpire on the questions in difference between the valuers shall be binding on them, and shall be adopted by them in the apportionment."

Sect. 36, enacts "That after the 1st day of October 1838, the Commissioners shall proceed in manner hereinafter mentioned, at such time and in such order as to them shall seem fit, either by themselves or by some assistant Commissioner, to ascertain and award the total sums to be paid by way of rent-charge, instead of the tithes of every parish in England and Wales, in which no such agreement binding upon the whole parish as aforesaid shall have been made and confirmed as aforesaid." (Sections 18, 21, 27.)

Sect. 37, enacts "That in every case in which the Commissioners shall intend making such award," notice shall be given, &c.; and after twenty-one days from such notice, "the Commissioners or some assistant Commissioner shall, except in the cases for which provision is hereinafter made, proceed to ascertain the clear average value (after making all just deductions on account of the expenses of collecting, preparing for sale, and marketing where such tithes have been taken in kind,) of the tithes of the said parish, according to the average of seven years preceding Michaelmas in the year 1835: Provided that if during the said period of seven years, or any part thereof, the said tithes or any part thereof shall have been compounded for, or demised to the owner or occupier of any of the said lands in consideration of any rent or payment instead of tithes, the amount of such Objections having been made before the Commissioners to this apportionment, both on principle and on the facts, they heard the evidence, and decided that they would confirm the apportionment, if they were not forbidden by a superior court. On motion for a prohibition,—Held, first, that it did not lie, the Commissioners having acted within their jurisdiction. Secondly, that the apportionment was correct in principle.

composition, or rent, or sum agreed to be paid instead, shall be taken as the clear value of the tithes included in such composition, demise, or agreement during the time for which the same shall have been made; and the Commissioners or assistant Commissioner shall award the average annual value of the said seven years so ascertained as the sum to be taken for calculating the rent-charge to be paid as a permanent commutation of the said tithes."

Sect. 44, enacts, "That if any modus or composition real, or prescriptive or customary payment, shall be payable instead of the tithes of any of the lands or produce thereof in the said parish, the Commissioners or assistant Commissioner shall in such case estimate the amount of such modus, composition or payment as the value of the tithes payable in respect of such lands or produce respectively, and shall add the amount thereof to the value of the other tithes of the parish ascertained as aforesaid, and shall also make due allowance for all exemptions from or non-liability to tithes of any lands, or any part of the produce of such lands."

Sections 51, and 52, provide for hearing the objections to, and for the confirmation of the award.

Sect. 53, enacts, "That as soon as the Commissioners shall have confirmed any such award, they shall call a parochial meeting for the purpose of appointing valuers . . . . and the valuers so chosen shall act with the same powers, and be subject to the same provisions as if the rent-charge so awarded had been agreed to at a parochial meeting of the landowners, &c., and the valuers had been thereupon chosen as aforesaid." (Sect. 33.)

It appeared by the affidavit of the valuer that no principles were laid down for his guidance.

It further appeared by the affidavits on both sides, that there was no appreciable probability of the woodland being grubbed up for tillage.

A rule had been obtained, in Michaelmas term 1844, calling upon the Tithe Commissioners for England and Wales to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to prohibit them from confirming the instrument of apportionment of the rent-charges of the parish of Appledore in Kent. It was ordered by the rule that notice thereof should be given to the attorney for the landowners of the said parish, and to the impropiator and his lessee, and the vicar of the said parish. The following facts appeared on affidavits for and against the rule:—The parish of Appledore, in the Weald of Kent, lies partly in Romney Marsh, and partly on uplands adjoining, and comprises about 474 acres of arable land, 2,209 of pasture or meadow, and sixty-eight of woodland, besides glebe lands, waste, &c. By custom no tithes are payable in the district of the Weald for woodland. The tithes of corn and grain in the parish are payable in kind, and belong to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who is the impropriate rector, and to his lessees. No other tithes in the parish are payable in kind; but moduses of 6d. and 1s. per acre are paid to the vicar in lieu of all tithes, except those of corn and grain. The assistant Tithe Commissioner made his award (September 2nd, 1841), fixing the annual sum of 210*l.* as the rent-charge payable to the Archbishop or his lessees, in lieu of the tithes of corn and grain, and 98*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* as the rent-charge payable to the vicar, in lieu of all vicarial tithes and moduses. The charges were ascertained according to the average value of the tithes of corn and grain, and the amount of the moduses respectively received in the parish for seven years preceding Christmas 1835. The Commissioners confirmed the award.

It appeared, in point of fact, and was found by the award, that the pasture lands in the parish of Appledore are, for the most part, ancient pasture or meadow, particularly those in Romney Marsh, which have been in grass from time immemorial. The Dean and Chapter of Canterbury are the owners of 107 acres of pasture land in the marsh, which are known by the name of Mean Lands, and are demised by them to Sir John E. Honeywood, by lease, dated the 30th of June 1842, for twenty-one years, renewable in the usual manner, at the yearly rent of 10*l.* 10*s.* A modus of 1*s.* per acre had been immemorially paid to the vicar for the tithes of these lands, and no other tithe, or payment in lieu of tithe, whatsoever.

After confirmation of the award, a valuer was appointed under section 53, who made an apportionment of the rent-charge among the lands in the parish, and therein charged part of the immemorial pasture lands, including those demised to Sir J. E. Honeywood, not only with the amount of the moduses, but with a further sum of 1*s.* per acre to be paid to the impropriate rector or his lessees, as part of the gross rent-charge of 210*l.*, awarded in lieu of the tithes of corn and grain.

Sir J. E. Honeywood and other landowners, objecting to the apportionment, were heard before two assistant Commissioners, at meetings called for the purpose, under section 61, and contended that the valuer had no jurisdiction or power to charge the pasture lands with any sum beyond the amount of the moduses. The valuer contended, that he had pursued the directions of the Tithe Commutation Act, and apportioned, in the cases objected to, according to the average produce and productive quality of the lands; and where it seemed to him that the productive quality admitted of its being arable, and there was a reasonable probability of the grass being so converted into arable, he had fixed, in respect of such probability, a small portion of the rectorial rent-charge on such lands accordingly. Evidence was adduced, on the part of Sir J. E. Honeywood, to shew that the pasture land in the marsh was not likely to be converted into arable, and that breaking it up for that purpose would not be advantageous; but the owners of arable land, who were satisfied with the apportionment, produced evidence to a contrary effect. The Assistant Tithe Commissioners were of opinion that the apportionment was made on just principles, and then reported to the Tithe Commissioners accordingly; but, on the request of the objectors, the parties were finally heard (the 24th of May 1844) at Somerset House, before the Tithe Commissioners themselves, who (referring to the evidence taken by the assistant Commissioners) gave a written judgment (which was annexed to the affidavits) in favour of the apportionment; and as that judgment embodies the facts proved, and the arguments adduced before the Commissioners, and which were further deposed to in the affidavits for and against the rule, it is given at length.

"In the case of Appledore we have three parties complaining of the apportionment—one party complains that the apportionment has not given the full benefit of a modus to the owner of grounds of which that modus protects all the produce, except corn and grain. This is a parochial modus, and would in the same manner protect the lands actually arable if they grew other produce than corn and grain. In cases where it is clearly improbable that the grass lands will ever be ploughed up, we think the amount of the modus only ought to be apportioned on them; but in this case we are of opinion that the apportioner, in the execution of his duty of allowing the full benefit of this modus to all the parties entitled to it, was justified in laying a small sum in addition to the modus on lands actually in grass, and that the owners of the lands now in grass get their full share of the benefit of this modus, when they are protected from ever paying more than the modus, with a very slight addition, whatever may be the future produce of their soil. The second party complains that his lands can never be ploughed up, or produce corn or grain, and therefore ought not to be charged, permanently, with anything more than the modus it is to be protected by when in grass. He states that his lands can never be ploughed up: first, because he holds under a lease from the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, which makes it penal in him to plough without their licence; and, secondly, because such licence can never legally be given, since that supposes the dean and chapter to be parties to waste. We assume waste to be the doing some act which is prejudicial to the inheritance. On the evidence before us, we believe that there are qualities of land in Appledore, the ploughing up a portion of which would add to the permanent value of the estate; and we are not disposed to consider such an operation necessarily waste. It would be waste, perhaps, in the tenant to plough up without licence; but when he ploughs up with the deliberate licence of the lessor, it ceases, it appears to us, under such circumstances, to be waste. It is contended that the dean and chapter have no right to grant such licence. It has not been made clear to us that a licence granted under such circumstances, in which the inheritance would be benefited, and not injured, is an illegal licence when granted by a dean and chapter. And, as the law is not clear as to its being illegal, a long and, as far as it appears to us, unquestioned practice can be adduced in favour of its legality. It is not disputed that the tenants of the dean and chapter have been in the habit of ploughing under licence from their lessors. We decide, therefore, that if an addition to the modus was proper on other grounds, it was not improper simply because the lands were held under the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury by a lease which made it penal to plough without their licence. Sir John Honeywood, a third party, complains, that, supposing the preceding questions disposed of, still no addition to the modus ought to be apportioned on his lands, because from their quality and position it is grossly improbable that they will ever be ploughed, or had the Tithe Act not passed, would ever have produced any titheable produce not covered by the modus. On this point a great body of evidence was produced before the assistant Commissioners, of which their minutes are now before us. It consists of testimony as to opinion, and testimony as to facts. The testimony as to opinion appears to us to be pretty equally balanced: witnesses, many of them well known to us as men of skill and character, have deposed, some that they believe it grossly improbable that any part of Romney Marsh will ever be ploughed up; others that they consider it highly probable that a portion of it, of a peculiar quality and description, will be ploughed up. If we put aside, however, these conflicting opinions, and look only to the testimony as to facts, it appears to us to be clearly established that there is a portion of Romney Marsh, not a very large one perhaps, which it is found desirable and profitable to plough up; that there is a tendency to plough, distinctly established, now; and that tendency becomes greater whenever the tithe commutation is finally settled, and the fear of tithe in kind got rid of. It further appears to us that that portion of Sir John Honeywood's estate to which the apportioner has assigned a rent-charge in addition to the modus, is, for its quality and position, to be ranked among the lands which there is a tendency in the marsh to plough. The addition made to the modus might be in excess; but we were not called upon to examine that: it was admitted that, if any addition at all was to be made to the modus, the addition actually made was not unreasonable in amount. Taking the whole case therefore into consideration, we shall confirm the apportionment, if we are not forbidden to do so by a superior court."

Sir F. Thesiger and Buller, for the Tithe Commissioners.—The Tithe Commissioners do not wish to object that prohibition will not lie; but they contend that they have exercised a discretion given them by the act, and that the owners of the pasture land cannot be considered aggrieved. Suppose they broke up the pasture land immediately after the award, they would have to pay tithe in kind.

[COLERIDGE, J.—Sect. 33. provides, that the lands shall have the full benefit of every modus, &c. and of every exemption from a non-liability to tithes.]

The conversion of pasture into arable must be taken for the purpose of the argument to be beneficial; and after the case of The Duke of St. Albans v. Skipworth (1) it cannot be contended to be waste—Co. Litt. p. 53, b; and the lessee under the dean and chapter of Canterbury might so convert it with the consent of the lessors. An ecclesiastical corporation aggregate is not within the statutes—Marlbridge (52 Hen. 3. c. 23), Gloucester (6 Edw. 1. c. 5), Westmoreland (1 stat. 13 Edw. 1. c. 52). As to waste, the dean and chapter would not be liable—The Dean and Chapter of Worcester's case (2).

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—It is very doubtful whether we can interfere by prohibition.]

The Tithe Commissioners are desirous of having the opinion of this Court.

Hugh Hill, for the arable landowners.—Prohibition does not lie; and if there be any doubt on that point, the Court will order the parties to declare in prohibition. The 95th section takes away the certiorari, and the 45th section gives a particular mode of appeal, with the sole and exclusive jurisdiction, to a particular tribunal. To grant a prohibition would be to repeal these clauses in the act of parliament—The King v. Higgins (3), Griffin v. Ellis (4), Hall v.

(3) The King v. Higgins.—In Michaelmas Term 1843,—

Sir G. Lewin had obtained a rule calling on the Justices of Herefordshire to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to restrain them from further proceeding on a conviction of one Higgins, for unlawfully taking fish in water in which E. B. had a private right of fishery. It appeared by the affidavits, that Higgins being brought before the magistrates on a charge of unlawfully fishing in a private fishery, under the statute 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 39. s. 4, claimed a right to fish in the water in question: first, as being a public fishery; secondly, as having a right to fish there, as being a copyholder. The magistrates proceeded to hear the case, and fined him in 30s., and costs, refusing to go into evidence as to the right claimed by him, and not requiring E. B. to produce his title-deeds, but proceeding on the general statements of witnesses as to his right to the fishery.

Kelly shewed cause.—The magistrates had jurisdiction; and, if so, prohibition will not lie.

The Court called on—

Lewin, contra.—The statute gives no power of appeal, and provides that the proceedings shall not be removed by certiorari. If this Court will not interfere by prohibition, the party is without remedy—The Queen v. Burnaby, 2 Lord Raym. 900.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The refusal of the magistrates to go into evidence of the defendant's right to fish might amount to misconduct; but how does it affect the question of jurisdiction?]

If the defendant claimed to fish as of right, the Justices had no jurisdiction to try the right; and affidavits may be used to shew circumstances taking away their jurisdiction—The Queen v. Bolton, 1 Q.B. Rep. 66; s.c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 49. In The Queen v. Burnaby, which was a similar case Lord Holt says, "As the conviction is come hither, no prohibition can go; whereas, upon putting in such a suggestion as this while the conviction remained below, the parties might have a prohibition after conviction to stay the Justices from proceeding upon it, for without doubt if the defendant had but a colour of title the Justices had no jurisdiction in the cause."

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Nobody else ever said it, and I should doubt very much if Lord Holt ever did; and if he did say so, he has been expressly overruled. By making this rule absolute, we should in effect repeal the clause of the statute which takes away the certiorari.

COLERIDGE, J.—The magistrates are to inquire whether the party did unlawfully fish; and that they have done. It cannot be contended that they had no jurisdiction to inquire into this. The case of The Queen v. Bolton does not apply.

Rule discharged, with costs.

very on sale or return. The cause came on for trial, at the Sittings at Guildhall after Hilary term 1843, when the cause and all matters in difference were referred to an arbitrator. Evidence was given at the arbitration on the part of the then plaintiff (the present defendant Samuel) of the transaction on Friday, the 10th of September 1841, and of the payment of 500*l.* for the stock of watches, &c., and of an agreement by C. Rowlands, that he would be responsible for their safety as long as they were left on the premises, and also for any that might be subsequently sent there. On the other hand, the then defendant, C. Rowlands, called various witnesses (most of them being parties subsequently indicted) who swore that Rowlands had said that he would not be responsible for them for more than twenty-four hours, and that they could not remain on the premises longer than that time, as he was to give up the premises to one Solomon on the Monday following; and that Samuel had promised T. Rowlands 10*l.* per cent. on all that should be sold before Monday morning. And it was further sworn by two witnesses, that on the Monday following, the 13th of September, the plaintiff (Samuel) himself came and removed the goods. The arbitrator in January 1844 made his award in favour of Rowlands, the defendant in that action. Mr. Samuel afterwards, thinking he had reason to be satisfied that he was at Brighton from the time of the sale on the Friday until the Wednesday following (the 15th of September), and consequently, that he could not have removed the goods on the Monday, charged the now plaintiff and his witnesses with conspiring to defraud him and to impose on the arbitrator. An indictment was accordingly preferred at the Central Criminal Court against Mr. C. Rowlands and the other parties already mentioned: the substance of which indictment is set out in the declaration in this cause.

The indictment was afterwards removed by certiorari into this court, and came on for trial at the Sittings after Michaelmas term 1844, when the defendants were acquitted; and the present action was commenced in June 1845.

On the trial of the present action, evidence was called to prove what took place at the reference, and also at the trial of the indictment, and a friend of Samuel deposed to the fact that Mr. Samuel was at Brighton from Friday the 10th to Wednesday the 15th of September.

The witness, D. Rowlands, was also called for the plaintiff, who deposed that he was assistant to the plaintiff, C. Rowlands, and that about three weeks after the 10th of September 1841, he saw Samuel at Rowland's shop in Regent Street, that C. Rowlands said, "I understand that you and my son Thomas are doing business together in Leadenhall Street." Samuel said they were. C. Rowlands said, "Recollect it is not my business." Samuel said, "I think he does very well, and I would trust him to 1,000*l.*" C. Rowlands said, "Recollect I must have my rent, whether it is his business or yours: take care and keep the accounts regular; I don't consider him one of the brightest of us."

It was further proved that the costs of the defence of the seven defendants in the indictment amounted to 442*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.*, the whole of which had been paid by the plaintiff; and with respect to this it was objected that the plaintiff could not recover more than he could prove to have been incurred for his own costs. At the close of the plaintiff's case it was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that there was no evidence of want of probable cause. The Judge, however, decided that there was evidence to go to the jury; and witnesses were called for the defendant, who swore that Samuel was at Brighton from the 10th till after the 15th of September 1841, and that at that time it took more than four hours to perform the journey from Brighton to London, and that during the period in question he was not absent for four hours.

The learned Judge directed the jury that there were two questions for them. First, whether there was any fact which authorized Samuel to make the charge he did. That on the case of the plaintiff there was, in his opinion, absence of reasonable and probable cause. That the defendant had, however, called witnesses, and it was for them to say, on the facts, whether Mr. Samuel was proved to have been at Brighton the whole of Monday the 13th. If so, they must find for the defendant. If not, they were to say, on the whole case, whether Samuel acted bond fide or maliciously, and that malice would include an attempt to extort money by means of threats of a criminal charge; and that they might give the amount of the bill of costs of defending the indictment if the bill was a fair one. The jury having returned a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 900*l.*—

Montagu Chambers moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.—There were several circumstances in this case which would have been good ground for finding that the defendant had reasonable and probable cause for the indictment. First, if Mr. Samuel was at Brighton the whole of the 13th, or during so much of that day as would have rendered it impossible for him to have been in London, that no doubt would have been reasonable and probable cause. This the Judge left to the jury; but he should have further directed them to consider whether he could have been in London at the time the goods were taken. But, secondly, if Mr. Samuel had good reason for a bond fide belief, and did bond fide believe that he was not in London on the Monday, that would be reasonable and probable cause. Thirdly, if Samuel believed that Mr. Rowlands intentionally concealed from him that his son was not to be trusted, and thereby induced Samuel to leave the goods in his custody, this was also reasonable and probable cause for indicting for a conspiracy to defraud. Fourthly, if Mr. Rowlands did intentionally conceal the bad character (of which there was no doubt) of his son Thomas, and intended to deceive Samuel, when he said “he is not one of the brightest of us,” that would also be reasonable and probable cause. The Judge should have left to the jury every fact that would amount to reasonable and probable cause, and then have taken their opinion as to those facts—Panton v. Williams (1). Fifthly, the jury should not have been directed to give the costs incurred by all the seven defendants in the indictment as damages in an action brought by one of them. No liability to pay the whole, by the present plaintiff, was made out; and he cannot recover as damages what he paid as a volunteer.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—On the question of absence of reasonable and probable cause, I cannot say that I entirely concur in the judgment in Panton v. Williams. Great difficulties are thrown on Judges by the decision in that case. I think it is for the Judge to tell the jury whether or not the facts alleged by the defendant, in answer to an action, amount to reasonable and probable cause. He must do this on a review of all the circumstances; and it seems to me impossible to lay down any general law or rule by which he is to be guided in each particular case. That which would be strong evidence as against persons in one condition or state of circumstances might be no evidence at all in another. I think, therefore, we must look to the circumstances of each particular case, and give our opinion accordingly. In consequence, however, of that decision, I have always endeavoured to bring each fact to the notice of the jury as well as the nature of the case would admit. In this case, however, I think there has been no misdirection. It is said that certain of the facts proved were themselves enough to make out reasonable and probable cause, and the Judge should have directed the jury accordingly: it is said that the son's want of integrity was, by the father, kept back from the defendant; but I think that that is not a probable cause in fact or in law; besides, there is no proof that the father knew it. It is said indeed, that, on a particular occasion, the father uses a particular expression, “that he is not one of the brightest,” with an intention to mislead; but I think what was there said was enough to put the defendant on his guard: and it is to be remembered that a conspiracy should be established in order to make that which was said evidence at all. With regard to the evidence adduced by the defendant as to a specific fact, the Judge was quite right in telling the jury, that according as they found the fact one way or the other, there was or there was not probable cause; but a Judge is not, I think, to tell the jury that they are to find a sort of special verdict upon every point, and then to proceed to give the law on the facts so found. As to the costs, I am of opinion that if two or more persons are indicted for a conspiracy, and one of them employs an attorney for his defence, which he has a perfect right to do, and that attorney goes to him alone, and he thereby incurs the whole costs, he may recover them. How, indeed, can any separate account or apportionment be made in respect of witnesses or counsel's fees? Any one interested in a joint indictment may be the sole paymaster and recover as damages what he has paid. The rule must be refused.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion, and would only add on the question of reasonable and probable cause, that giving the utmost weight to the facts relied upon they do not amount to reasonable or probable cause for the indictment. On the subject of the costs I should be unwilling to lay down a general rule. There can be no doubt that in the case of an indictment for a conspiracy, where all rely on the same matter of defence, any one may be liable for, and pay and subsequently recover, all the costs; but if different grounds of defence were relied on, such as alibi, for instance, the same rule would not apply.

A writ of execution may issue on a rule of court (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 18.) after the expiration of a year and a day, without a sci. fa. or any application to the Court.

In the present term a rule had been obtained by—

Manning, Serj. (in the matter of the arbitration between the above parties) calling upon James Spooner to shew cause "why the writ of ca. sa. issued in this cause should not be set aside, and why the defendant should not be discharged out of the custody of the keeper of the Queen's Prison as to the execution in this matter."

The rule was granted on the affidavit of the defendant; from which it appeared that a rule had been obtained by him for setting aside the award made in the cause, which rule was discharged with costs, which were taxed at 23*l.* 1*s.*, the Master's allocatur bearing date the 7th of February 1845, and that on the 17th of November 1846 he was arrested on a ca. sa., no sci. fa. having issued on the allocatur.

Whitehurst and Miller shewed cause (Nov. 18).—The ground of this motion is that execution was issued on the order of Court, after the expiration of a year and a day, without a scire facias; but a rule or order of Court is not a record, which is "a memorial or remembrance in rolls of parchment of the proceedings or acts of courts of justice, being of such incontrovertible verity as not to admit of averment, plea, or proof to the contrary"—Co. Litt. p. 260, a, Steph. Pl. n. 11. app. p. 18; and in practice a scire facias never has issued on a rule of court. No judgment is signed on it, and it has its operation in favour of creditors by virtue of stat. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 18. It is said that that statute provides, that decrees and orders of the courts of equity and rules of the courts of common law for the payment of money should have the effect of judgments in the superior courts. That, however, does not make them judgments for all purposes, or equivalent to judgments—Cetti v. Bartlett (1), Farmer v. Mottram (2). Besides, assuming the sci. fa. to be necessary, the writ of ca. sa. cannot be treated as a nullity, because no sci. fa. has issued—Blanchenay v. Burt (3), Mortimer v. Piggot (4), Sandon v. Proctor (5), Benn v. Greatwood (6); and the defendant must be put to his writ of error. At all events, this application is too late.

the objection as to the necessity of a writ of error. In cases of attachment the practice is to grant a rule nisi if four terms have elapsed. A sci. fa. is an analogous proceeding, being a writ nisi, and necessary therefore in this case. In moving for a rule nisi for an attachment an affidavit that the money is unpaid is necessary. Blanchenay v. Burt was an action of trespass against the parties who executed a writ of ca. sa. after the year and a day. That case shews, if anything, that an application might have been successfully made to discharge the defendant out of custody. The same may be said of Reynolds v. Newton (7), and Parsons v. Loyd (8). The cases are collected in Chit. Arch. (last edit.) 1013.

[ERLE, J. referred to Goodtitle d. Murrell v. Badtittle (9).]

In Hodson v. Warrington (10) the Court of Chancery refused to allow a plaintiff to issue execution on a judgment in the petty bag without a sci. fa., though the delay was the act of the defendant. Patrick v. Johnson (11) was an action of trespass, but it was there held that execution after the year, though not void, was voidable on error. This application is in the nature of error, which will not lie. In Russell's case (12) it was held, that execution after a year and a day was a void execution, and not only avoidable by error; and the defendant was discharged by reason that "it was no execution, and the plaintiff may have sci. fa. when he will." The circumstance that if it had been the case of a judgment instead of an order the defect would have been sufficiently material to have been the ground of error, is of itself a strong argument for the necessity of a sci. fa.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—We certainly cannot see at present that any sci. fa. can be necessary; but it is desirable to inquire as to the practice of the other courts with respect to the necessity of an application to keep the proceedings alive after the expiration of a year.]

LORD DENMAN, C.J. subsequently (Nov. 25) delivered the judgment of the Court.—This defendant obtained a rule for discharging him from imprisonment under a ca. sa., because it had issued, on a rule of court requiring him to pay money, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 18. without a sci. fa. or special leave of the Court. We are of opinion that no sci. fa. or special leave is made necessary by that act, or by any legal principle, and we learn that according to the practice now existing the proceedings are regular, and we discharge the rule.

BARBER v. LEMON.

Bill of Exchange—Pleading—Traverse—Immaterial Averment.

To a declaration in debt by the drawer against the acceptor of a bill of exchange, and on an account stated, the defendant pleaded that the bill was indorsed by the plaintiff to M. D, who then became, and thence hitherto remained the holder thereof. Replication, that the plaintiff was the holder of the bill at the commencement of the suit, absque hoc that M. D, from the time of the indorsement hitherto remained the holder thereof:—Held, (on special demurrer) that the replication was not too large, and also that the plaintiff was at liberty to traverse the material allegation in the plea, and was not bound to state specially how he re-acquired the bill from M. D.

Debt. The first count was on a bill of exchange, drawn by the plaintiff upon, and accepted by the defendant, for 9*l.* 19*s.*, payable two months after date to the plaintiff's order. Second count, for money due upon an account stated.

First plea to the first count of the declaration, that, after the said bill of exchange was drawn and accepted, and before the same became due, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on &c., the plaintiff then being the holder of the said bill, as such drawer thereof, indorsed and delivered the same to a certain person carrying on business under the name, style, and firm of Mark Davis & Son, who then became, and thence afterwards, to wit, thence hitherto, remained the holders of the said bill by virtue of such indorsement thereof as last aforesaid.

Second plea to the second count, that the account therein stated was stated between the plaintiff as the drawer, and the defendant as the acceptor of the said bill in the declaration mentioned, and not otherwise, and of and concerning no other item or matter than the liability of the defendant to pay the plaintiff, as such drawer, the amount of the said bill, according to the tenour and effect thereof and of his, the defendant's, said acceptance; and the defendant saith, that afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, and while the plaintiff was the holder of the said bill as such drawer thereof, to wit, on &c., the plaintiff, for valuable consideration in that behalf, that is to say, for a large and sufficient sum of money, to wit, a sum equal to the amount of the said bill, and all causes of action arising out of, upon, or in respect of the same, indorsed and delivered the said bill to certain persons carrying on business under the name, style, and firm of Mark Davis & Son, and from whom the plaintiff then received the said sum in satisfaction of the amount of the said bill and of all causes of action arising out of, upon, or in respect of the same; and that the said Mark Davis & Son then became, and thence, afterwards, to wit, thence hitherto, remained and were the holders of the said bill by virtue of such indorsement.

The plaintiff replied to each of these pleas that, at the time of the commencement of this suit, the plaintiff was the holder of the said bill; without this, that the said persons in the plea mentioned, from the time the said bill was so indorsed and delivered to them as in that plea mentioned hitherto, remained the holders thereof, modo et forma, concluding to the country.

The defendant demurred specially, on the ground that the replication to the first plea did not shew any right of action in debt accruing to the plaintiff after he had indorsed the bill; that it was not shewn in what way the plaintiff re-acquired the bill; that it was consistent with the replication that he may have held it at the time of suit as bailee (in which case he would have no right of action at all), or as indorsee (in which case he could not sue in debt); that it did not appear that the plaintiff did not receive the bill from the indorsees after the defendant had satisfied them; that the traverse was too large, as it puts in issue that the persons named in the plea were holders at the time of pleading, whereas it would be sufficient if they were holders at the time of suit; and that the replication was a departure.

The replication to the second plea was objected to for the same reasons, and also on the ground that it admitted the statement in that plea, that the original right of action which accrued on an account stated before the bill was indorsed to the third parties, was extinguished by that indorsement, the plaintiff having, by indorsing the bill, assigned with it the debt in respect of which the account was stated; and that if any subsequent account was stated with the plaintiff after he became again the holder of the bill, it should have been new assigned.

Fortescue, in support of the demurrer (Dec. 7).—These pleas shew that the bill was indorsed away by the plaintiff, and so give a distinct answer to the declaration; the replications should have stated how the bill was re-acquired by the plaintiff. Bartlett v. Benson (1) shews that such a plea prima facie displaces the title of the plaintiff to sue on the bill: and if he has acquired a fresh title he ought to state it specially. Schild v. Kilpin (2) is also in point. Secondly, the replications are bad for carrying on the traverse to the time of plea pleaded. Basan v. Arnold (3) has expressly decided this point. Thirdly, the replication should have stated that the plaintiff was indorsee as well as holder of the bill at the commencement of the suit, otherwise he is not shewn to have any title to sue on the bill. It was held in Cunliffe v. Whitehead (4) that an averment that a bill was delivered was not equivalent to an allegation that it was indorsed.

Crompton, contra.—The replications only put in issue the allegations in the pleas, and the second plea does not allege that the indorsement over by the plaintiff took place before the bill became due, and is therefore no answer to the declaration. But the replications answer all the essential parts of the pleas, which consist of two parts; either of which being answered, the plaintiff is remitted to his original title. The point that debt will not lie, does not therefore arise, for it is not a new title, but the old one on which the plaintiff is suing. The very form suggested in Fraser v. Welch (5) has been here adopted. It was necessary that the plea, besides the indorsement to Davis & Son, should state that they were still holders; and therefore the replication correctly denies that they were still holders: that is the substance of the replication, and it is immaterial whether the traverse is common or special. The allegation modo et formâ applies the traverse to the substantial and material part of the plea—Steph. Plead. 215, 274.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Modo et formâ puts in issue what is alleged in the plea, and therefore this replication puts in issue the fact of these persons being holders at the time of plea pleaded.]

[PATTESON, J.—This replication seems to me worse than that in Basan v. Arnold. "Hitherto" seems to refer to the time of replication.]

Basan v. Arnold has been virtually overruled in the Exchequer Chamber by Palmer v. Gooden (6), which decides that if immaterial matter is alleged in the plea, it may be included in the traverse. At most, therefore, this is only surplusage, and the replication is not demurred to on that ground. As to the objection, that the mode in which the plaintiff re-acquired the bill should have been stated, Fraser v. Welch shews that to be unnecessary. But, at all events, the second plea admits a good cause of action on the account stated. After pleading over, it must be assumed that the plaintiff became the holder of the bill before it was due, and that the account was stated during the currency of the bill: if so, there was a vested cause of action, which could not be divested by the indorsement over. The debt arising out of the statement of the account cannot be assigned at law.

Fortescue, in reply.—The second plea avers, that all the accounting which ever took place was in respect of the bill. The bill being assignable by law, the debt which arises in respect of it must be also assignable, otherwise, the bill itself will in effect cease to be assignable; and the substance of the plea is, that the bill and debt were both assigned over, and that the plaintiff has no right to sue for either. If that be so, the same question arises on both the pleas and replications. The doctrine of Palmer v. Gooden does not apply; there, the plea contained an impossible allegation, entry upon tolls, and the replication was assumed not to take issue on it. Here, however, it is quite possible that Davis & Son may have been holders up to the time of pleading, and that being traversed renders the replication bad. But the replication should have shewn how the plaintiff re-acquired a title to the bill, so as to enable the defendant to set up any equities to which it was liable in his hands.

[ERLE, J.—The plaintiff is stated to be the holder at the commencement of the suit: the presumption is, that the holder of a negotiable instrument has title.]

If the plaintiff has acquired a new title, there is no privity between the parties, and debt will not lie.

The judgment of the Court (7) was now (Dec. 11.) delivered by—LORD DENMAN, C.J.—In this case the plaintiff declared in debt as drawer of a bill of exchange payable to his own order against the acceptor, with a count upon an account stated. The defendant pleaded to the count upon the bill that it was indorsed by the plaintiff to certain persons "who then became and thence hitherto remained the holders thereof." The plaintiff replied that he was the holder at the commencement of the suit; without this, that the said persons mentioned in the plea "from the time of the indorsement hitherto remained the holders thereof." To this traverse there was a demurrer, and several causes were specially assigned. It was contended for the defendant that the plaintiff, instead of traversing the allegation of the persons named in the plea being the holders, should have shewn by his replication how the bill which he admits to have been indorsed and delivered to those persons came back to him again. We are clearly of opinion that there is nothing in this objection, and that a traverse was the only mode of pleading that could be adopted by the plaintiff, as he could not plead in confession and avoidance without admitting that the persons named in the plea were the holders at the time of the commencement of the suit. The special matter could only have been stated by way of inducement, and the replication must have concluded with a traverse of that which was admitted to be a material and necessary averment in the plea. The point indeed was expressly decided in Fraser v. Welsh, and the correct form of replication given, which is the same in substance as that in the present case. But it was also contended by the plaintiff that the traverse was too large, and put in issue immaterial and irrelevant matter, for it denied that the persons named in the plea were the holders "from the time of the indorsement hitherto," using the very terms of the plea, which included a time posterior to the commencement of the suit. We should be extremely unwilling to give effect to such an objection, unless compelled to do so by the strict rules of pleading, but we do not think that we are so compelled. The only material part of the allegation is, that the persons named in the plea were holders at the time the suit was commenced; and as stated by the defendant himself in his demurrer, it would be sufficient in order to support the allegation in the plea to shew that such persons were the holders at the time of the commencement of the suit. If so, such proof would be sufficient if the defendant had joined issue upon the traverse, and he could therefore sustain no inconvenience by the largeness of it. In Palmer v. Gooden, in the Exchequer Chamber, a similar objection was taken to including immaterial matter in a traverse, but the objection was overruled, and Tindal, C.J. in pronouncing the judgment says, "A party does not make an issue upon the substantial matter to be tried by the jury bad merely because he includes in it something of total surplusage and immateriality." This case appears to us to be a direct authority against the objection. Upon the argument the defendant relied upon the case of Basan v. Arnold; but it may be observed that that case is distinguished from this in its circumstances, for the traverse there was "without this, that any other person is the holder thereof in manner and form." The only matter directly put in issue by that traverse was whether the person was the holder at the time of plea pleaded, which was obviously insufficient. Similar objections were made to the replication to a special plea to the account stated, but we are of opinion that such objections cannot be sustained for the reasons already given. Our judgment therefore is for the plaintiff.

Dec. 7. } WEBSTER v. WATTS.

Trespass—Pleading—Material Allegation—Defence of Possession—Breach of the Peace.

To trespass for assault and imprisonment the defendant pleaded secondly, to the assault, that he was possessed of a dwelling-house; that the plaintiff was making a noise and disturbance there; and that the defendant molliter manus imposuit to turn him out; fourthly, to the assault and imprisonment, that the defendant was possessed of a tavern or alehouse, and the plaintiff conducted himself in a rude and quarrelsome manner in it, and assaulted the defendant and others, and afterwards and before, &c. remained standing in the street near the door of the house, using loud, menacing and disgusting language to the defendant and his family, who was within hearing, and by reason thereof many persons congregated about the house and made a riot and disturbance; and at the time when, &c. the plaintiff was causing persons to congregate in breach of the peace, whereupon the defendant, after requesting him to go, gave him in charge to a police officer.

To the second plea, the plaintiff replied, that the house was a common alehouse, and that the plaintiff was lawfully drinking there, wherefore he refused to depart; and that the defendant of his own wrong committed the trespasses:—Held, on demurrer to this replication that it was insufficient, as it must be taken to admit that the plaintiff was making a noise and disturbance, and was in that case no answer to the plea.

Held also, on demurrer to the fourth plea, that it was good, as sufficiently shewing matter amounting to a breach of the peace by the plaintiff.

Trespass for assaulting and striking the plaintiff, and seizing and pulling him, and forcing and compelling him to go as a prisoner and in custody from and out of a certain public house into, through and along divers public streets, &c., to a police station, and there then imprisoning the plaintiff, and keeping and detaining him in prison for a long space of time, &c.

Second plea (to the assaulting, striking, and seizing and pulling, &c.), that the defendant, before, &c., was lawfully possessed of a certain dwelling-house, with the appurtenances, situate, &c., and being so possessed thereof, the plaintiff just before, &c. to wit, &c., was unlawfully in the said dwelling-house, and with force and arms, &c. made a noise and disturbance therein, and continued in the said dwelling-house against the will of the defendant, making such noise and disturbance, and disturbing and disquieting the defendant and his family; and thereupon the defendant requested the plaintiff to cease making such noise and disturbance, and to depart, &c., which the plaintiff refused to do, wherefore the defendant molliter manus imposuit to turn him out, and in so doing committed the trespasses to which this plea is pleaded.

Fourth plea (to all the trespasses in the declaration), that the defendant just before and at, &c., was lawfully possessed of a certain house, being a tavern or alehouse, situate, &c.; and that the plaintiff, before, &c., to wit, &c., entered and came into the said house of the defendant, and then made a great noise and disturbance therein, and behaved and conducted himself in a rude, quarrelsome, and uncivil manner towards the defendant and divers and very many persons, and then and there assaulted, bruised, and ill-treated the defendant and divers and many persons then being in the said house, and afterwards and before any of the said times when, &c., to wit, &c., the plaintiff stood and thence continually up to and at the time of his being removed as hereinafter mentioned, remained standing and stood in the common Queen's highway near to and opposite the door of the said house, and while he so stood there made a great noise and disturbance in the said common Queen's highway, near to and opposite the door of the said house, and used loud, menacing and disgusting language to the defendant and his family, then being within the said house and within hearing of him; and that by reason of the aforesaid conduct of the plaintiff while he so stood as aforesaid, divers persons congregated in the common Queen's highway, near to and opposite the door of the said house, and made a great noise and disturbance near to and opposite the door of the said house, in breach, &c. and to the obstruction of the business carried on by the defendant in his said house, and to the obstruction of the said common Queen's highway there; and that at the time of the plaintiff's being removed as hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiff persisted in so standing near to and opposite the door of the said house making a great noise and disturbance, and using such language as aforesaid; and by reason of his so standing as aforesaid was causing divers and very many people to congregate in the said common Queen's highway, opposite and near to the door of the said house, in breach, &c. and to the great obstruction of the business carried on by the defendant in the said house, and to the great obstruction of the said common Queen's highway there, although before the plaintiff was removed as hereinafter mentioned, and while he was so standing in the common Queen's highway as aforesaid making such noise, &c., and before he was given in charge by the defendant as hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on &c., was requested by the defendant to go and depart from where he so stood, and to cease from making such noise and disturbance, and from using such language as aforesaid; wherefore the defendant, in order to restore and preserve the peace, and to get rid of the nuisance so occasioned as aforesaid by the plaintiff, just before and at the said times when, &c., to wit, on &c., gave the plaintiff in charge to one John Cotterell, then being a constable and peace officer of our Lady the Queen, and then requested the said John Cotterell to remove the plaintiff from where he so stood, and deal with him according to law; and the said John Cotterell so being such said constable and peace officer, did remove the plaintiff from where he then so stood, and took him to the prison or police station in the declaration mentioned, and detained him there for a short time, to wit, &c., to the end that he might be dealt with according to law, and examined by one of the Justices of our Lady the Queen concerning the premises; and the said John Cotterell, so then being such constable, at the said times when, &c., for the purpose of so doing and in so doing committed the trespasses in the declaration mentioned.

Replication to the second plea—That the said dwelling-house in the said second plea mentioned was, before &c., a common inn, victualling-house and ale-house, and the plaintiff was before and at the time when he was requested by the defendant as in the second plea mentioned, lawfully in the said dwelling-house as a guest, lawfully drinking and consuming liquors, which he, the plaintiff, had just before, to wit, on &c., purchased of and paid for to the defendant, then being the keeper of the said inn, ale-house and victualling-house, to be drunk and consumed there, such time being a lawful and reasonable and proper time in that behalf; wherefore the plaintiff did refuse to depart from and out of the said dwelling-house so being such common inn, ale-house and victualling-house when he was so requested by the defendant, as he lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, and the defendant of his own wrong committed the trespasses in manner and form as in the declaration in that behalf alleged. Verification.

Demurrer to the fourth plea, assigning for cause, that although the fourth plea is pleaded to, and professes to answer all the trespasses in the declaration, it does not confess, avoid, or in any way answer part thereof, (to wit) that the defendant forced and compelled the plaintiff to go as a prisoner, and in custody from and out of a certain public house into divers streets and highways.

Demurrer to replication to second plea, assigning for causes, first, that the said replication is an argumentative traverse of the defendant's being possessed of the dwelling-house at the time and in the manner therein mentioned. Secondly, that the said replication is an argumentative denial of the defendant's being entitled to the exclusive possession of the dwelling-house in the time and in the manner therein mentioned. Thirdly, that the said replication is an argumentative traverse of the plaintiff's making the noise and disturbance, and disturbing and disquieting the defendant and his family in the peaceable and quiet possession and enjoyment of his said dwelling-house at the time and in the manner in the said second plea mentioned. Fourthly, that the said replication asserts that the plaintiff was such guest, and drinking and consuming liquors in the manner and at the times therein mentioned; and also asserts that the defendant, of his own wrong, committed the trespasses mentioned, and that the said replication is on that account double. Fifthly, that it does not appear from the said replication with sufficient certainty, how it was that the defendant of his own wrong committed the trespasses, or how it was wrong for the defendant to commit those trespasses. Sixthly, that it does not appear from the said replication, with sufficient certainty, whether the plaintiff intends to assert therein that the defendant committed the trespasses without the cause by him in his said second plea alleged. Seventhly, that it is uncertain whether or no the said replication intends to assert that the defendant committed the trespasses without the cause mentioned in that plea, and also under the circumstances set forth in the said replication, or whether it intends to assert that it was wrong of the defendant to commit those trespasses, because of the matters stated in the said second plea not being true, or because of the circumstances set forth in the said replication.

Joinders in demurrer.

Pearson, in support of the replication to the second plea, and the demurrer to the fourth.—The second plea is merely pleaded to the assault and battery, leaving out all statement of imprisonment: it is a good answer to so much as it professes to answer; and there was no necessity for saying any thing about noise and disturbance, since a person has a right to turn another out of his house under any circumstances. That may be considered as struck out, and need not be noticed in pleading—2 Saund. 638, b, n. 1. The replication, therefore, did not allude to it, and the defendant might have rejoined the noise and disturbance, the rejoinder being in the nature of a new assignment—Taylor v. Cole (1), Monprivatt v. Smith (2), Sayre v. Lord Rochford (3), King v. Phippard (4).

[WIGHTMAN, J.—You seem to make the averment that the defendant was making noise and disturbance, material by passing it over—Six Carpenters case (5).]

Then the fourth plea is clearly bad, as it shews that the house was a tavern and alehouse, and shews no application to the plaintiff to go out—Price v. Seeley (6), where all the cases are collected, Baynes v. Brewster (7), Green v. Bartram (8), Wheeler v. Whiting (9), Grant v. Moser (10), Timothy v. Simpson (11). The obstruction and nuisance as alleged is not sufficient to justify the giving the plaintiff in charge—Ingle v. Bell (12), Cohen v. Huskisson (13); and it is not averred that the constable had view of the breach of the peace—Reece v. Taylor (14), Wheeler v. Whiting.

[ERLE, J.—I think it must be taken that the breach of the peace was in sight of the constable, as the plaintiff is alleged to be committing a breach of the peace at the very time he is removed by the constable.]

T. Jones.—Cohen v. Huskisson is a decisive authority in favour of the defendant, as the plea expressly avers as much as was there held to amount to a breach of the peace. And it is not made a ground of special demurrer that a breach of the peace is not sufficiently shewn. Then the replication to the fourth plea is informal, as it amounts to an argumentative traverse of the defendant's exclusive possession of the house, which is prima facie sufficiently averred in the plea—Monks v. Dykes (15). If the house is not to be taken to be a public house, the disturbance is material; and if it is, then the traverse is argumentative. The replication to the second plea is double, as it contains matter in avoidance, and also a statement that the defendant of his own wrong arrested the trespasser.

Pearson, in reply.—The words "of his own wrong" do not amount to a replication de injuriâ, unless the replication proceeds with the averment, that it was without the cause

&c.—Searle v. Darford (16). There was no such possession by the defendant as entitled him to turn the plaintiff out. As to the breach of the peace, it is not said that the plaintiff committed any, but that persons congregated in breach of the peace.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The plaintiff complains that he has been assaulted and improperly turned out of the defendant's house and imprisoned. The second plea is, that the plaintiff misconducted himself in the defendant's house, and created a noise and disturbance, and was requested to leave it, and justifies the assaulting him in turning him out. The plaintiff, by his replication, sets up his right to be in the defendant's house, as it was a public house, and that he was drinking there at a proper hour, and that the defendant, of his own wrong, committed the trespass. Assuming that the plaintiff had a right to be in the public house so long as he conducted himself properly, I think the replication is bad, as the plaintiff does not say that he was conducting himself properly. The replication goes on to allege that the defendant, of his own wrong, turned him out: it may be, that the particular words used cannot be considered as negating the cause alleged, and the case in Lutwyche bears this out. The fourth plea is the imprisonment.—[His Lordship stated the substance of the plea.]—It is stated that the plaintiff stood at the door of the house, causing a number of persons to congregate together. It is said that the plaintiff is not alleged as doing anything which amounts to an offence; but it is a matter of the defence of right of quiet possession. We should endanger the peace of society if we did not recognize the right of a police officer to interfere under such circumstances; and if so, he was properly set in motion by the defendant.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the defendant is entitled to judgment on both pleas. As to the second plea, I think that the replication gave no answer to it on the facts which the replication admits.—[His Lordship read the second plea.]—The replication alleges that the dwelling-house is a public house, and the plaintiff had lawfully entered and was drinking there. If the plea had stated no more than possession and entry by the plaintiff, it might have been perhaps well contended that the replication contained an answer, but here the plea alleges that the plaintiff was making a noise and disturbance; that is not answered by the replication: it stands therefore admitted on the record, that the plaintiff was making a noise and disturbance; and it is contended that this should have been rejoined; but it is not necessary to rejoin matter which already appears to be admitted on looking at the whole pleadings. I have had some doubt about the fourth plea, but I think, on the authority of Cohen v. Huskisson, that the plaintiff was guilty of a public nuisance, and that the officer must be taken to have had a view of this, as the plaintiff was, at the time he was taken, in the act of committing the nuisance complained of.

ERLE, J.—I think the plaintiff ought to have replied de injurid to the second plea. The facts in the commencement of that plea amount to an allegation that the plaintiff was, at the time, a trespasser, and if the defendant must have proved that the plaintiff was in the house without his consent or leave, and unlawfully making a disturbance, the plea is good, and the replication does not answer the material part of it. I think also the fourth plea is good. If any act amounts to a breach of the peace, and the policeman has view of it, he may take the party committing the act into custody. There is, in this case, no averment of an assault; but it is said that the plaintiff did certain acts, occasioning a breach of the peace, and no doubt the acts alleged might amount to a breach of the peace. I would not say that merely making a noise in the street could be so considered; but no man can fail to see that the matters alleged here might of themselves amount to a breach of the peace: and I have already observed that the policeman who takes him in the act must be considered as having a view of that which is being done.

The cause was tried, before Platt, B. at the Wiltshire Summer Assizes, 1846, when it appeared that the action was brought to recover 166l. 3s. from the defendants under the following circumstances:—On the 10th of May 1846 the defendants Messrs. Fennell & Co. as the London agents of Messrs. Slade & Jones, attorneys at Devizes, and by their instructions issued a fi. fa. in an action of Robbins v. Heath, indorsed to levy 157l. 5s., and on the following day lodged it with the town agents of the under-sheriff of Wilts, with instructions to them to issue a warrant to the officer at Melksham, to whom they also wrote directing him to go to Slade & Jones immediately on receipt of the warrant for instructions. On the 14th of May the officer levied 166l. 3s., and having afterwards called at the office of Slade & Jones, but not finding them at home, he forwarded the amount to the under-sheriff at Salisbury, according to the regular course of his duty. The under-sheriff, without any instructions from Slade & Jones, remitted the amount to the defendants Messrs. Fennell & Co., whose names were indorsed on the warrant as agents to Slade & Jones, it appearing to be the practice of the sheriff's office to remit the proceeds of executions to the London agent if the warrant was granted in London. Application was made to the defendants to pay over this money under an authority from the plaintiff and from Slade & Jones, but the defendants replied that they had applied it towards a balance due to them from Slade & Jones for agency business, and refused to pay it over to the plaintiff. No evidence was given at the trial of the existence of any debt from Slade & Jones to the defendants. At the close of the plaintiff's case the defendants' counsel claimed a nonsuit on the ground that there was no privy shewn to exist between the plaintiff and the defendants—Stephens v. Badcock (1) and Cobb v. Becke (2) were referred to. The learned Judge reserved leave to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit on this objection, and the plaintiff had a verdict for 166*l.* 3*s.*

Crowder, in the ensuing term, obtained a rule nisi accordingly, or for a new trial.

Montague Smith and Taprell shewed cause (Nov. 27).—This case falls directly within the rule in Moody v. Spencer (3), that money received by the town agent in the course of the suit from the opposite party for his client, is received to the use of the client. Cobb v. Becke differed in its circumstances, but expressly recognizes Moody v. Spencer. It is there said, "If Cobb (the client) had transmitted the money direct to the defendants, or if he had desired Dalby (the country attorney) to transmit it to them specifically, and they had received it as from Cobb, and not as from Dalby, doubtless they would have become Cobb's agents, and accountable to him for the appropriation of it."

[COLERIDGE, J.—This never was the client's money, as it was in Moody v. Spencer.]

It was money paid specifically on a particular account, and not generally; the plaintiff has, therefore, a right to recover it. It is not necessary there should be a strict privity; the plaintiff might have recovered the amount of the levy from the sheriff as money had and received, if it had not been paid over. Calland v. Lloyd (4) is in point. Stephens v. Badcock will be relied on; but there the receipt by the clerk to the attorney was held to be a receipt by the attorney himself, to whom alone the defendant was accountable. White v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (5) affirms the principle, that an agent cannot set up against the party to the cause his own claim against the country attorney.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Could these defendants have pleaded a set-off for a debt due to them from the country attorney?]

They could have no lien on the money received by them for the general balance due—Maaness v. Henderson (6), Story on Agency, s. 387. Yates v. Freckleton (7) shews that the payment in this case was a good payment to the client. Goode v. Jones (8) is a direct authority in this case.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—That is hardly reconcilable with Cobb v. Becke. Williams v. Everett (9) and Lilly v. Hays (10) lay down the rule that where an agent receives money on account of a third party, he continues liable to his principal until he enters into some binding engagement to pay it to the third party.]

There, no relation subsisted between the plaintiff and defendant; here, the defendants issued the warrant as agents for the plaintiff. There must be some privity between the client and the town agents. The acts of the agent are, as against the opposite party, the acts of the client—Griffiths v. Williams (11). Primarily, the country attorney is liable to the agent, but the client may become so—Scrace v. Whittington (12).

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Admitting that to be so, it does not make the defendants agents of the plaintiff, but of Slade & Jones.]

There was a case of Hanby v. Cassin (13) in the Exchequer two days ago, where on an application against a town agent, who had received the amount of a judgment debt, and claimed to set off a debt due to him from the country attorney, the Court held that he could not do so, but must be considered as agent of the client. But even if the defendants received the money contrary to their duty, the plaintiff may still waive the tort and treat it as money received to his use—Down v. Halling (14), Buchanan

[COLERIDGE, J.—If the receipt is wrongful, the plaintiff may also treat the payment to the defendants as wrongful, and maintain an action for money had and received against the sheriff.]

That may be a consequence; but it does not shew that he may not recover this money from the defendants.

Crowder (Butt was with him), contra.—This rule was obtained on the authority of Stephens v. Badcock and Bamford v. Shuttleworth (18), which shew that to maintain this action, there must be privity of contract between the parties; and it lies on the plaintiff to shew anything in this particular case which takes it out of the general rule of law. Moody v. Spencer is unquestionably to some extent an authority in favour of the action; but it is not found reported in any other book besides Dowling & Ryland, and must be considered at least doubtful law. The case of Hanby v. Cassin, referred to, was an application, as it seems, to the summary jurisdiction of the Court, and decides nothing as to the present question.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—At present we do not think it necessary to hear you further; but we will inquire into that case in the Exchequer before deciding the present rule.]

The judgment of the Court (19) was (Dec. 11,) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This case appeared to us, after it had been fully argued, to be almost identical with Cobb v. Becke, which we distinguished, in delivering our opinion, from Moody v. Spencer. The distinction is not perhaps a very satisfactory one, but if these two cases are at variance, we give the preference to that which is not only much later in point of time, but which underwent much greater consideration. We delayed our decision, because the Court of Exchequer was said to have recently taken a different view of the general doctrine, which is undoubtedly of very great importance. And we have made inquiry on the subject, and are indebted for a report of the proceeding in Hanby v. Cassin, to the last number of the Law Times, which we have reason to think correct. This is the marginal note: "When a London agent has been instructed by the attorney in the country to commence an action, and he receives the money from the defendant in the suit, and instead of paying it over in cash to the country attorney, puts it to his account, which is afterwards settled, the Court will nevertheless compel the London agent to pay the money again to the principal (the plaintiff in the action), as the payment to the attorney is payment to him in the character of an attorney, and as the agent of the plaintiff." We can easily conceive the town agent making himself liable to the client for particular sums, and that the Court may be desirous of inferring such liability from circumstances for the purpose of exercising its summary jurisdiction over its officers, to enforce justice according to the equity of each individual case. But, when the client, as in this case, appears as plaintiff in an action for money had and received, and the defendant pleads non assumpsit, there can be no recovery unless the law will imply a contract to pay on request from the relation which the several parties bear towards each other. The client who employs the attorney is answerable to him for costs, and in case of negligence or misconduct must come upon him for redress. He is entitled to credit for all sums the attorney may happen to owe him, and though he probably knows that the business must be carried on by a town agent, his payment for it to such agent is no discharge to him against the attorney—Yates v. Freckleton. In like manner, the attorney employs and is liable to the town agent, who knows nothing of the client but his name, and is not even to that extent known by him. The town agent could not maintain an action for work and labour against the plaintiff by whom he was not employed, and the rights and liabilities of the parties in such a case would be reciprocal. Some expressions fell from Lord Hardwicke (20) which describe the mutual relation of the three characters very clearly. The six clerk in Chancery refused to file a certificate till his fees were paid, but his Lordship mentioned an order which establishes that the six clerk cannot come on the client or the solicitor, but must come on the sixty clerk for his fees. With him (the sixty clerk) is the client or solicitor to have privity or connexion, so that payment to him is conclusive to the six clerk, and he is not obliged to pay twice, having paid the proper hand. The practice has been since, that the sixty clerk has taken upon himself to pay the six clerk, between whom and the client all intercourse is cut off. This being the state of things, as one of two innocent parties must suffer by the misconduct of a third, and we are driven to inquire where the legal liability resides, we cannot help saying, in conformity to former cases and to the principle of Williams v. Everett so often lately recognized, that it results from the privity existing between the two parties. It is remarkable, that the decision from which we find ourselves compelled to dissent appears to have been made without reference to the late case of Cobb v. Becke or any other authority.

Rule absolute to enter a nonsuit.

In Hilary term, M. Smith obtained a rule calling upon Messrs. Fennell & Co. to shew cause why they should not pay over to the plaintiff the sum of 166*l.* 3*s.*, after deducting their costs. The affidavits on which this rule was founded, besides the facts stated in the preceding case, set out the following letters:—

"From Slade & Jones to the Under-sheriff.

"Devises, 16th May 1846.

"Robbins v. Heath.—The officer informs me that he has remitted you the amount of debt and our costs herein. We shall feel obliged by your remitting us your cheque for the same at your earliest convenience."

"From the Under-sheriff to Slade & Jones.

"Salisbury, May 18, 1846.

"Dear Sirs.—Robbins v. Heath.—The amount of levy, &c. herein (166*l.* 3*s.*) was forwarded to Messrs. Fennell & Co., your agents, by Saturday evening's post."

"From Messrs. Fennell & Co. to Slade & Jones.

"Bedford Row, 18th May 1846.

"Dear Sirs.—Robbins v. Heath.—We have had remitted to us, through Williams & Co., the sum of 166*l.* 3*s.* * * * You had better let us know what we are to do with the money remitted us by the under-sheriff."

"From the Same to the Same.

"Bedford Row, 23rd May 1846.

"Dear Sirs.—Robbins v. Heath.—We are really surprised at your asking us to remit the amount received in this matter. We have applied it in part liquidation of the large balance due from you, and therefore cannot think of remitting any portion of it."

The letter of Slade & Jones, to which this was a reply, was not stated in the affidavits on either side.

Crowder and Butt now shewed cause.—The application cannot be maintained without shewing some privity between the client and town agent: in fact, this is an attempt to agitate again the question decided in Robbins v. Fennell. If new facts can be produced a fresh action should be brought. Ex parte Jones (21), and Gray v. Kirby (22) were cited.

M. Smith and Taprell, contra.—This application to the summary authority of the Court does not depend upon privity; but the Court will see whether Fennell & Co. are retaining money to which they have no right. This motion is not in opposition to, but a consequence of, the decision in Robbins v. Fennell.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—We did not there intend to draw any distinction in favour of summary applications, except where there is fraud.]

The fact of retaining money paid by mistake, and without any authority from Slade & Jones, does amount to fraud—In re Ann Oliver (23), Yates v. Freckleton. The Courts frequently interfere against an attorney where there is no privity, and where no action would lie: compelling a steward to hand over documents received by him in his capacity of attorney, and obliging an attorney to return the premium to an articulated clerk who has broken his contract are familiar instances. Ex parte Jones was a case arising out of the negligence of the agent. Gray v. Turvey was an application against a country attorney, who was compelled to pay.

(21) 2 Dowl. P.C. 161.

(23) 2 Ad. & El. 620.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—After some consideration I think this is one of the cases contemplated by us in our former decision, and that the client may compel the town agent to refund this money, which did not come to his hands in his character of town agent, but out of the regular course of business; for they write to ask what they are to do with it; the answer to that letter is not brought before us, but the reply of the agents is set out, and that pretty clearly shews what the answer must have been. On this short state of facts, I think the money was evidently received by Fennell & Co. by mistake; and if so, it ought not to be applied towards payment of the balance due to them from Slade & Jones. My only doubt is, as there has been a trial, whether we ought to allow the plaintiff to come on the agents except by a fresh action; but I think, on the whole, we are bound to say that this money was received improperly, and therefore ought to be paid over to the client.

PATTESON, J.—If there had been no special circumstances to render the London agent himself liable, I should have thought there was no distinction between an action for money had and received and a special application against the agents. But this money was received by the agents in consequence of the bailiff not finding the person to whom he was bound to pay it, and therefore the under-sheriff sent it up to them. It is remarkable that these persons do not give us the answer received from Slade & Jones, but it is manifest from their reply that they did not assent to its being placed against their account. The nonsuit was right in the action, for there was no privity; but such an application as the present need not rest on privity, but will turn on the special circumstances brought before us.

COLERIDGE, J. and WIGHTMAN, J. concurred.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. added—I am not sure that if these facts had been proved at the trial, the action might not have lain, on the ground of a wrongful detainer of the money by Fennell & Co.

	425	10	0

At the trial, before Wightman, J., at the Sittings in London, after Trinity term, 1846, it appeared that the plaintiff, who was an auctioneer, had been employed by the defendants in the sale of the Cove estate mentioned in the particulars. By various letters which passed between the parties in April 1845, at which time the plaintiff was employed, the terms of engagement were clearly proved to be as follows:—That the plaintiff was to be paid 1*l.* per cent. on the amount at which the estate might be sold, such commission to include every expense incident to the sale, such commission to obtain whether the estate was sold by private contract before the sale, by auction on the day of sale, or by private contract after the day of the sale by auction; but it was to be understood that "if the estate was not sold within two months after the day of auction the plaintiff was to receive one-half per cent only."

The estate was advertised for sale by auction on the 6th of August 1845. On that day it was put up at the auction mart, and was bought in, there being no bidding higher than 34,000*l.* On the 2nd of October it was sold by private contract for 40,050*l.*

On the 11th of December 1845 the plaintiff wrote to the defendants claiming the 1*l.* per cent. commission, and received the following letter in answer:—

"Bungay, Dec. 12.

"Dear Sir,—When will you be at Halesworth that we may come over to see you and liquidate your claim. If we remit through our bankers they will charge you 3*l.* or so for commission, which perhaps you may not like to pay. Yours truly, Margetson and Hartup."

Subsequently, however, the defendants, who acted for executors, refused to pay more than one-half per cent. on the ground that the sale did not take place within two months from the day of auction; the 2nd of October being one day more than two lunar months from the 6th of August. The particulars of sale were in evidence at the trial, and one of the conditions of sale was, that the purchaser should, within one "calendar month" from the delivery of the abstract of title, send to the vendor's solicitor a statement in writing of his objections (if any) to the title, &c. It was contended, on the part of the defendants, that the word "month," in the correspondence, must be taken to mean "lunar month." On the part of the plaintiffs, evidence was tendered of auctioneers and other persons, to shew that the word "month," in contracts of this description was, in the trade, considered as meaning "calendar month." This evidence was objected to, and subsequently withdrawn. The Judge thought that the meaning of the word "month" was rather a question of law than fact, and remarked on the circumstance of the words "calendar month" being used in the conditions of sale; but left the question to the jury, on the various documents, and the verdict passed for the plaintiff, leave being reserved for the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit or verdict for them.

Watson, in Michaelmas term, 1846, moved for a rule nisi, accordingly, and cited The Bishop of Peterborough v. Catesby (1), Barksdale v. Morgan (2), Jocelyn v. Hawkins (3), Titus v. Lady Preston (4).

A rule having been granted,—

Byles, Serj. and Unthank shewed cause (Nov. 4).—First, the meaning of the word "month," in a mercantile contract, is a question of fact; it is one of those words which, in these matters, has a technical or peculiar signification—Smith v. Wil- son (5), Hutchison v. Bowker (6), and the jury have found a verdict on the evidence, which was not objected to, of the letters and other documents relating to the contract. In Lang v. Gale (7), which was the case of an agreement for the sale of land, it was held that the intention of the contracting parties was to be looked to, to decide whether "a month" was to be taken to mean a "lunar" or a "calendar" month: here the letters and admissions shewed that both parties considered that a "calendar month" was intended. But even if the question be one of law, this is a mercantile contract, and therefore "month" means "calendar month"—The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Chawton (8), Jolly v. Young (9), Hipswell v. Knight (10), Webb v. Fairmaner (11), Titus v. Lady Preston, which was subsequent to the case of Jocelyn v. Hawkins. In Cockell v. Gray (12), it was held that a statement on the record that the defendant covenanted to pay a sum in twelve months was no variance from the covenant proved, which was to pay in twelve calendar months—The Bishop of Peterborough v. Catesby. In The King v. Cussens (13), it was held that the word "month," in the statute 13 Hen. 4. c. 7. meant "an almanac month," and was not confined to twenty-eight days—Haigh v. Brooks (14), Dyke v. Sweeting (15), Neilson v. Harford (16), Seton v. Slade (17). In notices to quit, "six months" means neither lunar nor calendar months, but the space from one quarter day to the next but one. Words are construed with reference to the subject-matter of the instrument in which they occur, as "equally to be divided"—Fisher v. Wigg (18), Mallan v. May (19), Ditcham v. Chivis (20), Beckford v. Crutwell (21). But here, as any ambiguity which exists in the contract is latent, it may be explained by the subsequent acts of the parties—Bourne v. Gatliff (22), Clayton v. Gregson (23).

- (3) 1 Stra. 446.
- (4) Ibid. 652.

[COLERIDGE, J.—What evidence raises the ambiguity here?]

Perhaps this case does not fall strictly within the principle of either patent or latent ambiguity; but it more nearly resembles the latter.

Watson, in support of the rule.—The general rule is, that in construing all contracts and acts of parties "month" means lunar month—Com. Dig. 'Ann.' B. The exceptions to the rule are: first, where it can be collected from the context that the parties meant calendar months; secondly, in matters ecclesiastical "month" means calendar month; and thirdly, where a particular mercantile usage has given the word a different meaning in a contract shewn to be entered into with reference to that usage, that meaning will be adopted. Lang v. Gale and The Queen v. Chawton are instances of the first class. The cases of bills of exchange and of lading fall within the last exception as to usage. But here no evidence of any usage was given.

[COLERIDGE, J. referred to Webb v. Fairmaner.]

If a custom were shewn applicable to all contracts of this kind, it would undoubtedly regulate this contract, but not otherwise—Jocelyn v. Hawkins. The rule in sales of estates is that laid down in Sugd. Vendor and Purchaser, p. 361, that the meaning of the word depends on the context.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The effect of the letters went to the jury, and they found that calendar months were meant. How can the defendant come here after that?]

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Mr. Watson contended that I was to decide the question. I thought it was for the jury, and left it to them.]

The Judge was bound to decide on the meaning of the contract, and could not look beyond the contract for that purpose; these letters were put in with a different view, and being admissible for that purpose, they could not be objected to on the score of irrelevancy to the contract.

[COLERIDGE, J.—Could he not look at the conditions of sale?]

Not for the purpose of construing the contract. The question whether, a document takes a case out of the Statute of Limitations is a matter of law, and for the Judge to decide.

[ERLE, J.—Surely, in that case, a subsequent admission of liability would be evidence of the intention of a party when the document was written, if it were ambiguous.]

It is submitted that no extraneous evidence can be received for that purpose. But further, this evidence, if admissible, does not at all affect the meaning of the contract.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. now (Nov. 25) delivered the judgment of the Court.—The plaintiff, an auctioneer, claimed commission upon the sale of an estate under a contract for the payment thereof, if the sale should be within two months after an auction; the sale was not within two lunar months, but was within two calendar months after the auction. A letter from the plaintiff, claiming the commission, and an answer from the defendant, apparently admitting his liability, were in evidence; the plaintiff proposed to call witnesses to prove that according to the usage in the business of auctioneers, "months" signified calendar months, but, on objection, withdrew the evidence. The learned Judge directed the jury to find for the plaintiff, if in their judgment on this evidence the parties to the contract intended by "months" calendar months, and the verdict was for the plaintiff.

The defendants obtained a rule to enter a nonsuit according to the leave reserved, or for a new trial, and have contended, that month in temporal matters means lunar month, unless either from the context or from the usage in a trade, business, or place, it is made to appear that the parties intended another meaning; that there was no such evidence here; that other extrinsic evidence was inadmissible, and that it was, therefore, the duty of the Judge to have construed the contract, and decided against the plaintiff. The plaintiff has adduced various decisions to support the verdict, but we are of opinion that he has not succeeded. It is clear that the construction of a written contract, subject to the exceptions mentioned below, is for the Judge. It is also clear that "months" denote in law lunar months, unless there is admissible evidence of an intention in the parties using the word to denote calendar months. If the context shows that calendar months were intended, the Judge may adopt that construction—Lang v. Gale and The Queen v. Chawton. If the surrounding circumstances at the time the instrument was made shew that the parties intended to use the word not in its primary or strict sense, but in some secondary meaning, the Judge may construe it from such circumstances, according to the intention of the parties—Goldshede v. Swan (24), Walker v. Hunter (25), Bacon's Maxims, 10, and the examples there given, Mallan v. May and Beckford v. Crutwell. If there is evidence that the word was used in a sense peculiar to a trade, business, or place, the jury must say whether the parties used it in that peculiar sense—Smith v. Wilson, Grant v. Maddox (26), Jolly v. Young. If the meaning of a word depends upon the usage of the place, where anything under the instrument is to be done, evidence of such usage must be left to the jury—Robertson v. Jackson (27), Bourne v. Gatliff. Also the jury may have to give the meaning of some technical words. But the present case is not within either of the above principles, nor can we find any authority for saying that the conduct of the parties to a written contract is alone admissible evidence to withdraw the construction of a word therein of a settled primary meaning from the Judge, and to transfer it to the jury.

Some cases were cited, where the word "month" has been stated by Judges to mean calendar and not lunar month, without express reference to the context or circumstances. But those cases appear to be decided on some other point; and the dicta which are reported are observations collateral to the judgment—Dyke v. Sweeting, Hipswell v. Knight, Webb v. Fairmaner.

Although the evidence that was given does not appear to us sufficient to support the verdict, yet as evidence was withdrawn which may be important, we think that the plaintiff should have an opportunity of again tendering it; and, therefore, make the rule absolute for a new trial.

In April 1839, prior to the grant of a separate Court of Quarter Sessions to the borough of Birmingham, situate within the county of Warwick, a resolution was come to, and duly entered in the minutes of the town council, for paying the sum of 11d. per head per day for one year, for the maintenance of the borough prisoners in the county gaol and house of correction, there being no gaol or house of correction in the borough, and this resolution was agreed to by the county Justices. In September 1839, after the grant of the Court of Quarter Sessions, an account was made out and allowed on the above principle. In January 1841 the county Justices resolved that the borough Justices had no power to commit to the county house of correction, and such prisoners were detained at expense and inconvenience to the borough, till county Justices could attend to commit them.

In consequence of doubts as to the validity of the charter of the borough of B, and other circumstances, no other accounts were sent in, in reference to the above charges, till September 1842, when an account was sent in to the council charging for prisoners confined in the gaol and house of correction, at the rate of 11d. per head up to the 30th of June 1842. The statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98. passed on the 10th of August 1842:—Held, that in pursuance of that statute such accounts were rightly altered, so as to charge the actual expense of the borough prisoners instead of the 11d. per head per day—the statute rendering the borough liable to such charge of the actual expenses, both prospectively and retrospectively, and that no deduction could be made in respect of the prisoners committed by the borough Justices to the county house of correction, subsequently to January 1841.

The statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 110. provided that the gaol of the city of Coventry should be a gaol of the county of Warwick, to be purchased and paid for by the county out of the monies in the hands of the treasurer:—Held, that the borough of Birmingham, which had a separate Court of Quarter Sessions, was liable to pay its proportion of the county rate for the purchase of the gaol.

Vendor and Purchaser—Costs of Bill for Specific Performance—Damages.

The plaintiff contracted for the purchase of an estate from the defendant; the plaintiff's solicitor made objections to the title as disclosed by the abstract; the defendant affirmed it to be good, and threatened to resell the estate if the plaintiff did not complete. The plaintiff afterwards filed a bill for a specific performance against the defendant: the defendant, by his answer, still contended that the title was good. The Master (to whom it was referred) reported that the defendant could not make a good title according to the terms of the contract, and the plaintiff's bill was, thereupon, dismissed, without costs:—Held, that the plaintiff could not recover against the defendant in an action at law his costs of the Chancery suit.

Assumpsit for 238l. 13s. 5d., claimed as damages on the contract hereinafter mentioned, by reason of the defendant having failed to make a good title to the lands therein referred to.

Replication, that the plaintiff had sustained damages ultra that sum.

At the trial, before Patterson, J., at the Sittings in Middlesex, in Michaelmas term, 1846, a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, damages 138*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.*, subject to the opinion of the Court on the following

CASE.

On the 13th of August 1842, a contract was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, whereby the defendant agreed to sell and the plaintiff agreed to purchase certain lands and premises at the price of 350*l.*, subject to certain conditions of sale annexed to the contract. The plaintiff immediately on the execution of the contract paid to the defendant 35*l.* in part of the purchase-money. The plaintiff's solicitor objected to the title as disclosed by the abstract, and called for further evidence in support of it. The defendant's solicitor insisted that the title was unobjectionable, regard being had to the conditions of sale. Several letters passed, and interviews took place between the solicitors of the respective parties upon the subject, and at length, on the 24th of April 1843, the defendant, by his solicitor, gave the plaintiff notice that unless he did, within eight days, complete the purchase, he would proceed to re-sell the property, and that if there should be any deficiency occasioned by such second sale, he would proceed to recover it from the plaintiff, pursuant to the terms of the contract. On the 2nd of May 1843, the plaintiff, by his solicitor, gave the defendant notice of his intention to file a bill against him to compel him specifically to perform the contract of the 13th of August 1842, and also for an injunction to restrain him from selling or conveying away the property, and that if he did sell it or convey any part of it, he would be held responsible for so doing, and for all costs and expenses occasioned thereby. On the 3rd of May 1843, the plaintiff filed a bill in the Court of Chancery against the defendant, praying for a specific performance of the said contract, for an abatement from the purchase-money, in respect of certain taxes charged on the lands comprised in the particulars of sale, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from selling, conveying, or disposing of the property. On the 13th of July 1843, the defendant filed his answer to the said bill, in which (amongst other things) it was stated, that ever since the contract was entered into he had alleged, and that he did still allege, that he possessed and could shew a good title to the said premises so sold to the plaintiff as aforesaid, such as by the terms of the contract he was bound to do, but not further or otherwise. The bill was amended, and a further answer was filed by the defendant on the 26th of October 1843. Witnesses were examined on the 7th of February 1844, and the cause came on for hearing before his Lordship the Master of the Rolls on the 8th of July 1844, when a decree was made referring it to the Master of the Court in rotation to inquire and state to the Court whether the defendant could make a good title to the premises comprised in the said agreement, having regard to the terms of the said agreement. On the 18th of November 1845, Master Dowdeswell reported that the defendant could not make a good title to the said premises.

That report was subsequently confirmed by the Court; and on the 15th of March 1846, an order was made by the Master of the Rolls, whereby his Lordship did order that the plaintiff's bill should stand dismissed out of court, without costs.

It is the practice of the Court of Chancery when a bill for a specific performance of a contract is dismissed, owing to the inability of the defendant to perform it, to dismiss such bill without costs.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover in the present action any part of the costs incurred by him in instituting and prosecuting the said suit in Chancery.

If the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff was so entitled, then the bill of costs of the plaintiff's solicitor was to be taxed in such manner as the Court should direct, and whatever sum was taxed off (after allowing to the plaintiff the costs of taxation), to be deducted from the said sum of 138*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.*, and the verdict found for the plaintiff was to stand for the residue. If the Court should be of a contrary opinion, then the verdict was to be entered for the defendant.

It was agreed that the pleadings, as well as the various documents referred to, should be considered as forming part of the case.

The plaintiff's points were, that, under the circumstances stated in the case, he is entitled to recover the costs incurred by him, as above mentioned.

The defendant's points were, that, under the circumstances stated in the case, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the costs incurred by him in instituting and prosecuting the suit in Chancery mentioned in the case, or any part of such costs, the instituting and prosecuting such suits not being a necessary consequence of the breach of contract, for which the action was brought.

Maistry, for the plaintiff (Nov. 16).

—The plaintiff is entitled to recover these costs as damages for the inconvenience and loss he has sustained. The defendant covenanted to make a good title; and the reason for dismissing the plaintiff's bill was not that the plaintiff had not a right to require a good title, but that a specific performance would be useless to him if no better title were given. This was not the ordinary case of a bill for specific performance. The plaintiff had a right to file his bill, but the Court of Chancery could not do him perfect justice. Both parties here were wrong; but the plaintiff ought to get his costs out of the defendant's pocket in some way or other.

The goodness of the title was mere matter of opinion. The defendant, by his answer, pledges his oath to his belief that the title is good. It only turns out to be worthless on the investigation before the Master. Hopkins v. Graxebrook (1) is an authority that where a vendor holds out an estate as his own which really is not so, he must pay the loss occasioned by his misrepresentation — Sherry v. Oke (2).

[WIGHTMAN, J.—If you are right, you will succeed in the Chancery suit.]

The plaintiff has acted bond fide, and does not want to be off the bargain, but the defendant will not complete. In Walker v. Moore (3) the principle of law now contended for was not disputed; but the plaintiff failed, because he had sustained damage by reason of his prematurely contracting for the sale of that which he had contracted to purchase: that case was decided on the authority of Jones v. Dyke (4). In Hodges v. Lord Lichfield (5), the plaintiff attempted to recover the extra costs of a Chancery suit where a bill for a specific performance, filed by the defendant, had been dismissed with costs. There is nothing new in point of principle in one Court giving as damages costs which the party has been put to in prosecuting or defending an action brought in another: costs in error are so recoverable—Nowell v. Roake (6). In Hathaway v. Barrow (7) the principle was not disputed; but there the plaintiff was in a condition to recover his costs in the court of equity. Grace v. Morgan (8) was a claim for extra costs, and was decided on the authority of Hodges v. Lord Lichfield.

Martin, contra.—This is the first time such costs have been sought to be recovered in an action at law. First, these costs are too remote to be considered as damages. Secondly, assuming that in any case such costs might be recovered, still in this instance the plaintiff went into the court of equity of his own wrong, and must be taken to know the law. Thirdly, at all events, the claim is entirely put an end to by the judgment of the court of equity which dismissed the bill without costs. In Sherry v. Oke the damages recovered were occasioned directly by the breach of the defendant's contract. In Hopkins v. Graxebrook the case was put on the ground of the loss of a bargain sustained by the plaintiff, just as in the ordinary case of the sale of a chattel. The same may be said of Jones v. Dyke, where the plaintiff was put to loss in consequence of the defendant's contracting to sell an estate having no authority to do so. Hathaway v. Barrow is in the defendant's favour. Nowell v. Roake stands on a distinct ground. The lessor of the plaintiff has always been held entitled to recover the costs of the ejectment in an action for mesne profits, it being the only mode in which he can do so. Grace v. Morgan only decides that extra costs are not recoverable. All the heads of damage for breach of an agreement to make a good title are given in Sugd. Vend. and Purch., 11th edit. p. 428; but this is not alluded to. A title may be good or bad; but in either case the vendor only professes to sell it such as it is. When the defendant insisted that he was right, the plaintiff might have made a stand and left the defendant to file his bill; but he has no right to go into a court of equity for his own benefit at the vendor's expense.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—It is not quite clear that the defendant did all in his power to make a title; at all events, he was in the wrong, and it cannot be said that the plaintiff had not as much right to file a bill in equity as the defendant.]

The defendant never objected to convey, and the rule of the court of equity is not to give costs in such cases as this.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—On looking at the bill and answer, it appears that both the plaintiff and the defendant in fact rely on the same title: when the plaintiff filed his bill he may not have been aware that the defendant could not improve the title.]

But he was wrong. The defendant has stated the entire truth in his answer. In Loton v. Devereux (9), it was held, that where a judgment on which a defendant had been taken in execution had been set aside without costs, such costs could not be recovered as damages in an action of trespass. That case cannot in principle be distinguished from the present.

Manisty, in reply.—The courts of equity never dismiss a bill on payment of costs; they dismiss it with or without costs: by costs not being given the question is left open. In Loton v. Devereux this Court had already adjudicated on the question of costs, and decided that none were to be paid. Hodges v. Lord Lichfield is the converse of the present case.

(9) 3 B. & Ad. 343; a. c. 1 Law J. Rep. K.B. 103.

The judgment of the Court was now (Dec. 7,) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The special case found that the plaintiff had become the purchaser at an auction of an estate, the defendant's property, and, after paying the deposit, was dissatisfied with the title disclosed on the defendant's abstract. The defendant always insisted upon the sufficiency of his title, and of the evidence tendered to establish it. Under this persuasion, he threatened the plaintiff with a re-sale, and an action for not completing his purchase, in which he said he should seek to recover the difference between the price at which the estate had been knocked down to the plaintiff at the auction, and that which it might fetch on such re-sale.

In this state of things the plaintiff filed his bill against the defendant in the Court of Chancery, to enforce a specific performance of his agreement to sell the estate. The defendant in his answer professed his readiness to do so, and produced his title, with evidence. The question, whether he could make a good title was referred to a Master in Chancery, who reported to the Court that he was unable to do so; the bill was dismissed by the Master of the Rolls without costs to either party.

It does not appear whether the title then produced was the same as that which the plaintiff had previously seen and objected to. The dismissal of the bill was a matter of course, when the defendant appeared to want the power to perform his contract; and the refusal of costs to the defendant seems to have been required by justice, as the plaintiff's failure in his suit was occasioned by the defendant's incompetency to fulfil his own engagement. But the plaintiff has brought this action to recover (amongst other things) the costs to which he was put in the prosecution of his unsuccessful suit. Some of us thought it might be important, in one view of the case, to inquire into the practice of Chancery, and we cannot find or hear of any decision compelling the defendant to pay costs where the bill is dismissed in such a suit. We cannot, however, believe that the Court of Chancery does not possess the power to award costs to a plaintiff, under circumstances involving fraud in any part of the negotiation; but without frand the rule appears to be inflexible, that the unsuccessful plaintiff, though not liable to costs, does not recover them in Chancery.

The plaintiff asserts that these costs are the natural consequences of the defendant's breach of contract, coupled with his threat to re-sell the estate, and, as such, are recoverable. He rests his claim on the practice of Chancery, which, he contends, systematically lays these costs out of its consideration, and leaves them to be recovered in the action at law, for the damages resulting from that breach of contract, and urges that if he cannot so make good his loss at the expense of him who caused it he has no remedy. On the other hand, the general rule is set up, that the right to costs must always be considered as finally settled in the court where the question is adjudicated on, to which it is accessory. Several cases were quoted to this effect; and this principle was admitted in general to apply, so that if any costs were awarded, nothing beyond the sum taxed, according to the rules of the court, could be recovered as damages; or if costs were expressly withheld, by an adjudication in the particular case, none would be recoverable by suit in any other court. We are of opinion that this case falls within the same principle—the general rule of the Court of Chancery. A Court having full discretion must be taken to be intended to apply itself to an adjudication in every particular case which falls within it. In the case of Hodges v. the Earl of Lichfield, in which the plaintiff claimed as damages the extra costs of a suit for specific performance, Tindal, C.J. says, "The extra costs are not a damage which is a necessary consequence of a breach of this contract. The filing a bill for enforcing specific performance is one degree removed, and the plaintiff must take the consequences of the suit as in other cases." The case cited from the appendix to Sugden's Vendor and Purchaser, may perhaps admit of the explanation offered by that eminent Judge before named. At any rate, that case is a solitary decision at Nisi Prius, though the same state of facts must have existed frequently, and have founded innumerable claims to similar redress.

Case. The declaration stated for that whereas the plaintiff, before and at the time of the committing of the grievances, &c. by the defendant, was lawfully possessed of a certain close of land called and known as Trigon Hill, situate and being contiguous and next adjoining to a certain other close of land of the defendant, called and known as Cary, situate and being, &c. and then in the actual occupation and possession of the defendant, and during all the time aforesaid the plaintiff was also lawfully possessed of certain hedges, fences, gates, &c. then respectively standing and being in and upon the aforesaid close of the plaintiff, and also of certain trees, &c. then respectively standing, growing, and being in and upon the aforesaid close of the plaintiff, and thereupon it became and was the duty of the defendant not to commit the grievances hereinafter mentioned. Yet the defendant, well knowing the premises, and not regarding his said duty, but contriving, &c. to injure and aggrieve the plaintiff, heretofore, to wit, on &c., wrongfully lighted and kept and caused and procured to be lighted and kept in and upon his said close (to wit, upon that part of it called and known as Cary Heath), a certain fire in such a careless, negligent, and improper manner, and at a time when by reason of the then state of the wind and weather it was dangerous so to do, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, that by and through the mere negligence, carelessness, and improper conduct of the defendant and his servants in that behalf, and for want of due and proper care and caution on his and their part, the said fire then, to wit, &c., extended itself from and out of the said close of the defendant, to, into, and upon the aforesaid close of the plaintiff, and to, into, and upon the said hedges, &c. of the plaintiff, and thereby the hedges, &c. respectively of the plaintiff of the value, &c. then became ignited and caught fire, and were then respectively much burnt, damaged, and destroyed, and by means of the premises the plaintiff's close became damaged, &c., and by means of the premises the plaintiff, in order to prevent the said fire from extending and doing further and greater damage to his said close and property, was then forced and obliged to pay divers sums of money, to wit, &c., in and about extinguishing the said fire, and staying and preventing the further progress and extension thereof to other parts of the said close and property of the plaintiff.

First plea, not guilty. There was also another plea, on which no question arose.

At the trial, before Cresswell, J., at the Spring Assizes for Dorsetshire, in 1847, the plaintiff recovered a verdict for 7*l.* damages.

In Easter term—

Kinglake, Serj. obtained a rule nisi to arrest the judgment, on the ground, that though at common law such an action might be maintainable, yet that since the statutes 6 Ann. c. 31. and 14 Geo. 3. c. 78. s. 86. no action could be brought for damage occasioned by a fire which was the result of accident (as distinguished from design), though there might have been negligence—Vaughan v. Menlove (1), Lord Canterbury v. the Attorney General (2), Turbervil v. Stamp (3).

Barstow shewed cause (Dec. 9.)—The argument on the other side must go to the extent, that the statutes referred to put an end to all liability for negligent fires of any kind, though the liability at common law is not disputed. It is said that the construction put on statute 6 Anne, c. 31 (4), in 1 Black. Com. 451, is recognized by Lord

(3) 1 Salk. 13.

(4) The statute 6 Ann. c. 31. was repealed by statute 12 Geo. 3. c. 73. s. 46, which was also repealed by 14 Geo. 3. c. 78. s. 101. By the latter statute, however, (see sec. 101.) the above act of 6 Ann. c. 31. continues repealed. The statute 14 Geo. 3. c. 78, intituled "An act for the further and better regulation of buildings and party walls, and for more effectually preventing mischief by fire, within the cities of London and Westminster, and the liberties thereof, and other parishes within the weekly bills of mortality, &c., and for indemnifying builders and other persons against the penalties to which they are or may be liable for erecting buildings within the limits aforesaid contrary to law;" after reciting that fires often happen by the negligence and carelessness of servants, enacts, "That if any menial or other servant or servants through negligence or carelessness, shall Lyndhurst, in Lord Canterbury v. the Queen (5), but the operation of the acts of parliament referred to, was clearly intended to be local, and to be confined to the limits over which the building acts extend. The facts stated on this record exclude altogether the supposition that the fire was accidental, as distinguished from carelessness or negligence; and the objection now raised was not suggested in Piggot v. the Eastern Counties Railway (6), where the plaintiff obtained a verdict.

Kinglake, Serj. and Stock, contra.—It is admitted that at common law an action might be brought for damage arising from a negligent fire: what, then, was the difficulty which the statutes were passed to remedy? Blackstone, in the passage cited, evidently refers to the statute of Anne, as altering the common law; and in Lord Canterbury v. the Queen, Lord Lyndhurst, in his judgment, expresses an opinion directly on this very point. In cases where fires are lighted by servants the original lighting, in the case of domestic fires, is an intentional lighting, and yet the statute contemplated the exemption of the master in such cases—Richards v. Easto (7). The fallacy lies in confining the term “accidental” to fires which commenced by accident; this was a fire accidentally occasioned by the defendant’s servant. The statute says nothing about steam-engines.

Barstow, in reply.—In Lord Canterbury’s case the Lord Chancellor could not have meant to say that he never had known of such an action. The statute of 6 Anne, as well as that subsequently passed, was only meant to extend to the particular limits expressed in them.

The judgment of the Court was now (Dec. 11) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This was a motion in arrest of judgment on a declaration stating (with some other particulars) that the plaintiff was possessed of a close, in which certain hedges and gates were standing, and several trees growing; that defendant was possessed of an adjoining close; that defendant made and kept a fire in his close in such a negligent manner, and at a time when, by reason of the then state of the wind and weather, it was dangerous and improper so to do; that through the negligence and improper conduct of himself and his servants, and for want of due care and caution, the said fire extended itself out of his close into the plaintiff’s, and the plaintiff’s trees, hedges, fences, &c. were burnt and destroyed. The ancient law or rather custom of England appears to have been that a person in whose house a fire originated, which afterwards spread to his neighbour’s property and destroyed it, must make good the loss; and it is well established that where the fire was occasioned by a servant’s negligence, the owner, the master of the house where it began, was answerable for the consequences to the sufferer. And the case of Turbervil v. Stamp, the last decided before the 6th of Anne, makes this plain, and declares the same principle, where the fire originates in the defendant’s close. The act contemplated the probability of fires in cities and towns arising from three causes: the want of water, the imperfection of party walls, and the negligence of servants. The act provided some means for supplying these material defects; but the 3rd section was directed against the moral one, the carelessness or negligence of servants, which, it observes, often causes fires, and it imposes on the servant by whose negligence the fire may have been occasioned a fine of 100*L.*, to be distributed among the sufferers at the discretion of the churchwardens, or eighteen fire or cause to be fired any dwelling-house or out-house, or other building, whether within the limits aforesaid or elsewhere, within the kingdom of Great Britain, such servant or servants being thereof lawfully convicted, &c., shall forfeit and pay the sum of 100*L.* unto the churchwardens, &c. of the parish where such fire shall happen, to be distributed amongst the sufferers by such fire,” &c.

Section 86. “That no action, suit, or process whatever shall be had, maintained, or prosecuted against any person in whose house, chamber, stable, barn, or other building, or on whose estate any fire shall, after &c., accidentally begin, nor shall any recompence be made by such person for any damage suffered thereby, any law, usage, &c. to the contrary notwithstanding.”

months' imprisonment in case of non-payment. This clause, raising the same sum, whatever the extent of suffering and the number of the sufferers, and inflicting the same penalty to whatever degree the negligence may have been culpable, without any power to lower the fine or shorten the imprisonment, can scarcely be supposed to have undergone much consideration on the part of the legislature. The most usual cause of fires was assumed to be the negligence of servants; and the enactment might operate to induce habits of caution in that important class. The same statute in the 6th section enacts, that after a day named, "no action shall be maintained against any person in whose house or chamber any fire shall accidentally begin, nor shall any recompence be made by such person for any damage suffered or occasioned thereby."

Both provisions seem to have found favour with the legislature, for both were re-enacted by 12 Geo. 3. c. 73. and 14 Geo. 3. c. 78, the latter adding to the words "house or chamber," "stable, barn, or other building," and also the words "on whose estate."

No terms can be more comprehensive. We cannot doubt that Baron Parke, in Richards v. Easto, rightly viewed it as a general law. And though the word "estate" is used in a sense very different from that which it bears in the language of the law, it clearly applies to land not built upon, and makes the owner of such land liable in the same manner as it had previously the owner of buildings. The question then is upon the meaning and effect of the word "accidental" here applied to fire. And here a very singular doubt has arisen from the mode in which this enactment is discussed by Sir W. Blackstone in his Commentaries. The passage is introduced by that learned writer incidentally as an illustration of the principle on which masters are held responsible for the acts of their servants. "Upon this principle," he observes, "by the common law, if a servant kept his master's fire negligently so that his neighbour's house was burnt down thereby, an action lay against the master, because this negligence happened in his service. But now (he proceeds) the common law is altered by stat. 6 Anne, c. 3. (it should be cap. 31. ss. 3, 6,) which ordains that no action shall be maintained against any one in whose house or chamber any fire shall accidentally begin, for their own loss is sufficient punishment for their own or their servant's negligence." This reason, by the way, is not stated in the act of parliament, and must be allowed to be very far from satisfactory, because the principle on which actions are maintainable is not the punishment of guilty persons, but compensation to innocent sufferers; besides, making servants punishable for fires resulting from their negligence is no exemption of masters from responsibility for the same fault: for fires which accidentally begin are not fires produced by negligence. It would therefore appear that Blackstone had drawn a conclusion from the enactment cited which it by no means sustains.

Lord Lyndhurst, however, has in some degree sanctioned by his high authority the inference thus drawn by Blackstone, in the remarks by which he prefaced his decision against Lord Canterbury's petition of right in 1 Phillips's Reports. We must, however, observe, that those remarks are wholly unnecessary for the decision to which he came, and indeed are stated rather as arguments with which that petitioner would have to contend if his cause had come to a hearing on the merits, than as expressing a deliberate opinion.

It is true that in strictness the word "accidental" may be employed in contradistinction to "wilful," and so the same fire might both begin accidentally and be the result of negligence, but it may equally mean a fire produced by mere chance, or incapable of being traced to any cause, and so would stand opposed to the negligence of either servants or masters; and when we find it used in statutes which do not speak of wilful fires, but make an important provision with respect to such as are accidental, and consider how great a change in the law would be affected, and how great encouragement would be given to that carelessness of which masters may be guilty as well as servants, we must say that we think the plaintiff's construction much the more reasonable of the two.

Lord Lyndhurst remarked on the absence of decisions on this point; yet he mentions two cases, both surely entitled to great weight: one, tried before Alderson, B., in Berks; the other, before Patteson, J., in Salop, which latter was very fully discussed on a rule to shew cause, and decided by the whole Court of Common Pleas. In both these cases, a plaintiff recovered damages for a fire spreading to his corn from the defendant's field, through the negligence of the defendant and his servants. His Lordship says, that the 14 Geo. 3. c. 78. escaped notice on those occasions. But if we ask how it came to be overlooked, since it would have furnished a complete and easy defence, the only answer can be the universal impression of the eminent lawyers both at the bar and on the bench, who took part in the argument and judgment, that the clause in the Building Act, respecting accidental fires, cannot apply to such as are produced by negligence.

It may be further observed with reference to the doctrine, that the exemption given by this enactment cannot apply. Its words suppose the fire to begin accidentally on the estate of him from whose estate it spreads. Now, this fire did not begin accidentally, but was knowingly lighted by the defendant himself.

HILARY TERM, 11 VICTORIÆ.

1848. }
Jan. 11. } PENNIAL V. HARBORNE.

Vendor and Purchaser—Title—Lease—Forfeiture—Covenant to insure.

In an action by a purchaser against a vendor of leasehold premises, for breach of contract in failing to make out a good title, it appeared that the premises were demised by A, B, and C. to J. S, who assigned to the defendant. The lease contained a covenant by the lessee to insure the premises in the joint names of the lessors, with a proviso for re-entry on breach of covenant by the lessee. The premises were insured in the joint names of A, B, C, and the defendant:—Held, that this was not a good performance of the covenant to insure; and that the defendant being bound to shew a good lease, the liability to have the lease avoided by the landlord was a valid objection to the title.

Assumpsit. The first count stated, that in consideration of 50*l.* paid by way of deposit, and the further sum of 1,450*l.* to be paid to the defendant, as thereafter mentioned, for the absolute purchase of an unexpired term in the lease of a dwelling-house, house adjoining, and cottages, known by the name of the White Swan, &c., and the goodwill thereof, the defendant promised the plaintiff to furnish and adduce a proper title, and well and effectually to assign to him the said lease and goodwill for the remainder of the term; and it was agreed that if either party should refuse or neglect to perform his part of the said agreement, he should pay to the other on demand 200*l.*, which was agreed to be the damages ascertained and fixed on breach of any part of the said agreement, and in case of default by the plaintiff, that the deposit money paid by him should be forfeited in part of such damages; that although the plaintiff had always performed and fulfilled all things on the plaintiff's part, and was, on &c., ready and willing to perform and fulfil all things in the said agreement contained on his part to be performed and fulfilled, and to pay the residue of the purchase-money, and to complete the said purchase, whereof the defendant had notice, and was requested by the plaintiff to furnish and adduce a proper title to the said premises, yet that the defendant did not nor would, when so requested, or at any time before or since, furnish or adduce a proper title to the said premises, but had neglected so to do, by reason whereof the plaintiff had been deprived of all the benefits and advantages which would have arisen from the completion of the said purchase, and had been put to great expense in endeavouring to procure such title as aforesaid, and to get the said purchase completed, and had lost all gains and profits which he might and would otherwise have made and acquired from employing the money so paid by him as a deposit, and other monies provided and kept by him for the completion of the said purchase. There were also counts for money had and received, and on an account stated.

Pleas—Non assumpsit; secondly, to the first count, that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to pay the remainder of the said purchase-money and to complete the said purchase, modo et formâ; thirdly, to the first count, that the defendant did, when requested by the plaintiff, and within a reasonable time in that behalf, furnish and adduce a proper title to the said premises. Issues thereon.

This cause was tried, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the Sittings at Guildhall, after Michaelmas term, 1846, when it appeared that the action was brought to recover 50*l.*, being the deposit paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, on the 26th of March 1846, with interest thereon, at 5*l.* per cent., and 40*l.* for costs incurred in investigating the title and otherwise, and 200*l.* as the ascertained damages for breach of the agreement declared on in the first count. The facts proved were as follows:—The premises in question were, by a deed of the 18th of April 1845, demised by W. W. Gretton, S. A. Wright, and W. K. Gretton (trustees acting under the will of J. Gretton, deceased), to one Belton, for sixty-one years, from the 29th of September 1844. This deed contained a covenant by the lessee to insure in the Licensed Victuallers' Fire Office, London, or if such office should be discontinued then in some public office for assurance in London or Westminster to be approved of by the lessors, in the joint names of W. W. Gretton, S. A. Wright, and W. K. Gretton, their heirs and assigns, the dwelling-house in 1,000*l.*, the house adjoining in 400*l.*, and the cottages in 300*l.* There was also a clause providing that any money recovered from the insurance office should be laid out in rebuilding the premises, and a condition of re-entry by the lessors for breach of any of the covenants. This term was, on the 14th of June 1845, assigned by Belton to the defendant. It appeared that, from the date of the original lease up to the 7th of June following, the only subsisting insurance was one in the joint names of William Belton, W. W. Gretton, S. A. Wright, and J. Wilson, for 1,400*l.* viz: 1,000*l.* on the dwelling-house, and 400*l.* on the house adjoining; and that on the 7th of June 1845, an insurance was effected in the proper sums on all the premises, but in the joint names of W. W. Gretton, S. A. Wright, W. K. Gretton, and the defendant. The defendant contracted to sell his premises to the plaintiff, by an agreement, dated the 26th of March 1846, and which was in the terms of the first count. It was objected, for the defendant, that no good title was shewn by reason of a breach of the covenant in the lease—no insurance at all having been in existence between the 18th of April and the 7th of June 1845 on the cottages, and also that the insurance of the 7th of June was effected in the wrong names. The Lord Chief Justice directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff for 50*l.*, the amount of the deposit paid, and for the costs of investigating the title, to be taxed by the Master, reserving leave to the defendant to enter a nonsuit or a verdict. A rule having been obtained accordingly,—

Martin and Voules now shewed cause.—The contract was for the sale of the remainder of the term granted to Belton, and the defendant was bound to shew a good title to it; but by reason of the breach of covenant to insure the landlord had a right to re-enter at any moment. There are two defects: the insurance was not in the right sum, nor in the proper names.

[COLERIDGE, J.—At the time of the contract there was an insurance covering all the premises in the proper sum.]

That will not prevent the landlord availing himself of his right of re-entry consequent on the prior breach. Suppose the landlord had brought ejectment, the subsequent insurance would have been no answer—1 Wms. Saund. 288, Doe d. Muston v. Gladwin (1). Then, it will be argued by the other side that the 14 Geo. 3. c. 78. s. 83. operates upon this covenant; but the provisions of the Building Act will not affect an express contract entered into between the parties, which was that the insurance should be effected in the joint names of the lessors. The effect of this insurance would be to put the money recovered from the office in the hands of the defendant if he survived the lessors.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The covenant is literally but not substantially complied with on that account; but then it is said the statute operates to prevent the lessee getting any personal benefit.]

There is not even a literal compliance; a contract to do an act with A. is not complied with by doing it with A. and B.—Wetherell v. Langstone (2). But the statute only applies to frauds in occupiers of premises: that appears from the preamble.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—It is, any ill-minded persons.]

Knowles and Miller, in support of the rule.—First, as to the amount of the policy: this is not a question of forfeiture between landlord and tenant as in Doe d. Muston v. Gladwin. The Court must look whether the title has been at all damaged by this accidental omission to insure for two months, not whether there possibly might have been a forfeiture. Nothing has been shewn in favour of the lessors intending to avoid the lease; and looking to what has been done, it is submitted that there was a proper insurance in this respect within a reasonable time, which is sufficient, as the covenant specifies no time at which the insurance is to be effected.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I very much doubt whether a man can be said to make a good title to premises out of which the purchaser is liable to be turned at any moment.]

Then as to the names inserted in the policy. The covenant does not provide for the insurance being in the names of the lessors only. This is a good compliance according to the intent of the covenant. There is a stipulation among the defendant's covenants that any insurance money recovered shall be expended in repairing the premises; that amounts to a covenant by the defendant that it shall be so expended, and he had a right to have his name inserted in the policy in order that he might see it so applied.

[PATTESON, J.—That proviso does not say by whom the money is to be so applied.]

The object and intent of 14 Geo. 3. c. 78. was to give any persons interested in the premises burnt down a right to have the money applied in rebuilding. Vernon v. Smith (3) decides that the statute is not confined to cases of fraud.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I think there is no distinction between the case of an action to recover a deposit by a purchaser, and that of a landlord seeking to recover against his tenant for a forfeiture, for if a tenant agreeing to sell his interest cannot do so on account of a breach of a covenant which amounts to a forfeiture of his lease, he cannot make a good title. Has then the tenant in this case complied with his covenant so as to protect him from an ejectment by his landlord? Two objections are made: one that there was no insurance at all to the extent of 300*l.* for a considerable period of time—whether longer or shorter is, I apprehend, immaterial. The other is, that a party who stipulates that a particular thing shall be done with A. does not comply with it by doing it with A. and B; the person who is added may receive the money in case of fire, or he may release the office from an action to which they might be liable. I think the statute has no application at all; it says when any person has insured, any other person interested in the premises may recover the money: but that does not make any difference to those who have become covenantors; at least this mode of insuring might impose very considerable difficulty. A particular thing agreed for has not been done, as the insurance has been effected in another name.

PATTESON, J.—This rule ought to be discharged, on the ground that the defendant had not in truth the interest which he contracted to sell, as the landlord of the premises might have insisted on the forfeiture for non-insurance within the terms of the covenant. It is said that it is not the same question between landlord and tenant, and between vendor and purchaser; but I cannot see how when a person agrees to sell me a lease, he means anything else than a lease which, when I get it, will protect me against all the world. Then it comes to this, whether the landlord could have maintained ejectment for a breach of the covenant in this case. It is said, the point as to the cottages not having been insured, was not raised at the trial; and if it had, it might have been answered. I do not know how that is; but it is no use sending the case to a new trial, unless the Court think that the insurance in the names of the three is a compliance with the covenant. Though the word "only" is not inserted, it is the same thing as if it were. By putting in other names, it is rendered very difficult for those entitled to enforce the covenant. Those who are added may defeat the remedy: that by itself is enough to shew that this is not a compliance with the covenant. I do not think the statute much affects the case; it says that any person who is entitled to an interest in the premises, may call on the office not to pay the money to him, but to lay it out in repairing the premises. There may be a difficulty in doing this; and the covenant seems to provide for this in its terms. It is said it is a covenant of the lessee, and not of the lessor, and it goes on to provide that the money shall be laid out in repairing the premises; but it does not say by whom. I think the meaning is, that the lessee shall insure in the names of the lessors; and it is agreed that the money recovered shall be laid out in rebuilding; it is rather a covenant to this effect on the part of the lessors; it seems to be an express covenant on the part of the lessee to insure in the names of the lessors; that was broken, and there was, therefore, a forfeiture impending over the defendant.

(2) Exch. Ch.—Not reported.

(3) 5 B. & Ald. 1.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion on both points. Mr. Knowles was not well-founded in his argument that there was a distinction between this case and that of a landlord and tenant, but there being an agreement that the vendor has a good title, he cannot perform that agreement if his lessor has a right to enter and avoid the lease. It is suggested that the lessors had a right to re-enter, for two reasons: first, because from April to June, two cottages remained uninsured; and, secondly, that the insurance which comprises the whole of the premises, was effected in the wrong names. It is argued, on the first point, that the intention of the parties was that no new insurance should be made until the expiration of the existing insurance in June; be it so; that may be the case with regard to the part of the property already insured, but it cannot apply to the cottages; if the lessee had effected a separate insurance on them alone in April, it would, I think, have been a compliance with the covenant. If that be not so, it must be contended that half of the property was intended to remain uninsured during this period. But then it is said that the covenant had been performed within a reasonable time, which it is contended was sufficient, as it could not be performed instantly. I agree that a reasonable performance is enough; but leaving the property uninsured for six weeks or three months is not a reasonable performance. We must lay down a general rule, and cannot hold that it will do to leave premises uninsured for so long a time as this. I think, therefore, this would be no answer to an action of ejectment by the landlord. With regard to the second point, that of the insurance being in the wrong names, I agree with the rest of the Court: the statute is referred to as remedying the difficulty; but when parties make a covenant they do not intend to leave the matter to be settled collaterally, by reference to the provisions of a statute; but they seek to provide by their covenant for all cases which may occur. It may well have been intended that the insurance should be in the names of the landlords alone, in order to enable them to get the money.

Pleading—De Injuriâ—Fraud.

To a declaration against the maker of a promissory note, indorsed by W. to the plaintiff, the defendant pleaded a set-off due to him from W. before the indorsement to the plaintiff, and that W. in order to deprive the defendant of his set-off, fraudulently indorsed to the plaintiff, in order to enable the plaintiff to sue on the said note as agent of W, and that there was no consideration for the indorsement to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff sued as agent of W. according to the said fraud. Replication, de injuriâ:

(4) See Wheeler v. Wright, 7 Mee. & Wels. 359; a. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 130.

—Held good, as the substance of the plea was, that the indorsement to the plaintiff was fraudulent.

Assumpsit by indorsee of a promissory note made by the defendant for payment to the order of George Webb, 45*l.*, four months after date, and indorsed by Webb to the plaintiff.

Third plea—And for a further plea, the defendant says, that before and at the time of indorsing the said promissory note by the said G. Webb to the plaintiff as in the declaration mentioned, and from thence until and at the commencement of this suit, the said G. Webb was and from thence hitherto hath been and still is indebted to the defendant in a sum of money, to wit, 100*l.*, for the work and labour, care, &c. [stating the nature of the set-off], which sum of money so due from the said G. Webb to the defendant equals the monies due on the said promissory note, and all damages sustained by reason of the non-payment thereof. And the defendant further says, that the said G. Webb, whilst the said money was due and unpaid to the defendant, and after the said note became due, to wit, on the 1st day of June, A.D. 1847, in order to deprive the defendant of his right of set-off in respect of the afore-said debts so due to the defendant, did in fraud of the defendant and in collusion with the plaintiff indorse the said note to the plaintiff, in order to enable the plaintiff to sue the defendant on the said note for the use and benefit of the said G. Webb; and that there never was any value or consideration for the said indorsement. And the defendant further says, that the plaintiff hath commenced and now maintains this action as agent of the said G. Webb for his use and benefit, according to the said fraud and collusion. And the defendant is ready and willing, and hereby offers to set off and allow to the said G. Webb, and to the plaintiff, the full amount of the damages sustained by reason of the non-payment of the said promissory note, out of and against the said sum of money so due from the said G. Webb to the defendant, according to the form of the statute, &c. Verification.

The defendant demurred to the replication. On an application by the plaintiff at chambers, Erle, J. set aside the demurrer as frivolous.

Barstow now moved for a rule nisi to rescind the order of the learned Judge.—This plea is in substance a plea of set-off against Webb, as whose agent the plaintiff sues. The case therefore falls directly within the rule laid down in Purchell v. Satter (1), and the replication de injuriâ is inadmissible.

[ERLE, J.—The plea sets up a collusive transfer by Webb to the plaintiff, and I thought myself bound by a recent decision of the Court of Exchequer (2), that wherever fraud is set up as the defence, de injuriâ may be replied.]

All about the fraud is quite unnecessary to the defence, and might well have been omitted. In considering whether this replication is good or not, the Court will look to the essence of the plea.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The defendant is enabled by this replication to prove the truth of his plea. As laid down by the Exchequer, de injuriâ is a good replication wherever fraud is the essence of the plea. It is said the defendant here has a case independently of any fraud, but he has made fraud a part of his defence, and therefore we ought not to go out of the general rule in this instance.

PATTERSON, J.—Part of the cause alleged in this plea is, that the transaction between Webb and the plaintiff was fraudulent. Whether that was a necessary part of the defence we need not now decide; but this matter having been inserted in the plea, the replication de injuriâ is surely good.

ERLE, J.—The replication de injuriâ enables a defendant, who has a real and substantial defence, to put it to the jury; and I always think a demurrer to such a replication shews that the defendant has not a substantial case. Then, whenever there is a solemn decision of one of the superior courts in favour of any particular pleading, I consider a demurrer to such a pleading as frivolous. Now, this case comes directly within the terms of the case in the Exchequer, and therefore I set the demurrer aside. This does the defendant no harm, for if he has a real defence he may prove it. Whether a plea alleging a right of set-off against a former party to the note is good or not, we need not decide at present. This case rests only on the fraud, which is the essence of the plea, and therefore the replication is good.

Stamp—3 Geo. 4. c. 117.—Mortgage—New Security.

By deed between E. B. (mortgagee) of the first part, M. G. (devisee for life under will of mortgagor) of the second part, and J. G. (devisee in remainder in fee) of the third part, reciting an original mortgage for 1,000 years, to secure 150l. and interest, in consideration of 350l. (being 165l., the amount due for principal and interest due on the original mortgage, and 185l. further advance), paid by the lessor of the plaintiff, all the parties assigned the premises comprised in the original mortgage to her for the residue of the term of 1,000 years, subject to a proviso for redemption on payment of the whole sum of 350l. at a different day from that named in the original mortgage, and M. G. and J. G. entered into a fresh covenant to pay the whole 350l. at the time mentioned in the proviso:—Held, that this deed required to be stamped with an ad valorem stamp, as upon a new mortgage for 185l., and also with a deed stamp, as the covenant by the devisees, for payment of the old as well as the new advance created a fresh security.

Ejectment by assignee of a mortgage under an indenture, dated the 7th of September 1844, between E. L. Brickwood of the first part; the defendant (widow of J. Gutteridge and devisee for life of the premises) of the second part; and J. Gutteridge (only son and devisee in fee expectant on the decease of the defendant) of the third part: by which, after reciting (inter alia) a mortgage, dated the 25th of September 1838, for 1,000 years, by J. Gutteridge, deceased, to E. Brickwood, for 150l., and the death of J. Gutteridge, after having bequeathed the mortgaged premises to the defendant for life, and to his son,

J. Gutteridge, in fee; and also that there was due to Brickwood 165l. for principal and interest; and that the defendant and J. Gutteridge, the son, had requested the lessor of the plaintiff to advance the sum of 350l. to enable them to pay off the 165l. and for other occasions; in consideration of the payment by the lessor of the plaintiff of 165l. to Brickwood, and of 185l. to the defendant and J. Gutteridge, Brickwood assigned, and J. Gutteridge assigned and confirmed to the lessor of the plaintiff, the premises comprised in the original mortgage for the residue of the term of 1,000 years, subject to a proviso for redemption on payment of the whole sum of 350l. to the lessor of the plaintiff, by the defendant and J. Gutteridge, on the 7th of March 1845. Covenant, by the defendant and J. Gutteridge, for payment of 350l. and interest, on the same day.

The cause was tried, before Pollock, C.B., at the Spring Assizes for the county of Bedford, 1847, when the deed of transfer was produced, stamped on the first skin with an ad valorem stamp of 4l. and on the second skin with a 1l. follower; it was admitted that the deed contained above forty-five folios. An objection was raised by the defendant that the deed was insufficiently stamped. The plaintiff had a verdict, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, if the Court should be of opinion that this objection ought to prevail.

Byles, Serj. and Prendergast now (Jan. 20) shewed cause.—It is admitted that the deed contained words requiring two followers, but it is contended that it only required an ad valorem stamp of 3l.; and if so, the whole amount paid is sufficient, the denomination of stamp being immaterial. The effect of the deed is an assignment of the original mortgage with an additional charge of 185l. Under 3 Geo. 4. c. 117. s. 2, therefore, the ad valorem duty is payable only in respect of the further charge.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Martin v. Baxter (1) decides that this only applies to additional charges between the same parties.]

Doe d. Bartley v. Gray (2) is in point.

(1) 5 Bing. 160; s.c. 6 Law J. Rep. C.P. 242.

(2) 3 Ad. & El. 89; s.c. 4 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 197.

There a mortgage for 1,000 years to secure 150*l.* was assigned to secure 350*l.*, 200*l.* additional being advanced by the assignee, and the original mortgagor by the same deed released the fee to secure the 350*l.*, and it was held that the deed was liable to an ad valorem duty on the 200*l.*, and a progressive duty of 1*l.*, but did not require to be stamped as a fresh mortgage for 350*l.* in consequence of the conveyance of the fee. Doe d. Barnes v. Rowe (3) is to the same effect, and also decides that no deed stamp is necessary. Doe d. Snell v. Tom (4) and Doe d. Bowman v. Lewis (5) are also in favour of the plaintiff. Lant v. Peace (6) will probably be cited on the other side, but there, besides the transfer and further charge of 1,000*l.*, other land was mortgaged as a security for the whole 1,400*l.* advanced, and it was held that the deed required an ad valorem stamp on the 1,000*l.*, and also a deed stamp upon the fresh security. Brown v. Pegg (7) will also be relied on, where the conveyance of the fee was held to create a new security and to render a deed stamp necessary; but that is in direct contradiction to Doe d. Bartley v. Gray. Humberstone v. Jones (8) is the last case on this subject, but there the power of sale given by the deed was held to amount to a new security. No doubt the Court there relied upon the fact of there being a covenant to pay the original and subsequent advance at different times from those in the first deed, but that must always occur in an assignment of a mortgage. The provision in 55 Geo. 3. c. 184. schd. 'Mortgage,' seems to have been overlooked, which directs that in "all other cases where a mortgage or other instrument hereby charged with the ad valorem duty on mortgages, shall be contained in one and the same deed or writing with any other matter or thing (except what shall be incident to such mortgage or other instrument), such deed or writing shall be charged with the same duties (except the progressive duty) as such mortgage or other instrument and such other matter or thing would have been separately charged with if contained in separate deeds or writings." Here the covenant to pay is incident to the further charge.

But no decision is given as to its necessity. The case turns upon the conveyance of the fee not creating an additional security. Here there is nothing which can amount to a new security.

[PATTESON, J.—Surely there was a covenant by fresh persons.]

That is so apparently; but the widow and son, who covenant in the second deed together, represent the whole fee which was in the original mortgagor. As to the principle of construing the Stamp Acts, Warrington v. Furber (9) and Tomkins v. Ashby (10) were referred to.

O'Malley and Peacock, in support of the rule, (Jan. 21).—The estate, subject to the mortgage, was devised by J. Gutteridge to his widow, Mary Gutteridge, for life, with remainder to his son, J. Gutteridge, in fee. The deed in question is between the original mortgagee and the tenants for life and in remainder, who all assign to the lessor of the plaintiff in consideration of a loan of 350*l.*, 185*l.* of which is a new advance. The time for redemption and for payment of the money under the covenant is different from that in the original mortgage, and both tenant for life and in fee covenant severally for payment of the whole sum. These facts bring the case directly within the principle of Brown v. Pegg and Humberstone v. Jones; it is in fact a fresh mortgage for 350*l.* The assignment by the original mortgagee was merely an additional security, like getting in an outstanding term; if so, the deed requires a 4*l.* ad valorem stamp besides progressive stamps. But it is not necessary to go so far as this, for admitting it to be an assignment of the old mortgage and a further advance, there is an additional security created, and therefore a deed stamp is required besides the ad valorem duty on the further advance. In Dee d. Bartley v. Gray the Court expressly abstained from deciding whether a deed stamp is necessary in such a case. In Dee d. Barnes v. Rowe no deed stamp was necessary, as there was no new security given. Then, Last v. Peace and Brown v. Pegg expressly decide that if there is new security a deed stamp is necessary. The question then arises, what constitutes a new security? In Last v. Peace fresh land was included: in Brown v. Pegg there was the conveyance of the fee, and it is difficult to see how that could make a different security. Then, in Humberstone v. Jones there was no conveyance of the fee, but the covenant to pay covered both the additional and original advance, and was for payment at different days, and a power of sale was introduced. But it is said, these are incidents to the mortgage for the further advance: conceding that to be so as to the power of sale and the covenant to pay the further advance, it cannot apply to the covenant for payment of the whole debt and the power for redemption at different times. This is the view taken in 5 Jarvis's Conveyancing (by Sweet., p. 541, where it is said, that as the transfer-deed commonly contains a covenant to pay the extra debt, or some other additional matter extraneous to the instrument considered as a transfer of the mortgage properly so called, it is then rendered liable to the additional stamp. The 3 Geo. 4 c. 117. s. 2. did not intend in all cases of a further advance to do away with the deed stamp, otherwise parties would get an advance of 1*l.* and pay the 1*l.* duty or that instead of 1*l.* 1*5s.* deed stamp. But here also, there are two fresh covenants, and their personal representations are bound by the second deed: this clearly gives a new security, just as much as if without any assignment of the mortgage a new covenant was second into with the mortgagee by the tenant for life and in remainder.

PATTON, J.—I presume the former covenant by the mortgagee bound his heirs, and therefore since his devisees under the statute. These new covenants were, therefore, in some sort liable before.

They were only liable so far as they are acts by their new trustees: but by their new trustees they become liable, whether they have acts or not.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—A new mode of liability is the same thing as if a new party had been introduced by the deed; and for this reason I think the stamp was insufficient.

PATTON, J.—The tenant for life and remainder-man were not originally bound, except sub modo; but here is a covenant binding them absolutely to pay not only the fresh advance, but the former debt also. I need not go into the cases cited; but I think they are all capable of being reconciled; except, perhaps, Dee d. Barnes v. Rowe, where the Lord Chief Justice seems rather to have mistaken the decision in Dee d. Bartley v. Gray, in which it was contended that there ought to be not only an ad valorem stamp, but a transfer stamp, and a deed stamp besides. But the point as to the deed stamp was not material, for the Court considered whether there was any transfer stamp, which differs from a deed stamp in this respect, that although it is the same as a deed stamp for the first skin, it is different in the following skins. Therefore the Court found it necessary only to consider whether a transfer stamp was required. Now there was a 1*l.* 1*5s.* stamp. There, therefore, the Court did not decide the point as to a deed stamp being essential. That case, therefore, does not apply here, which falls directly within Brown v. Pegg and Humberstone v. Jones.

COLLINGS, J. discreet.

WIGHTMAN, J.—It is unnecessary to consider the point, whether a simple transfer is subject to a deed stamp in all cases, for here is a new security by persons who, though they might have been liable as representatives of the mortgagee if they had acted, yet made themselves personally liable on their covenant, which is in respect of the former mortgage debt. The rule therefore must be absolute.

By the way, asked that the rule might be drawn up for a new term upon payment of costs.

Rule absolute accordingly.

Railway Company—Corporation—Appointment of Attorney not under Seal—Notice of Appeal.

By an act of parliament incorporating a railway company, power was given to the directors to "appoint and displace any of the officers of the company":—Held, that the appointment of an attorney to the company, under this power, need not be under seal.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained, calling upon the defendants to shew cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, directing them to enter continuances and hear an appeal against an assessment to a certain poor-rate, in which the Whitehaven Junction Railway Company were the appellants, and the overseers of the township of Ellenborough were the respondents. Upon the appeal being called on for hearing at the last Michaelmas Quarter Sessions for the county of Cumberland, the notice of appeal was put in by the appellants. Such notice was signed "Armistead and Musgrove, attorneys for the above-named Whitehaven Junction Railway Company." It was thereupon objected by the counsel for the respondents that such notice of appeal was invalid unless a retainer under the seal of the company appointing these gentlemen their attorneys was shewn. This objection prevailed with the Sessions, and the appeal was accordingly dismissed. Against the present rule,

Cowling and Ramsay now shewed cause.—By the 4th section of the 41 Geo. 3. c. 23. the notice of appeal against an assessment to a poor-rate is required to be signed "by the person giving the same, or his, her or their attorney on his or their behalf;" the question therefore is, whether any sufficient evidence was given before the Quarter Sessions that the gentlemen signing this notice of appeal were the attorneys of the railway company. The company in question being a corporation can make a valid appointment of an attorney under their seal only—Com. Dig. tit. 'Franchise' (F) 13, Arnold v.

the Corporation of Poole (1). Nor do the provisions of the 83rd section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. lxiv., by which the company was incorporated, prevent this rule of law from applying (2). Besides, in the present case no evidence appears to have been given of any appointment even by parol of these gentlemen as the attorneys of the company.

Martin (Greig with him), in support of the rule.—It appears from the affidavits that the only objection made at the Sessions and entertained by the Court was, that the appointment should have been under seal.—(He was then stopped by the Court.)

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am clearly of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. Although the rule of law undoubtedly is that corporations can only bind themselves by a contract made under their seal in ordinary cases, yet in the present instance an act of parliament expressly gives power to the directors of this corporation to appoint and displace officers and enter into other contracts for them. Such appointments and contracts it is clear need not be made under seal. It has been said in argument now, that no evidence of the appointment as attorneys of the parties who signed the notice of appeal was given at all. Since, however, that objection was not taken at the Quarter Sessions, but only that an appointment under seal should be shewn, it cannot avail the respondents now.

Rule absolute.

 1848. } CORNEWALL v. IVES.

Practice.—Error to reverse Outlawry.

It is no ground for setting aside a writ of error coram nobis to reverse an outlawry, that the attorney for the plaintiff in error has not made an affidavit that he has the authority of the outlaw to issue such writ, nor that the outlaw has not entered an appearance to the original action.

The defendant in this case having been outlawed for not entering an appearance, sued out a writ of error coram nobis, to reverse the judgment in outlawry, upon the ground that the defendant was abroad at the time when the writ of exigent was awarded and issued against him. In Michaelmas term last a rule nisi was obtained, on behalf of the plaintiff, to quash the writ of error, or the allowance thereof, and to set aside all proceedings founded thereon: first, because, previous to the issuing of the writ of error, no affidavit had been made by the attorney of the plaintiff in error, that he was concerned for, or instructed by the plaintiff in error to reverse the outlawry; secondly, because no appearance to the original action had been entered by the plaintiff in error.

Martin and E. Beavan shewed cause.—There is nothing in either of the objections which has been taken to this writ of error. It is only in cases where the person outlawed comes to the Court by way of motion to reverse the outlawry that these conditions are imposed upon him. He is then allowed to purchase the favour upon terms—Plunkett v. Buchanan (1), Houlditch v. Swinfen (2). But this is not applicable to the case where a party stands upon his right to sue out a writ of error. The statute 4 & 5 Will. & Mary, c. 18. s. 3. imposes no such conditions upon him.

Petersdorff, contra.—In Archbold's Practice, 8th edit. p. 1148, it is laid down that in proceeding to arrest an outlawry by writ of error "an appearance must be entered or bail must be put in and perfected in the same cases and in the same manner as when the outlawry is reversed upon motion."

[ERLE, J.—I do not find any authority cited by Mr. Archbold in support of the passage you have read; nor do I see how any such practice can in principle exist. Suppose a plaintiff in an action had outlawed the defendant without any of the necessary preliminaries having been taken, would it be rational in such a case to make the defendant enter an appearance before he could set aside the outlawry? I can understand that where the defendant wishes to make terms such a condition may be imposed upon him.]

The rule, it is submitted, is, that a person who has been outlawed cannot be heard unless he enters an appearance.

[ERLE, J.—I see by reference to Mr. Tidd's Forms (3), that it is not until after the reversal of the outlawry that the defendant's appearance is entered.]

Secondly, it is as necessary for the attorney of the defendant to make an affidavit that he is instructed by his client to sue out the writ of error as if he were seeking to set aside the outlawry upon motion. The cases of Plunkett v. Buchanan and Houlditch v. Swinfen are applicable to the present case.

ERLE, J.—I retain my first impression that neither of these objections can be allowed to prevail; but, inasmuch as the plaintiff appears to have been misled by a passage in a book of authority, the rule will be discharged without costs.

were sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, in October 28, 1846, under a written agreement, at 19s. per thousand. On the same day the bricks were counted and delivered to the defendant, who put up a bar and lock at the entrance of the field where they were, and also carried away two barge-loads. The defendant proved that, on October 26, 1846, two persons, of the names of Cooke and Webster, had agreed verbally with the plaintiff's wife, who was shewn to have authority to sell them, for the purchase of the bricks in question, at 1l. per thousand. After the sale to the defendant, notice of it was given to Cooke and Webster, who insisted on their bargain, and took forcible possession of the bricks. It was thereupon objected that the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited as he had no title to the bricks at the time of the sale to the defendant. The learned Judge thought this defence, if valid at all, ought to be specially pleaded, but reserved leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit on this ground, and the plaintiff had a verdict. A rule nisi having been accordingly obtained,—

Hugh Hill (Martin was with him) now shewed cause.—First, these facts constituted no defence, as until the bricks were counted no property passed to Cooke and Webster—Simmonds v. Swift (1), Chitty on Contracts, p. 377. [No decision was given on this point.] Secondly, this defence ought to be specially pleaded under Reg. Gen. Hil. term, 4 Will, 4, which directs that in an action of indebitatus assumpsit, for goods sold and delivered, the plea of non assumpsit shall operate only as a denial of the sale and delivery in point of fact: in Allen v. Hopkins (2) there was such a plea.

The Court then called on

Watson and Tomlinson, in support of the rule.—There is no express decision on this point, but it is submitted that this defence is admissible under non assumpsit; the plaintiff is bound to be prepared with evidence that the goods were his to sell. The old forms of declaration contained the words "goods of the plaintiff."

[PATTESON, J.—But those words were always struck out.]

(2) 13 Mee. & Wels. 94; a.c. 13 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 316.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Surely against the defendant the goods are assumed to be the plaintiff's property.]

In Allen v. Hopkins the plaintiff had, at the time of sale, an apparent title, which was avoided by matter subsequent. This is like the case of a groom selling his master's horse, there put by Lord Abinger.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Is there not here a sale and delivery in fact by the plaintiff?]

There is an ostensible contract and delivery, but by a person who has no authority to sell. Sale and delivery, in the new rule, means a sale and delivery which vests the property and possession in the vendee. Here there being no sale and delivery in fact or in law, the defendant could not confess and avoid.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Section 3. of the rule says that, "in every species of assumpsit all matters in confession and avoidance, including not only those by way of discharge, but those which shew the transaction to be either void or voidable in point of law, on the ground of fraud or otherwise, shall be specially pleaded"; that seems to apply to everything which renders a sale void.]

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I do not know how it can be said that there is no authority on this question, when the new rule is so expressly pointed to a case of this kind. There can be no doubt what is meant by that rule; the object of which was to prevent a defence being started on the plaintiff of which he has no notice, which would occur if in every case of a sale of goods in fact the defendant might, under a plea of non assumpsit, in an action for the price, enter into a long discussion as to the title of the seller.

PATTESON, J.—I cannot see any difficulty in framing a special plea in this case, for it would confess a sale and delivery in point of fact, and then shew that it was not binding in point of law.

WIGHTMAN, J.—This case seems to fall directly within the new rule, for admitting a sale and delivery in fact, it avoids it on account of a defective title in the seller.

 1848. } ANOTHER.
 Jan. 13. }

Lunatic—Duress—Agreement by Consent of Counsel.

The defendants issued a commission of lunacy against the plaintiff; and at the hearing, before the commissioner, an agreement was entered into, that the proceedings should be dropped in consideration of the plaintiff's assigning her property to trustees. This agreement was signed by her counsel; and in order to carry it out, her title deeds were placed in the defendants' hands. On the trial of an issue, as to whether the plaintiff was entitled to the deeds notwithstanding the agreement:—Held, first, that it was not open to the defendants to dispute the title of the plaintiff to the deeds independently of the agreement.

Held, secondly, that the agreement was entered into under duress, and was not binding on the plaintiff, notwithstanding the consent of her legal advisers.

This was a feigned issue, to try whether the plaintiff, Catharine Cummings, was entitled to the possession of certain title deeds and muniments of title, notwithstanding a certain arrangement alleged to have been entered into on the 22nd of September.

It appeared that the plaintiff was a widow, having two daughters, one of whom had married the defendant Ince; and the other had married the other defendant. The plaintiff, who had considerable property in her own right, appeared to have lived on bad terms with her husband; and, in February 1846, during his lifetime, a medical certificate that the plaintiff was insane was signed by a surgeon, who had been called in by the defendant Ince. On the 12th of May 1846, during the absence of her husband, the plaintiff was carried from her house to a mad-house; and the defendants took possession of the deeds, in respect of which the action was brought, being in fact the title deeds of the plaintiff's property. Mr. Cummings afterwards returned to the house, and died there in July, the same year. The plaintiff was confined in the lunatic asylum from the 12th of May to the 22nd of September.

On the 22nd of August she was served with a notice that a commission of lunacy was issued against her, to be executed on the 29th. The inquiry lasted eight days, and at the expiration of that time, and before the close of the case, it was arranged that the plaintiff should be discharged out of the custody in which she was, on certain terms, amongst others, that she should assign her property to trustees. This arrangement was signed by the counsel on both sides; and in order to carry it out, the deeds were placed in the hands of the solicitors of the defendants.

After her discharge from confinement the plaintiff brought an action of trover against the solicitors for the deeds, and an order was made by a Judge under the Interpleader Act that this issue should be tried, the defendants being parties to it; and it was accordingly tried before Wightman, J., at the sittings after Hilary term, 1847.

The learned Judge left it to the jury to say, whether the apparent consent which must be taken to have existed on the part of the plaintiff to the signature of the agreement on her behalf by her counsel and attorneys, was obtained by the restraint under which she was at the time, and the jury found that it was. The jury, under the learned Judge's direction, thereupon returned a verdict for the plaintiff.

A rule having been obtained for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, Cockburn and Hance shewed cause (Nov. 11).—This rule was obtained on two grounds. First, it is said that the issue raised the question of title as well as the question of the operation of the agreement itself, and that no proof of title was given by the plaintiff; but it is to be observed, that the agreement recites what were the rights of the plaintiff irrespective of the order, and the issue was intended merely to decide the effect of the agreement. Secondly, it is clear that the plaintiff in this case acted under duress. What was effected by means of the imprisonment was something beyond the scope of that legal process under which the plaintiff was arrested—Fin. Abr. tit. 'Duress;' Bac. Abr. tit. 'Duress.' If the plaintiff had been of sound mind it could not have been said that there was any consideration whatever for the agreement. The object of the proceedings in lunacy is the protection of the lunatic, and a petition in lunacy cannot be made the means of extorting concessions from the person who is the object of inquiry. The very arrangement supposes the sanity of the plaintiff, and it is clearly void if she was really insane—Wade v. Simeon (1), Longridge v. Dorville (2), Smith v. Monteith (3). Lastly, the agreement, if otherwise binding in law, is clearly contrary to public policy—Rol. Abr. tit. 'Duress,' Ibid. tit. 'Imprisonment,' The Duke de Cadaval v. Collins (4). And if it could be enforced at all, it would only be by a court of equity.

W. H. Watson, contra.—The argument on the other side shews that the defendants' construction of the issue is the correct one. It is said that the agreement is void on the face of it; but if so, why was the cause sent down for trial? The question is, whether the plaintiff is not entitled notwithstanding the agreement. The action was originally brought against the attorneys in whose hands the deeds were, and if the plaintiff had proceeded in that action, she must have established by some sort of evidence that she was entitled to the deeds.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—I thought at the time of the trial, and indeed it seemed to be admitted that the plaintiff had a right to the deeds. The question was, as to the effect of the agreement.]

But it is now contended, that the agreement is void on the face of it.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Not so; but that it is to be taken in connexion with all the facts of the case.]

It resolves itself into a question of duress. The question of public policy was not raised at the trial; and Lott v. Melville (5) is decisive to shew that this cannot be treated as duress. The imprisonment was lawful. It is not for the defendant to shew that no duress existed. The agreement was signed by the plaintiff's counsel, who must be taken to be therefore authorized by her to sign. The party who impeaches such an instrument must shew duress sufficient to avoid it. Besides, the fact of the commission issuing is prima facie conclusive as to the lawfulness of the imprisonment—2 Inst. 482, Bac. Abr. tit. 'Duress,' Year Book, 43, edit. 3, B, 6.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—But the original object of the commission may have been given up for the mere purpose of procuring the deeds.]

It is important to consider that the imprisonment took place in the husband's lifetime.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—If a party was charged with a debt, a bond may be well given to pay for the debt under fear of imprisonment; but the agreement was made under apprehension of imprisonment in a mad-house, which makes a great difference.]

The plaintiff was either sane or insane. If she was sane, then the agreement is of course binding. If insane, then all parties would be anxious that she should be taken care of.

The judgment of the Court was now (Jan. 13,) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J. — The question arose on the trial of an issue whether the plaintiff, notwithstanding an arrangement made by her, was entitled to the possession of certain title deeds. We are, in the first place, clearly of opinion with the plaintiff, that her title to the deeds, independently of that arrangement, was not open to inquiry on the trial, and that the meaning of the issue was, whether the arrangement alluded to prevented her from claiming to hold the deeds, though otherwise entitled, as it was by means of that arrangement that they had been handed over by the plaintiff to the defendants. The arrangement was this: the defendants (the plaintiff's daughters) were prosecuting a commission of lunacy against her. On the inquiry into the state of the plaintiff's mind before the Commissioners, after certain witnesses had been examined, it was arranged that the commission should be dropped on the plaintiff giving up the deeds. This arrangement was signed by the counsel attending on both sides. On the trial of this issue, the plaintiff contended that the arrangement was not binding, because obtained by duress. She had been confined at an asylum, where her health and even her state of mind were said to be affected and endangered by the treatment she underwent: the attorney's clerk swore that he believed such to be the probable effect of her remaining so confined, and further that she acceded to the arrangement only from fear of these consequences. The argument for the plaintiff was, that this confinement was illegal, as she was permitted by the arrangement to go at large; but that even if lawful, it was a restraint on her will, which prevented any contract made under that duress from binding her.

On the defendants' side, it was argued that the legal process set in motion for ascertaining the state of the plaintiff's mind was lawful and bonâ fide, and that even if ill founded in fact, an arrangement made between the parties pending the inquiry was valid and obligatory; and much stress was laid on the necessity of abiding by engagements made by those who represent the interests of parties litigating in courts of justice, more especially when sanctioned by counsel acting for the benefit of both parties.

Great weight is due to these considerations, which no doubt ought to be held decisive in any ordinary legal proceeding, when both parties are competent and free to exercise their judgment. But where one party is alleged to be a lunatic, and threatened with the consequences of that allegation, the parties cannot be considered as meeting on equal terms. The object of proceeding with a commission of lunacy is to establish incompetency to do reasonable acts, and to take the management of the supposed lunatic's affairs and his person out of his own hands, and lodge them in others appointed without his consent. How then (it may be asked) can those who apply for the commission affirm that the lunatic is able to negotiate an agreement, of which his pecuniary interest and the proper care of his person are the only subjects?

We are of opinion that the defendants cannot maintain the plaintiff's competency in the face of their own proceeding. But if we can assume that the plaintiff was in possession of her right reason, she was the proper person to retain the deeds then in her power, and ought not to have been deprived of them. And if she was induced to resign them by fear of personal suffering, brought upon her by confinement in a lunatic asylum, by the act of the defendants, the resignation would appear to be brought about by a direct interference with her personal freedom. Is not this truly described as duress? and was the contract which resulted made with her free will? That her counsel exercised a sound discretion, and did the best for their client's interest, we do not for a moment doubt. But they are not invested by any superior power with the power and duty of guardianship over the lunatic, their right to act for her is derived from herself alone; as long as she was at liberty she might authorize them to appear in her behalf, and disprove the imputed insanity; but as she was incompetent (by the hypothesis) to make any contract, she was incompetent to appoint any one to deal for her in relation to her liberty or her property. If, on the other hand, her counsel acted for her, believing her of sound mind, from the same fear of inconvenience and disease, as likely to arise from her confinement, which affected the mind of their principal, their proceeding ought to be considered as enforced by the same duress. Possibly it might have been more for the plaintiff's interest in this case to acquiesce in the arrangement than to question it; but if it is now questioned on grounds which prove it to have no binding force at law, we have no power to change its nature and say that it shall be carried into effect. The case, then, was properly laid before the jury, when they were asked whether the plaintiff made the arrangement with her own free will; and the jury found a true verdict when they negatived that proposition.

We may observe that though the peculiar facts of this case are not assimilated to any former decision, our present opinion does not clash with any, but appears to flow from well-recognized principles: and we may add, that probably some other arrangement may yet be amicably made, more favourable to the interest of the whole family than any triumph in a court of law.

At the trial, before Coleridge, J., at the Sittings at Westminster during the present term, it appeared that one Taft being possessed of the residue of a term in the premises, underlet them to Messrs. Pitcher & Carter for fourteen years and a half, from Christmas, 1831, who, in 1833, assigned their underlease to the defendant, who entered and paid rent to Taft until the 24th of June 1846, when the underlease from Taft to Pitcher & Carter expired. After this time the defendant continued in possession, and paid rent to the lessor of the plaintiff, who had become entitled to the premises. On the 24th of December 1846, the lessor of the plaintiff served on the defendant a notice to quit on the 24th of June following. Possession not having been given up at that time, the present action was commenced. The defendant's counsel contended, that the notice to quit was erroneous, as it should have expired at Christmas instead of Midsummer. The plaintiff had a verdict, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict upon the above objection.

Keating (Jan. 17,) moved accordingly.—The tenancy from year to year created by the tenant holding over after the expiration of his term, and paying rent, has reference to the time of the original entry under the lease—Doe d. Robinson v. Dobell (1). There premises were let for a year and six months certain, and it was held that a notice to quit, given with reference to the time of the entry, and not to the end of the term, was good : that case necessarily involves the decision that the present notice is bad. In Doe d. Collins v. Weller (2), a case of a lease by tenant for life and payment of rent to the remainder-man, the tenancy from year to year so created was calculated with reference to the original entry. That is a much stronger case than the present, as no privity exists between the tenant and the remainder-man until the death of the tenant for life. Roe d. Jordan v. Ward (3) is also in point.

[PATTERSON, J.—In those cases rent was received after the term, at one of the quarter days.]

Berrey v. Lindley (4) is very similar to this case. There premises were held under a void agreement for five years and a half from Michaelmas 1823 ; before the expiration of that term, a negotiation was entered into for a lease for seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years, at an increased rent ; the lease was never executed, but the defendant continued in possession, paying the increased rent from Michaelmas 1828 ; and it was held, that a notice to quit at Michaelmas was valid. Coltman, J. there says, " If a tenant continues in possession after the expiration of the term, paying the same rent, the presumption of law is, that a tenancy from year to year is created, commencing from the period when the original tenancy commenced." It makes no difference that in that case the original demise was void by the Statute of Frauds, as the tenancy from year to year, arising from the occupation is regulated as to its terms by that agreement—Doe d. Tilt v. Stratton (5).

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—That observation may have been founded on the fact that tenancies generally expire at the same time of the year as they commence.]

That was not so in Berry v. Lindley, where the original term expired in the middle of a year.

January. } CHRISTOPHERSON v. BARE.

Pleading — Assault — Imprisonment — Leave and Licence.

An assault ex vi termini excludes consent ; therefore, a plea of leave and licence to a declaration charging an assault is bad as amounting to the general issue.

Quære, if it can be pleaded to an action for imprisonment.

The declaration stated that the defendant, on &c., with force and arms, &c., assaulted the plaintiff, and then imprisoned him, and kept and detained him in prison for a long time, to wit, for one month and twenty-five days, contrary to law, and against the will of the plaintiff, &c.

Plea, that the defendant, at the said several times when, &c., by the leave and licence of the plaintiff to him for that purpose first given and granted, committed the trespasses in the declaration mentioned.

Demurrer as to so much and such part of the plea as relates to the assaulting the plaintiff and imprisoning him, and keeping and detaining him in prison for thirty-three days, parcel &c., on the ground that the plaintiff, having given the defendant leave and licence to commit the trespasses, cannot in law be a justification of the same; and that the plea is an argumentative traverse of the defendant's having imprisoned the plaintiff, and amounts to not guilty, and should have concluded to the country.

Joinder in demurrer.

O'Malley, in support of the demurrer.—Absence of consent is necessary to the existence of an assault—The King v. Banks (1) and The King v. Martin (2). This plea, therefore, does not confess an assault, and amounts to an informal traverse. So again, "imprisonment" implies restraint, but "leave and licence" asserts absence of restraint—Vin. Abr. 'Imprisonment,' (A, 1,) Clarke's case (3), Buller's N.P. 17.

[PATTESON, J.—Suppose a person subject to fits of insanity, knowing one to be about to come on, requests a keeper to restrain him, and afterwards revokes his will to be restrained and brings an action, ought the licence to be pleaded?]

There the person would not be capable during the fit of revoking his will.

Pearson, contra.—The plea confesses an assault and imprisonment in fact, which is sufficient to support the declaration; the words "against the will of the plaintiff" being surplusage. The argument on the other side would go to exclude leave and licence as a plea to trespass to goods; but Milman v. Dolwell (4) is against that view. The plea only admits what is material in the declaration. Such a plea as this has been allowed in trespass for criminal conversation.

[PATTESON, J.—The argument is, that assault and imprisonment ex vi termini exclude consent.]

In The King v. Meredith (5), there is a dictum of Lord Abinger, C.B., that leave and licence may be pleaded to an assault.

[COLERIDGE, J.—In Dicas v. Lord Brougham (6), on not guilty, the defendant was allowed to shew that the imprisonment of the plaintiff was a judicial act.]

Taylor v. Smith (7) is distinguishable from this case.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—An action for imprisonment will not lie, except it be assumed or shewn to be against the plaintiff's will.]

An agreement to an imprisonment is legal, but not to a battery, for that is a breach of the peace—Lewis v. Davison (8), where Parke, J. distinguishes Allen v. Rescous (9).

[COLERIDGE, J.—Your plea to be good must answer both the assault and the imprisonment.]

Then the demurrer is insufficient, as it only objects to part of the plea.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—You cannot demur to the form of a demurrer; and if your plea is bad in part, it is bad altogether.]

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—It is not necessary to say whether an imprisonment may be justified under these circumstances; but as to the assault, it is vain to contend that it could exist, except against the will of the party assaulted.

PATTESON, J.—I have great doubts as to the imprisonment, whether it imports that it was against the consent of the party imprisoned; but an assault certainly does import that. The plea seems a direct contradiction of the declaration. I think it amounts to the general issue; and is, therefore, bad.

COLERIDGE, J.—On a declaration charging an assault, the defendant under not guilty may shew that it was not an assault in point of law. If so, this plea justifying

B. afterwards assigned his reversion to D. A. having entered, and ejected C. by reason of the non-performance of the first-mentioned covenant,—Held, that B.'s covenant with C. did not run with the land, and that D. was not liable to C.*

Error from the Court of Queen's Bench.

Covenant. The declaration set out an indenture made between J. Scholefield, of the one part, and E. Burt of the second part, whereby Scholefield demised unto Burt certain lands for a term of years, and whereby Burt covenanted for himself, his executors, and assigns, that he should and would, within the space of two years from the day of the date of the indenture, erect and build upon the piece or parcel of land demised, four or more good and substantial messuages and dwelling-houses, &c. The indenture contained the usual claim of forfeiture for non-performance of the covenant.

The declaration then alleged an entry by Burt, the making of a sub-lease by Burt to the plaintiff, whereby Burt, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenanted with the plaintiff that he would during the continuance of the said sub-lease observe and perform or effectually indemnify the plaintiff of and from and against all and singular the provisoes, covenants, and agreements by the above-mentioned indenture to be observed and performed; that the plaintiff entered; and that afterwards Burt assigned all his interest in the reversion to the defendants; that the defendants refused to perform the covenant entered into with Scholefield, to build, &c., but, on the contrary, committed a breach thereof, and refused to indemnify the plaintiff; and that by reason of such breach, Scholefield entered upon the premises, and expelled the plaintiff.

The defendants demurred to this declaration, upon the ground that the covenant declared upon was personal only, and that as assigns they were not bound by it.

* Coram Parke, B., Alderson, B., Maule, J., Cresswell, J., Platt, B., and Williams, J.

The Court of Queen's Bench, having given judgment for the defendants, the present writ of error was brought. The pleadings in the case are set out in full in the report of the case below (1).

Crowder (M'Mahon with him), for the plaintiff.—The judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed. The covenant entered into by Burt with the plaintiff was one for quiet enjoyment; if so, it bound the assignees of the reversion. It was a covenant falling within the fourth rather than the second resolution in Spencer's case (2). In Vernon v. Smith (3), a covenant to keep buildings in the city of London insured against fire was held to run with the land.

They referred to Campbell v. Lewis (4). All the cases upon the subject are collected in the notes to Spencer's case, 1 Smith's Leading Cases, p. 29.

Addison, contra, after referring to Bac. Abr. 'Covenant,' B,—Merrill v. Frame (5), Shep. Touch. 165, and Line v. Stephenson (6), was stopped by the Court.

Crowder, in reply, cited Williams v. Burvell (7).

PARKE, B.—We all think that the judgment of the Queen's Bench should be affirmed. The question is, whether the covenant in the sub-lease by Burt to the plaintiff passed with the reversion to the defendants or not. It has been argued, on behalf of the plaintiff, that this covenant amounted in law to one for quiet enjoyment. Here the covenant which Burt entered into with the plaintiff was in terms that he would perform all the covenants contained in the original demise from Scholefield to him, or effectually indemnify the plaintiff. A covenant to perform covenants is to be construed as if the latter covenants were inserted at full length in the sub-lease, and applying that test, the covenant which Burt entered into with the plaintiff was to build certain dwelling-houses upon the land demised by Scholefield within the space of two years from the date of the indenture of demise entered into between those parties. This is a description of covenant which, it is clear from the second resolution in Spencer's case, does not bind assigns, unless they are expressly named. Again, if the covenant be taken in the alternative, it amounts to nothing more than a covenant to indemnify; and that clearly is not the same thing as a covenant for quiet enjoyment. A covenant to indemnify is much larger than one for quiet enjoyment. Nor can you split a covenant to indemnify into parts. The effect of that would be to make the same covenant both running with the land and collateral to it at the same time, which clearly cannot be. Taken in the alternative, therefore, as a covenant to indemnify, it was a personal covenant only, and did not pass with the reversion. I have now merely stated at greater length the reasons given by Mr. Justice Patteson for his judgment in the Court below.

A cause being called on for trial, after the jury were sworn, it was discovered that the record was defective in not containing a similiter to one of the plaintiff's replications, or any award of the venire, and in consequence of the defendants withholding their consent to an amendment of the record in these respects, the Judge discharged the jury,—Held, that the defendants were not entitled to the costs of the day.

This cause having been entered for trial at the last Summer Assizes for the county of Brecon, was called on in its order. After the jury had been sworn, it was discovered that the record did not contain any similiter to the plaintiffs' replication of de injuriâ, nor any award of the venire. An application was made to the Judge to allow the record to be amended in these respects; but the counsel for the defendants withholding their consent to this course, the Judge considered that he had no authority to make the amendment à invitos, and the jury were accordingly discharged. A rule having been obtained in the course of Michaelmas term last, on behalf of the defendants, for the costs of the day, for not proceeding to trial, a rule nisi was subsequently obtained on behalf of the plaintiffs calling upon the defendants to shew cause why the above rule for the costs of the day should not be discharged.

Chilton and Benson (Jan. 21) shewed cause.—There is no ground for refusing the defendants the costs of the day. They were bound to attend at the trial by their counsel and witnesses in obedience to the notice of trial; and if, owing to the default of the plaintiffs, the record was in such a state that no valid trial could be had, that is no reason for depriving the defendants of their costs. The defendants were not bound to give their consent to the amendments proposed. In the absence of such consent the authorities are clear that the amendment could not be made; and if not, then that the cause could not proceed—Rowlinson v. Roantre (1), Adams v. Power (2), Bent v. Benyon (3). They referred also to Ouchterlony v. Gibson (4), Cooke v. Smith (5), Cox v. Painter (6), Gee v. Swann (7).

Evans, Ball, and Davison, contra.—This rule should be made absolute. As a general rule, where a jury is discharged by the consent of the parties, or by the order of the Judge who presides at the trial, neither party pays the costs of the day incurred by the other side—Waite v. Spurgin (8), Seeley v. Powers (9), Everett v. Jones (10). In the present case all that appears upon the record is, that the jury were discharged by order of the Judge. At any rate these costs may be awarded or not, at the discretion of the Court; and, in the present case, the circumstances are not such as should induce the Court to exercise this discretion in favour of the defendants. They ought to have given their consent to the proposed amendment. The informality upon the record was one by which they could not have been prejudiced—Ogle v. Moffat (11), Mullings v. ——— (12), The Bishop of Worcester's case (13), Child v. Harvey (14).

ERLE, J. now (Jan. 28) delivered his judgment.—This was an application to discharge a rule obtained by the defendants for the costs of the day, for not proceeding to trial. It appears that, on the cause being called on and the jury sworn, it was discovered that an imperfect record had been made up, and the learned Judge who then presided, considering he had no power to make the amendment without the consent of the defendants, which the defendants refused, was compelled to discharge the jury. It is quite clear from the authorities that the Court has a discretion in granting or withholding these costs. As the defendants themselves were the means of preventing this cause being tried by withholding their consent to the Judge making the required amendment, the rule for discharging the rule for the costs of the day will be made absolute.

WILDE, C.J. now (Feb. 3) delivered the judgment of the Court.—This is a writ of error brought to reverse a judgment of her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench. The declaration is in assumpsit, and contains five counts. The first count is upon a promissory note, dated the 28th of May 1839, made by the defendant for the sum of 140*l.* and interest, payable to the plaintiff twelve months after date. The second count is also on a promissory note, made by the defendant, for the sum of 200*l.*, payable, with interest, to the plaintiff, two years after date. It is unnecessary to advert to the other counts in the declaration, or to the pleadings connected with them. Judgment has been given upon them for the defendant, and no question arises in respect of that judgment. The defendant pleaded to the first count, that he did not make the note therein mentioned, and the like plea to the second count. Upon these pleas issues were joined, and verdicts have been found upon them for the plaintiff. The defendant also pleaded to both the first and second counts, that after the making of the notes in those counts respectively mentioned, and after the second note respectively became due, it was agreed between the plaintiff, the defendant, and one Alfred Beech, that the said Alfred Beech should and would, at the request of the plaintiff, pay to the plaintiff, in trust for Elizabeth Beech, the sum of 200*l.* for her own sole use and benefit, or the sum of 25*l.* per annum, so long as the sum of 200*l.* should remain unpaid, which sum of 25*l.* should be paid quarterly, as therein mentioned, and that the rights and causes of action of the plaintiff upon and in respect of the said two several notes should be suspended, so long as he, the said A. B., should continue to pay the said sum of 6*l.* 5*s.* every quarter, the payments to commence as therein set forth. The plea proceeds to aver that the said A. B. duly paid the annual sum of 25*l.* quarterly, according to the agreement. The plaintiff, in his replication to this plea, traversed the allegation of the payments alleged to have been made by A. B. of the annual sum of 25*l.*, and a verdict was found for the defendant upon the issue joined upon that traverse, and judgment having been given by the Court of Queen's Bench for the defendant upon the verdict so found, the present writ of error has been brought to reverse that judgment upon the ground that, non obstante veredicto, upon the matters in the plea judgment ought to have been given for the plaintiff upon both the first and second counts.

The plaintiff has brought his writ of error praying for a reversal of the judgment; and upon the argument before us, the learned counsel for the plaintiff has contended, that the plea of the defendant to the first and second counts of the declaration is bad, and sets forth no matter which is in law a bar to his right of recovery upon those counts. Upon the part of the plaintiff, the validity of the agreement mentioned in the plea is not denied, but it has been insisted upon the argument before us, that the agreement does not in point of law operate as a suspension of the plaintiff's right of action, or power to sue for the recovery of the notes mentioned in the first and second counts of the declaration; and that the plea which sets up the agreement in bar of the present action is bad, and furnishes no answer to the action, although such agreement may give the defendant a claim to damages, by reason of the plaintiff suing in breach of it. The defendant, on the other hand, has contended before us, that the legal operation of the agreement is to suspend the plaintiff's right of action so long as A. B. shall continue to make the quarterly payments, and such agreement has therefore been well pleaded in bar. The question for the decision of the Court is, therefore, what is the legal effect of the agreement between the parties set forth in the plea; that is, whether the agreement operates as a legal suspension of the plaintiff's right to sue upon the notes so long as A. B. shall continue to make the quarterly payments, or whether the effect of the agreement is limited to the rendering the plaintiff liable to an action for damages, in the event of his suing contrary to its terms. In adjudicating upon the construction and effect in law of this agreement, the common and universal principle ought to be applied, namely, that it ought to receive that construction which its language will admit, and which will best effectuate the intention of the parties, to be collected from the whole of the agreement; and that greater regard is to be had to the clear intent of the parties, than to any particular word which they may have used in the expression of their intent; and applying this rule, the question is, what sense and meaning must be given to the word "suspended" used by the parties. It is quite clear, that it was not the intention of the parties that the agreement should have the effect, from the moment of its being signed, of utterly and for ever and in all events extinguishing the plaintiff's claim and demand upon the notes, or in other words, that it should operate as a release of the money due upon them. This is plain, from the words which import that the plaintiff might sue upon the notes when A. B. should cease to make the quarterly payments mentioned in the agreement. It is a very old and well-established principle of law, that the right to bring a personal action once existing, and by act of the party suspended for ever so short a time, is extinguished and discharged, and can never revive. It is said in Plowden, 36, "And if a personal thing is once in suspense, or the person of a man once discharged for a personal thing, it is a discharge for ever;" and in Lord North v. Butts (3) it is said, "A thing personal, or action personal suspended for an hour is extinct and gone for ever, when it is by the act and consent of the party himself who has the thing suspended;" and in Plowden, 184, it is said, "A personal action once suspended by the act or agreement of the party is always extinct, and then if a personal thing cannot be had but by action, if the action is extinguished, the thing itself is extinguished." The principle thus laid down is repeated throughout the text books of authority, and recognized and applied throughout a long course of decisions; and in Cheetham v. Ward (4) it is said by Lord Chief Justice Eyre, that the principle is now acknowledged, "that where a personal action is once suspended by the voluntary act of the party entitled to it, it is for ever gone and discharged." To construe the agreement, therefore, to operate as a legal suspension or bar of the plaintiff's right to sue until the quarterly payments should cease, would have the effect of precluding him from ever suing at all, and of giving to the agreement the effect of an immediate release of the demand upon the notes and an extinction of the debt. It follows that the giving such meaning and effect to the word "suspended" used in the agreement, would be contrary to the intention of the parties; and it is a well approved rule of law, that where parties have used language which admits of two constructions, one contrary to the apparent general intent, and the other consistent with it, the law assumes the latter to be the true construction. A few authorities will suffice in support of this principle. In commenting upon Littleton, s. 560, where Littleton says, "If there be lord and tenant, and the tenant grant the tenements to a man for life, with remainder to another in fee, and the lord grant his service to the tenant for life in fee, the services are in suspense during his life, but the heirs of the tenant for life shall have the services after his decease," Lord Coke in p. 313, b, says, "It is to be observed, that albeit a grant, as hath been said, may enure by way of release, and a release to the tenant for life doth work an absolute extinguishment, whereof he in the remainder shall take benefit, yet the law shall never make any construction against the purport of the grant, to the prejudice of any, or against the meaning of the parties, as here it should; for if by construction it should enure to a release, the heirs of the tenant for life should be disinherited of the rent; and, therefore, Littleton here saith that the heirs of the grantee shall have the seignorie after his death." In the present case, if the agreement operates as a release, by reason of a suspension of the right of action by the act of the party, it must be by a consequence of law, inasmuch as there is no express release. And in Co. Litt. p. 264 b, it is said, "A release in law shall be expounded more favourably according to the intent and meaning of the parties than a release in deed, which is the act of the party, and shall be taken most strongly against himself." The general rules of law for the construction of instruments are clearly laid down by Willes, L.C.J., in Parkhurst v.

(3) 2 Dyer, 140, a, 39.

Smith (5), and which is to the effect, that greater regard is to be had to the intention than to the precise words, and this rule is said to have the authority of Littleton, Plowden, Coke, Hobart, and Finch. This principle is recognized and adopted by Gibbs, L.C.J., in Hutton v. Eyre (6), and it is also stated and applied by Dallas, L.C.J., and various authorities referred to in Solly v. Forbes (7), wherein he states as the result of modern authority, that the Courts look rather to the intention of the parties than to the strict letter, not suffering the latter to defeat the former; and he observed, that "if a deed can operate two ways, one consistent with the intent and the other repugnant to it, Courts will be ever astute, so to construe it as to give effect to the intent," regard being had to the entire deed; and he remarks upon the fallacy of assuming that wherever the word "release" is made use of, it must operate absolutely and unconditionally, though followed by words of qualification. Applying the rules of construction before referred to to the present case, and in order best to effectuate the intention of the parties, it is necessary to construe the agreement to mean that the plaintiff agreed to forbear his suit until the quarterly payment should cease to be made, and that the effect of such agreement on his part was not to suspend his right of action in the mean time, but to subject him to an action for damages, in the event of his suing, contrary to his agreement. The general doctrine of suspension of personal actions appears to be applicable to cases where persons have by their own acts placed themselves in circumstances incompatible with the application of the ordinary legal remedies; the cases generally referred to in the books being where the party to pay and to receive have become identical, or where the same person was necessary to be joined at once both as plaintiff and defendant, which by law cannot be; such as a creditor making his debtor his executor, or debtor making his creditor executor, or debtor and creditor marrying, or similar cases of incapacity to sue, as to which the authorities are numerous. See Co. Litt. p. 264, b, also Hargrave &

Builer's notes, Woodward v. Lord Darcy (8), Nedham's case (9), Dorchester v. Webb (10), Wankford v. Wankford (11), Freakly v. Fox (12), Williams on Executors, p. 1035, 2 Saund. 47, ff. The only case in which a covenant or promise not to sue is held to be pleadable as a bar, or to operate as a suspension, and by consequence, a release or extinguishment of the right of action, is where the covenant or promise not to sue is general not to sue at any time; in such cases, in order to avoid circuity of action, the covenant may be pleaded in bar as a release, for the reason assigned in Smith v. Mapleback (13), that the damages to be recovered in an action brought for suing contrary to the covenant, would be equal to the debt or sum to be recovered in the action agreed to be forborne. Accordingly, in Deux v. Jefferies (14), in debt on obligation, where the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff covenanted that he would not sue before Michaelmas, it was resolved upon demurrer for the plaintiff, for that "it was only a covenant not to sue, and should not enure as a release nor could be pleaded in bar; but the party was put to his writ of covenant, if sued before the time. But if it had been a covenant that he would not sue at all, peradventure it might enure as a release, and be pleaded in bar; but not here; for it never was the intent of the parties to make it a release." There are other authorities to the like effect.

The agreement in the present case, being founded upon a good consideration, may be argued to be equivalent in effect to a covenant, but cannot have a greater effect; and in the modern case of Thimbleby v. Barron (15) it was held, that a covenant not to sue for a limited time for a simple contract debt could not be pleaded in bar to an action for such debt. In that case the plaintiff had covenanted that he would not, before the expiration of ten years, demand or compel payment of certain sums of money, nor would take any means or proceedings for obtaining possession or receipt of the same. Lord Abinger, C.B. said, "The breach of the agreement to forbear suing, renders the party liable in damages, but is not pleadable in bar;" and Parke, B. said, "The books are full of authorities against the defendant," and referred to Ayloffe v. Scrimshire (16), and judgment was accordingly given for the plaintiff. In 1 Roll. Abr. p. 939, s. 2, it is said that "if the obligee covenant not to sue the obligor before such a day, and if he do that the obligor shall plead this as an acquittance; and that the obligation shall be void and of non-effect; this is a suspension of the debt, and by consequence a release." It must be observed that in that case it was expressly covenanted, that in the event of the covenantor suing upon the obligation contrary to his covenant that the obligation should be void, and that the obligor or covenantor should plead the covenant as an acquittance, which by consequence was a release. The covenant in that case, therefore, went much beyond a mere covenant not to sue.

By holding the plea in question a valid bar injustice would be done to the plaintiff, who would lose his demand upon the notes, contrary to the intention of the parties; but by construing the agreement not to operate as a suspension of the plaintiff's right of action upon the notes, but as giving a remedy to the defendant by a cross-action to recover damages to the extent of the injury sustained by the defendant by the plaintiff's suing in breach of the agreement, no injustice is done to the defendant, nor is such a construction inconsistent with the class of authorities in which matters have been allowed to be pleaded in bar, in order to avoid circuity of action; because such decisions are limited to cases in which, from the nature of them, the damages to be recovered must be supposed to be equal in both actions (Smith v. Mapleback); which does not apply to the present instance, as the damages to which the defendant could be entitled as against the plaintiff by reason of his suing upon the notes before a discontinuance of the quarterly payments, can in no view be assumed to be equal to the plaintiff's demand. Neither is the decision in this case inconsistent with the several cases in which it has been held that a party accepting a negotiable security, payable in future for and on account of an antecedent demand, cannot, until after such negotiable security has become due and been dishonoured, sue for such antecedent demand; because, independently of the consideration of how far the acceptance of such negotiable security may be deemed payment for the time, all such decisions seem to be grounded upon the peculiar nature of the negotiable instruments, and are deemed to be necessary exceptions to the general rules of law, in favour of the Law Merchant — 2 Wms. Saund. 103, b. The case of Stracy v. the Bank of England was cited on the defendants' behalf, as an authority to the effect that a right to bring a personal action may be suspended by agreement without operating as a release or extinguishment; but upon examination it will be found probably not to be an authority bearing upon the point. The action was brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of a public duty in not making a transfer, upon request, of certain stock, to which the plaintiff was entitled; the defendants insisted that the plaintiff had, for a good consideration, agreed not to make such a request until he had himself done certain acts, and alleged that the plaintiff, contrary to his agreement, made the request, for the non-compliance with which he brought his action before he had done those acts; the defendants, therefore, contended that such non-compliance was no breach of duty on their part. There was no right of action suspended by the agreement, as it is clear from the case that no request had ever been made to the Bank to transfer the stock, and no means had ever been given to enable the Bank to do so; no name of a transferee having been given at the time when the agreement was made, nor for a long time afterwards; consequently the only right of action the plaintiff ever asserted was a right founded upon a request made long after the agreement. The decision, therefore, was not that any existing right of action was suspended by the agreement, but that the plaintiff suspended his right to call upon the defendants to make the transfer until after he had done the acts mentioned in the agreement; and although the expression of suspending an action was used perhaps inaccurately, yet it is plain that they referred to the right to call for the transfer of the stock, and to that only. At all events, as a decision upon the point for which the case was cited it could not be supported, as it would be inconsistent with an undoubted principle of law and an undeviating course of authority. In the result, we are of opinion that the plea in question is bad in substance, and that the judgment which has been pronounced upon it, in favour of the defendant, must be reversed, and a judgment entered for the plaintiff, non obstante veredicto.

Ejectment on a demise by the lessor of the plaintiff laid on the 25th of November 1846. By a Judge's order the following case was stated for the opinion of the Court:—

CASE.

Thomas Lester being seised in fee of the tenements in question in this cause, which consist of a freehold messuage or dwelling-house, outbuildings, garden and croft, situate in the parish of Yoxall, containing about three quarters of an acre adjoining to a lane called Wood Lane, and being also seised of a piece of copyhold land containing about an acre and a quarter, adjoining and lying open to the said croft, and not fenced or separated therefrom within time of living memory, and the road to and from the copyhold part of the premises being over the freehold croft, and being also seised of a detached freehold close containing 2 roods 27 perches, heretofore parcel of the late Forest of Needwood, and which, on the inclosure thereof, was allotted to the said Thomas Lester in respect of the said freehold and copyhold property, and being also possessed of some household goods and furniture, and other personal estate, died in August 1819, having duly made and published his last will and testament, in writing, executed and attested so as to pass real estates in the words following, that is to say, "First, I will that all my just debts, funeral expenses, and legacies, and the expense of proving this my will shall be paid and discharged as soon after my decease as they conveniently can. Afterwards I give, devise and bequeath unto my dearly beloved wife, Mary Lester, for and during the term of her natural life, my messuage or dwelling-house, and other buildings belonging to the same, wherein I now inhabit and dwell, and the freehold croft and garden on which the said messuage and other buildings stand, and belonging to the same, lying and being in the parish of Yoxall aforesaid; and from and after her decease I give, devise, and bequeath the aforesaid messuage or dwelling-house, and other buildings, together with the said freehold croft and garden belonging to the same, unto William Sharrott, of Yoxall aforesaid, tailor, Francis Sharrott, of the city of Lichfield, writing clerk, and Harriet Lester, daughter of Moses Lester, of the city of Worcester, tailor, their heirs and assigns for ever, and to be equally divided amongst them. Also I give, devise, and bequeath unto my said wife, Mary Lester, her heirs and assigns for ever, all my real and personal estates whatsoever and wheresoever unto me belonging, both freehold and copyhold, and now surrendered to the uses of my will, and to have the same at my decease; but if my personal estate should not be sufficient to discharge my debts, then I charge my copyhold estate with the payment of the same, and I do hereby nominate and appoint my said wife, Mary Lester, and Francis Sharrott, of the city of Lichfield, writing clerk, executors of this my last will and testament. In witness, &c. Dated the 8th of February 1810."

On the death of the testator, his wife,

Mary Lester, entered on all his freehold property. She died in November 1835, leaving the lessor of the plaintiff her grand-nephew and heir-at-law, who, on attaining the age of twenty-one years in October 1846, brought the present action to recover the freehold messuage, garden, and croft, Francis Sharratt and the other devisees in remainder having entered on the death of Mary Lester, and enjoyed the same till the time of bringing the action.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the said freehold messuage or dwelling-house, garden and croft passed by the will of the said Thomas Lester to the said William Sharratt, Francis Sharratt, and Harriet Lester, after the death of Mary Lester, or whether the same passed, by the subsequent words of the will, to the testator's wife in fee. If the former, judgment of nolle prosequi to be given for the defendant. If the latter, judgment by confession to be given for the plaintiff.

Whately, for the lessor of the plaintiff.—The first devise is irreconcilable with the second, and the latter must therefore prevail—Sims v. Doughty (1), Constantine v. Constantine (2), Odell v. Crone (3), Jarman on Wills, p. 412, Shep. Touch. 402, Doe d. Spencer v. Pedley (4). The testator, either from inaccuracy or change of intention, appears to have varied the disposition of his property in more than one particular, as he charges his freehold property with the payment of his debts and legacies in the first part of his will, but he charges the copyhold with the payment of debts only in the latter part.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—But the second devise introduces a new subject-matter by the words “now surrendered to the use of my will.”]

[PATTESON, J.—There appears to be a detached close on which this devise might operate.]

The defendant must contend that the word “all” must be read as if it were “all not hereinbefore devised.”

Crowder (Taprell was with him), for the defendant.—Looking at the whole will it is clear that the word “all” in the second devise means all the rest and residue, &c. In Anon. Dalison, 93, the following instance is given. “A man seised of land in four counties devises his lands in three of the counties partly to his wife, and the residue to other persons; and by other words in the same will he devises all his lands to his wife to be disposed of after her death for the use and benefit of her son; and by the whole Court nothing passed by those words except the lands in the fourth county not mentioned before in the will.” That is precisely the present case. The last devise is, in fact, a residuary devise—Holdfast v. Pardoe (5), Ulrich v. Litchfield (6), Adams v. Clerke (7).

Whately, in reply.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The case in Atkyns is an authority that the Court will construe a will so as to reconcile devises which may at first seem inconsistent. We must look at the whole, and I think on a reasonable construction the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

PATTESON, J.—There can be no doubt whatever in this case. If there is anything on which the second devise can operate, which I think there is, in that case the words in the first and second devises are clearly reconcilable.

WIGHTMAN, J.—If by any construction the Court can carry out the intension of the testator, they will do it rather than do violence to that intension. Here the testator in the second clause devises all his real and personal estate; and he adds the words “both freehold and copyhold, and now surrendered to the uses of my will.” The question is, whether by this second devise the testator intended to give the whole of his real estate, or the whole that was undisposed of. Unless the word “all” is taken in its most extended sense the devises are not inconsistent; and I think the case in Dalison is expressly in point to shew that it may be well taken to mean all that is undisposed of. The case of Ulrich v. Litchfield turned principally on the question of the admissibility of parol evidence, but the remarks of the Lord Chancellor in that case are important, as he observes that "the charge was on the real estate in case the other should not be sufficient." Here the testator seems to have intended to charge his copyhold estate with the payment of his debts, leaving the freehold untouched.

Error from the Court of Queen's Bench.

Trespass for seizing and distraining sheep.

Plea—justifying the seizure of the sheep as damage feasant, in a farm of J. R. called Tan-y-Graig.

Replication—That the said farm of J. R. called Tan-y-Graig from time immemorial lay contiguous to a farm called Nant Heilyn, from which it never was separated by any fence sufficient to prevent sheep from escaping from one farm to the other; and that the sheep put on Nant Heilyn have from time immemorial been accustomed to escape and ramble therefrom into Tan-y-Graig, and to intermix there, and vice versa; and that the plaintiff, being tenant of Nant Heilyn, put the sheep there, which of their own accord, and without his consent, escaped into Tan-y-Graig, &c. The rejoinder was specially demurred to, but the only point arose on the replication (1). The Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for the defendant, on the demurrer, upon which the plaintiff brought a writ of error, which was argued (Dec. 2, 1846) by—

Watson, for the plaintiff in error; and Hayes, for the defendant in error.—The arguments were the same as those advanced below, and are noticed in the judgment, which was now (May 12, 1847) delivered by—

PARKE, B.—This case was argued at the Sittings after last Michaelmas term, before my Brothers Alderson, Coltman, Maule, Rolfe, Cresswell, Platt, and myself. It came before us on a writ of error, on a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for the defendant, on a demurrer to a rejoinder. [His Lordship then stated the pleadings.] The rejoinder was admitted on the argument here, as it was in the Court of Queen's Bench, to be bad; and the question is, whether the replication was good. It must be considered to be established that a common—or, as it is sometimes called, feeding—Corbet's case (2)—pur cause de vicinage is not properly a right of common or profit à prendre, but rather an excuse for a trespass—Co. Litt. 122. See also the authorities cited in Wells v. Percy (3). Lord Coke says "that the person entitled cannot put in his cattle into the adjoining waste; but they must escape into it." Yet in some of the precedents after noticed, as in Rastell, 625, b, and Year Book, 22 Hen. 6, pl. 51, the turning is stated to be on the adjoining pasture. It must, however, we think, be considered that the law is as stated by Lord Coke. The question then arises, to which the argument before us was mainly addressed, whether it is essential to support such a claim that it should be between persons having rights of common, properly so called, or at least that there should be commoners on both sides, or whether it may exist between two proprietors, whose lands are not subject to common rights; and very ingenious arguments in support of the affirmative of that proposition were used. The Court of Queen's Bench do not appear to have expressed any distinct opinion on this point. If this had been the only question, we think, after a careful consideration of the arguments, and of the authorities, we should probably have held that it might exist between two proprietors, without commons on either side. The reason of the law, which sanctions a claim of this sort, is either on account of its convenience—it being better to inter-common than that each should watch his own cattle, (7 Edw. 4. c. 26), or to avoid multiplicity of suits (4); and both these reasons apply to owners who inter-pasture as well as to commoners, though as to the latter not to the same degree; and the argument that the right can exist amongst commoners only, because they only are limited in turning cattle on the undivided waste or land, is of no weight, because the alleged usage restricts the right of intercommoning to cattle duly turned on, in order to pasture on the land of one proprietor, and therefore limits the number to such as could reasonably be fed on the land in respect of which the right is claimed (Corbet's case); and if we refer to the authorities we find that none lay it down to be necessary that there should be rights of common on both sides; and there are several old authorities that the right may be prescribed for by two owners. In the Year Book, 22 Hen. 6. pl. 51. is a prescription by the lord of Sale for his freeholders for life, for years, or at will, without any allegation that they had right of common. In Fitz. Nat. Brev. 180, it is said, one neighbour may claim common pur cause de vicinage in the lands of another neighbour, although he be not lord of the town. In the 7 Edw. 4. c. 26. there is a difference of opinion between the Judges. Coke, C.J. was of opinion that the allegation of a custom for the inhabitants of Sale to inter-common was bad, and that the prescription should be in a que estate; and Littleton, J. contrà, that it was enough to plead usage. The necessity of a right of common in the persons pleading the usage is not mentioned. In the case of common of Shack (5), the owners of common field lands, not the commoners, inter-common—Corbet's case. Of modern precedents not many are to be found; that in Mr. Chitty's Book, p. 567, from which this replication appears to have been taken, does not mention rights of common. It is followed in the case of Clarke v. Tinker (6) in part, right of common being stated on one side and not on the other. That in Heath v. Elliott (7) stated the usage to be both for cattle turned on to feed and to use common of pasture. In Wells v. Pearcy the usage is said to be for commoners only. In one precedent of the late Mr. Serjeant Williams it is pleaded as a right by custom for cattle depasturing and feeding, not stating in what right; in another an ancient usage for common for cause, &c., for all having either right of pasturage or common of pasture. On the whole, the authorities appear to shew that there is no necessity for commoners on both sides in order to give validity to a claim of common pur cause de vicinage, though where such common exists most frequently there are commoners on both sides. But even assuming it to be clearly made out that two private owners of estates may have the right of inter-pasturing, we do not think that such right is properly claimed by this replication. The Court of Queen's Bench held that such a claim in a private estate could not be good by custom; and we entirely agree with them. A custom is the lex loci, an ancient local law in some known district, as a hamlet, town, or manor, (Co. Litt. 110, a.) and does not arise from the grant or agreement of the party—Gateward's case (8), whereas this right does, and though not a profit à prendre, nor properly an easement, but rather an excuse for a trespass, has its origin from a presumed mutual grant or covenant between the owners of each farm, that neither of them nor their in their own land, and therefore every one doth put in their cattle to feed promiscue in the open field;” and he says that “the said common called shack, which in the beginning was but in the nature of a feeding because of vicinage for avoiding of suit, within some places of that country, is by custom altered into the nature of a common appendant or appurtenant, and in some places it retains its original nature.”

(5) Common of shack exists in Norfolk, and is defined by Lord Coke (7 Rep. 6, a). “to be taken in arable land after harvest until the land be sown again, &c., and it began in ancient time in this manner: the fields of arable land in this country consist of the lands of many and divers several persons lying intermixed in many and several small parcels, so that it is not possible that any of them, without trespass to the others, can feed their cattle tenants should sue the other, or his tenants, or distrain, or perhaps even drive their cattle away (see Termes de la Ley, Common pur cause), so long as the farms should respectively lie open to each other. It is releaseable like any other private right, and it ought, according to the rules of pleading, to be pleaded as a prescription. A prescriptive obligation on another, such as to repair fences, need not be pleaded in a que estate, because the party pleading does not know the title, and may therefore say that the tenants and occupiers from time whereof, &c. have been used to make and repair fences, but the real nature of the right in question is not a simple prescriptive obligation not to sue for trespass, or distrain cattle on his side, but a mutual obligation on both. The obligation of one owner is the consideration for that of another: per Holt, C.J., "it ought to be pleaded mutual"—Bromfield v. Kerber (9); and therefore we think that so general a mode of pleading as has been adopted in this case, which seems to have been taken in part from a plea of the obligation to repair fences, cannot be sustained. There ought, upon principle, to be a plea of prescription in a que estate when it is not a manorial custom; such a plea is given in Rastell's Ent. 625, b, though it is to be observed in that precedent the turning is alleged to be on the adjoining common, which is inconsistent with the notions of common pur cause de vicinage as generally received. The present replication appears to us to be defective in substance as a plea of prescription. It does not state that the farms have, respectively, time out of mind had common pur cause de vicinage eo nomine, or in any way shew the common to be annexed to the estate in the land which the plaintiff occupies. The statement in the subsequent part of the replication of the plaintiff's title to the land forms no part of the statement of right or quasi right, but only serves to bring the plaintiff's sheep within the right as before claimed; it only states, by way of shewing the common pur cause, &c., that the sheep have from time, &c. been used and accustomed to wander. This fact, indeed every part of the replication, may be true, and yet Nant Heilyn and Tan-y-Graig may have been both the property of one owner in fee till the commencement of the suit. In pronouncing this decision, we are not called upon to say what allegation of common pur cause de vicinage would be sufficient in a declaration, or in any pleading in which the common was not claimed against the opposite party, but against some other by way of inducement, or in any case wherein the party pleading is a stranger to the right of common, or where his position is such that by the rules of pleading possession only (or in case of things incorporeal quasi possession) is sufficient to maintain his pleading; nor do we decide what is the proper form of claiming common pur cause de vicinage, in the more usual case in which it is claimed, as incident to an ordinary right of common on the land from which the cattle escaped. These cases are to be governed by the principles of law, and the authorities which are applicable to them. Our decision is confined to the case of a party who is shewn by the preceding part of the record to be a wrongdoer on the land of the opposing party, claiming by his replication the common pur cause de vicinage as annexed or incident to his own land, in derogation of the general exclusive right of his opponent to his land. In such a case, the general principles of law require that the claim should be shewn to arise by grant or prescription; and we think the replication in the present case defective in substance for not shewing the one or the other. On the argument the case of Smith v. Baynard, which was cited from 3 Keb. 388, was pressed on the Court as one in which a plea to the like effect as this replication had been held good on demurrer. The report referred to is so confused (even after correcting some obvious mistakes of the plaintiff and the defendant for each other), that it is scarcely possible to conjecture from it what was the matter in question, or to draw from it any inference, except that the pleadings and argument are erroneously and imperfectly stated. There is a notice of the case in a later stage in the same book, p. 417 (not referred to in the argument), which is much clearer, and which reports that case as one in which the plaintiff in his replication replied to a justification for damage feasant, that his cattle escaped from a close in which he had common pur cause de vicinage into the defendant's close, in default of repair by the defendant, who was bound by prescription to repair, to which the defendant demurred, and the plaintiff had judgment. This is sufficiently simple and intelligible, but as it seems unlikely that in this state of the record the confusion in the report (p. 388) should have arisen, or some of the questions obscurely intimated there have been raised, we caused the record, which is still extant in the Queen's Bench, to be examined. It is of Hil. term, 25 & 26 Car. 2. 112. By this record it appears that it was an action of replevin, for taking the plaintiff's cattle in Cross Park. The defendant, in his avowry, said that Cross Park contains one acre, and that he is seised in fee and took the cattle damage feasant. The plaintiff pleaded in bar that he is owner, and seised of twenty acres, called Vicarage Common, contiguous to a parcel of land called Tregowe Common, not separated by any fence, &c. from Vicarage Common, and that from time whereof, &c. the aforesaid cattle were accustomed to feed in the twenty acres, and stray into Tregowe Common and to inter-common, on account of vicinage, and that Tregowe Common was contiguous to a close of John Paul, called Havas and Creig, and that J. Paul and the tenants of that close, and from time whereof, &c., were accustomed to repair the fences between that close and Tregowe Common, and that Havas and Creig lies contiguous to a close of the defendants, called Croft, and that the defendants and tenants of Croft, and J. Paul, and the aforesaid tenants and occupiers of Havas and Creig were used and ought to repair the hedges and ditches between Havas and Creig and Croft, and that Croft lies contiguous to Cross Park, in which, &c., then in the occupation of the defendant; and the plaintiff further said that he, being seised of Vicarage Common, and the defendant of Cross Park, he put his cattle into the twenty acres to feed there, and because the hedges of the defendant, between the two closes, were broken in default of the defendant, that the plaintiff having placed his cattle to feed there they strayed into Tregowe Common, and from thence into Havas and Creig, and thence into Croft, and thence to Cross Park, into which they entered in default of the defendant, and the cattle were in the said close in which, &c. feeding at the said time when, &c. until the defendant took them, &c. The defendant demurred to this plea in bar, stating, as special causes, that by the law of the land cattle of any one person cannot obtain any right of inter-commoning in alieno solo by usage or per aliquam longi temporis prescriptionem; and for that it is not shewn by that plea that the cattle entered by defect of fences. The defendant joined in demurrer. No judgment is entered on the roll, but supposing the judgment to have been for the plaintiff, as reported in 3 Keb. 417, it by no means supports the replication in the present case. The plea in bar, in Smith v. Baynard, does not claim a right of common pur cause de vicinage in the defendant's land, but amounts only to a plea of defect of fences, the averments preceding the statement of escape through defect of fences into the defendant's land, having no other purpose than to shew that the plaintiff's cattle were lawfully on the land adjoining the defendant's, and then that the alleged trespass arose from a default of the defendant's, without any default of the plaintiff. See Fitz. Nat. Br. 128, C, a, where it is said that if A. be bound to repair against B, and B. against C, and beasts escape out of the land of C. into the land of B, and thence into the land of A, A. shall not have trespass against C. The allegation in the plea in bar, in Smith v. Baynard, of common pur cause de vicinage in Tregowe Common, not charging the defendant's land, but being introduced only for the purpose above mentioned, was properly considered as sufficient on the same principle that possession of a close without shewing title would, in a like case, have been. It appears, therefore, that the case of Smith v. Baynard does not support the replication in the present case. For the reasons before given, we think that the replication is insufficient, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

A declaration in assumpsit contained a set of counts for work done, and money paid by, and on an account stated with D, alleging promises made to D, and a similar set of counts by and with the plaintiffs as executors of D, laying the promises to the plaintiffs as such executors. The second plea stated that D, being the projector of a railway company, agreed, in consideration of defendant consenting to act as a member of the provisional committee, to indemnify him from any professional or other charges on account of the said railway; that the defendant accordingly consented to become and became a member of the provisional committee; that the said work and labour, monies, and accounts in the declaration were respectively done, paid, and stated by D. and by the plaintiffs, as his executors, in and about the surveying the line of the said railway, and after the said agreement to indemnify; that defendant became liable to the said professional and other charges, and made the promises, in the declaration mentioned, only in his character of member of the provisional committee; that after the accruing of the causes of action the railway was abandoned, and the said work done and money paid became wholly useless and of no value to the defendant; and that any money paid by or damage recovered from the defendant, in respect of the said work or payments, will be wholly lost to the defendant, and that the defendant will be thereby damaged, contrary to the said agreement. Last plea, that the said D. in his lifetime caused and procured the defendant to enter into the promises in the declaration by fraud and covin. On special demurrer, —Held, that the first plea was a good bar to avoid circuity of action.

Held, also, that the last plea was well pleaded to the whole declaration, as the defendant had a right to treat the work done and money paid by, and account stated with the plaintiffs, as being done, paid and stated in continuance and in respect of the previous contract with D; and that fraud used in procuring that contract extended to the implied promise arising from the plaintiffs' performance of it.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that the defendant was indebted to J. M. Davey, deceased, in 2,000*l.* for work and labour by him done; and in 2,000*l.* for money paid by the said J. M. D.; and in 2,000*l.* for money found to be due from the defendant to the said J. M. D., on an account stated between them; alleging a promise to pay the said monies to J. M. D. There were then similar counts for work and labour of the plaintiffs as executors of the said J. M. D. for the defendant, at his request, and for divers journeys and attendances by the plaintiffs as such executors as aforesaid, then made and undertaken in and about the doing of the said work and labour for the defendant, at his like request; and for money by the plaintiffs as such executors as aforesaid paid for the use of the defendant; and for money found to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs as such executors as aforesaid, on divers accounts then stated between the defendant and the plaintiffs as such executors as aforesaid; alleging a promise to pay the last-mentioned monies to the plaintiffs as such executors as aforesaid.

Second plea to the whole declaration, that before the making of the said promises in the declaration mentioned, and in the lifetime of the said J. M. D., to wit, on &c., the said J. M. D. projected a certain undertaking, to wit, an undertaking for the formation of a railway, then proposed to be called the "Herne Bay, Canterbury and Dover Railway, and that the said J. M. D. being then desirous of forming a company for the purpose of carrying into effect the said undertaking, and in order to induce the defendant to become a member of the provisional committee of the said projected undertaking and company, did then promise and agree to and with the defendant, that in consideration that he, the defendant, would consent to act as one of the provisional committee of the said Herne Bay, Canterbury and Dover Railway, and such other branches as might be determined on, he, the said J. M. D., would indemnify and save harmless the defendant from any professional or other charges on account of the said railway; that the defendant, relying upon the said promise of indemnity, thereupon did consent to act as one of the said provisional committee, and then became one of the said provisional committee accordingly; that the said work and labour so alleged to have been done, and the materials for the same provided by the said J. M. D., in the lifetime of the said J. M. D., for the defendant, at his request, and the said journeys and attendances so made by the said J. M. D. and his assistants, and the money so paid by the said J. M. D. for the defendant, at his request, were respectively done, provided, made and paid by the said J. M. D. in his lifetime, in and about the surveying of the line of the said Railway, and that the account in the said declaration alleged to have been stated between the said J. M. D. and the defendant, was stated of and concerning monies alleged to be due and owing to the said J. M. D., in respect of the said work, labour, journeys and attendances so made and done as aforesaid by the said J. M. D. and his assistants, and of and concerning the said monies so paid as aforesaid by the said J. M. D., in and about the surveying of the line of the said Railway as aforesaid. That the said work and labour and materials so alleged to have been done and provided by the plaintiffs as executors of the said J. M. D., since the decease of the said J. M. D., for the defendant, at his request, and the journeys and attendances so made, and the monies so alleged to have been paid by the plaintiffs as such executors for the defendant, at his request, were respectively done, made and paid by the plaintiffs as such executors, in and about the surveying of the line of the said railway, and that the account so alleged to have been stated between the plaintiffs as executors as aforesaid and the defendant, was stated of and concerning the said work and labour, materials, journeys and attendances so done and made as aforesaid, by the plaintiffs as executors as aforesaid, and of and concerning the said money so paid as aforesaid by the plaintiffs as executors as aforesaid, in and about the surveying of the line of the said railway. That the said work and labour was so done, and the said materials so provided, and the said journeys and attendances were so made and given, and the said money was so paid, and the said accounts were so stated as aforesaid, by the said J. M. D., in his lifetime, and by the plaintiffs as his executors since his decease respectively, after the making the said promise of indemnity so given by the said J. M. D. to the defendant as aforesaid, to wit, on &c., and on divers days and times between that day and the commencement of this suit; and that the defendant became liable to the said professional charges in respect to the surveying of the said line of railway, and to the said other charges on account of the said railway, and made the said promises in the declaration mentioned only in his character of member of the provisional committee of the said Railway Company, and not otherwise. That after the accruing of the causes of action in the declaration mentioned, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on &c., the said undertaking for the formation of the said railway was wholly abandoned, and the said work and labour, journeys and attendances which had been so made and done as aforesaid by the said J. M. D. in his lifetime, and the plaintiffs as his executors since his decease, and the said payment of money so made as aforesaid by the said J. M. D. in his lifetime, and by the plaintiffs as his executors since his decease, in and about the surveying of the said line of railway, then became and was wholly useless and of no value to the defendant; and that any sums of money which may be paid by, or any damages which may be recovered from the defendant, in respect of the said work and labour, journeys and attendances in the declaration mentioned, so made and done as aforesaid, or in respect of the other payments in the declaration mentioned so made as aforesaid, will be wholly lost to the defendant, and the defendant will be damnified to that extent, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said agreement and promise of the said J. M. D. to indemnify and save harmless the defendant. Verification.

Last plea, that the said J. M. D. deceased in his lifetime caused and procured the defendant to enter into the said promises in the declaration mentioned, by means of the fraud, covin, and fraudulent misrepresentation of the said J. M. D. and others in collusion with him. Verification.

Demurrer to the second plea, on the ground that if it discloses a defence at all it amounts to the general issue; that if it confesses any cause of action it does not avoid it; that it is pleaded to the whole declaration, whereas at most it could only apply to those counts which allege a cause of action accruing to the deceased, and that it is double and multifarious.

Demurrer to the last plea, on the ground that it professes to be pleaded to the whole declaration, whereas it is only an answer to a part, and that, as compared with the declaration, it is repugnant and absurd on the face of it.

Joinders in demurrer.

Crowder, in support of the demurrers (Nov. 9).—The second plea sets up a cross demand, which would only enable the defendant to bring an action against the plaintiffs as executors of Davey, in the event of his being sued for these charges. The indemnity given is against individual loss only, and non constat that any has accrued, as although the scheme has been abandoned there may have been deposits enough paid to meet these charges. Morley v. Inglis (1) shews, that a plea setting up such an agreement by the testator is no answer to the action. The executors would only be liable on the agreement to indemnify if they had assets, and therefore it is not certain that there would be any circuity of action.

[COLERIDGE, J.—Does the doctrine of circuity of action depend upon the second action being productive? You admit such a cross action would lie.]

No doubt it would be no answer that the second action would be unproductive, on the ground of insolvency, or the like: but here the plaintiffs would only be liable to an action as executors in the event of their having assets.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Is not this work done under a contract with the defendant, that in consideration of his allowing his name to be used he should not be liable to be sued?]

If so, the plea amounts to the general issue. But this plea is wrongly pleaded to the whole declaration, for a debt due from the testator cannot be set off against an account stated with the plaintiffs as executors—Scholefield v. Corbett (2).

Then the last plea is bad, as it is pleaded to the counts for work done, &c. by the executors, as well as to the counts alleging the promise to the testator.

[ERLE, J.—If the work done by the executors was in continuance of the work done by the testator, and under the same contract, and the fraud was committed in the beginning of the contract, it will extend to the subsequent performance by the executors.]

Possibly such a defence might be pleaded, but it is not that which is here set up; besides, it would be repugnant to the declaration, which does not allege a contract entered into by the testator and continued by the executors.

Peacock, contra.—The second plea shews that the promise made in fact by the defendant was made in his character of provisional committee-man, and under circumstances which disentitle the plaintiff to sue upon it; therefore it confesses a cause of action which it avoids, and does not amount to the general issue.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—The undertaking is only to save harmless the defendant. Suppose that deposits enough were received to enable the defendant to pay.]

That might be replied: but it cannot be the case, as it is alleged in the plea, and admitted by the demurrer, that whatever the defendant is called on to pay will be wholly lost to him. The law as to circuity of action is collected in the notes to Turner v. Davies (3); and Carr v. Stephens (4) is a strong case to shew how the Courts incline against circuity of action. Morley v. Inglis, cited for the plaintiff, is distinguishable, as there the guarantee was given for a third person, and the damages being unliquidated the debt could not be set off. In Scholefield v. Corbett also the money was received after the testator's death to the use of the executors, and therefore a debt from the testator could not be set off against it. The plaintiffs, as executors of Davey, cannot be in a better situation than Davey himself would have been, and he could not have sued the defendant; therefore this plea is as good an answer as it would have been to an action by Davey.

As to the last plea being pleaded to the whole declaration, if the promise to the executors was implied from their continuance of the contract entered into with the testator, and that was founded in fraud, it cannot be sued upon by the executors, as it could not have been sued upon by the testator if completed in his lifetime; this plea does (at least on general demurrer) shew that the promises were made with the plaintiffs in furtherance of a contract entered into with their testator. Either the declaration must be taken to be pointed to work, &c. done by the plaintiffs in furtherance of their testator's contract, in which event the plea is clearly good, or the contract entered into with the plaintiffs as executors is unconnected with that made with their testator, in which case the plea would be bad, but the declaration would also be a misjoinder.

Crowder, in reply.—The cases cited as to circuity of action were cross demands between the same parties; the fact of the statute of set-off giving express power to executors to set off debts due to their testator, shews that otherwise they would not have been within its provisions. That is a strong argument against there being any circuity of action here.

Yes; and as this is a contract of indemnity the defendant cannot sue the plaintiff until he has himself been sued and has suffered loss; in any other view the plea amounts to the general issue. As to the last plea, it ought to be an answer in omnibus; it is not enough that there may possibly be cases in which it would be an answer.

[ERLE, J.—I can find no cases where it would be an answer, except that put by Mr. Peacock, of money had and received, or of work done in continuance of a prior contract.]

The account stated with the executors may be in respect of money lent or goods sold by them.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The defendant

undertakes to prove an account stated in respect of a contract entered into with the testator.]

[ERLE, J.—This plea is a good answer to the count for work and labour, and money paid by the executors, and you have no point stated that it is not confined to that count.]

The objection is, that the plea is too general.

The judgment of the Court (5) was now (Feb. 26) delivered by—

COLERIDGE, J.—The first set of counts of the declaration was for work done and money paid by, and on an account stated with the testator Davey. The second set was for the same by and with the plaintiffs as executors of Davey. The first of the pleas alleged that Davey being the projector of a company for a railway agreed, in consideration of defendant consenting to act on the provisional committee, to indemnify him from any professional or other charges on account of the said railway; that defendant did consent so to act; that the works, monies, and accounts in the declaration mentioned were respectively done, paid, and stated by Davey, and by the plaintiffs as his executors in and about the surveying of the line of the said railway, and after the said agreement to indemnify; that defendant became liable to the said professional charges in respect of surveying the said railway, and the other charges on account of the said railway, and made the promises only in his character of member of the provisional committee, and not otherwise; that the project was abandoned, and the said work and money became useless and of no value; that any sums recovered on account of the said work and monies paid will be lost to the defendant, and the defendant will be damnified to that extent contrary to the promise of Davey to indemnify. This plea shews that the causes of action were professional and other charges on account of the railway comprised within the testator's agreement to indemnify, and that the defendant could recover from Davey, or his representatives, as much as the plaintiffs can recover from the defendant in respect of these causes of action. The plea therefore is a bar to avoid circuity of action—Turner v. Davies, where the cases of pleas held good as being in avoidance of circuity of action are collected.

The second of the pleas alleged that the testator caused the defendant to enter into the promises by fraud; and in support of the demurrer to this plea it was contended, that it could not apply to the promises in the second set of counts, which were made after the death of the testator. The defendant answered, that if he became indebted to the plaintiffs as executors for work done as executors after the death, and money paid as executors after the death, it was in the manner to be gathered from the first of the pleas, namely, that a contract was made with the testator for surveying the line, and that the plaintiffs as executors after the death, in performance of that contract, did the work and paid the monies mentioned in the second set of counts, and that the account was stated with the plaintiffs in respect thereof; that the counts are applicable to this cause of action, and the defendant has a right so to apply them; and that if the testator by fraud procured the original contract, his fraud procured the implied promise arising from performance of the work, and payment of the money by the executors under the contract. Upon this view, we are of opinion that the defendant's answer is well founded, and therefore our judgment is for the defendant.

his estate in T. M. A, one of the official assignees of the said Court of Bankruptcy, and that the debts in the declaration mentioned accrued before the filing of the said petition, and that the order was still in force, &c. :—Held, that the plea was good, both in form and substance, as shewing the effect of a final order under the 10th section of the above statute, though it did not shew the appointment of a creditors' assignee.

Assumpsit by the drawer against the acceptor of a bill of exchange.

Plea—That after the making of the said promises and accruing of the causes of action in the declaration mentioned, and before the commencement of the suit, to wit, on the 16th day of June, A.D. 1843, the defendant not being a trader within the meaning of the statutes in force relating to bankrupts, at the time of the making and passing of the act of parliament hereinafter mentioned, and having resided twelve months in London, under and by virtue of, and according to the directions and provisions of, a certain statute made and passed in the sixth year of the reign of our Lady the now Queen, intituled, "An Act for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors," (5 & 6 Vict. c. 116,) duly presented his petition for protection from process to the Court of Bankruptcy in London, which said petition during all the time herein in that behalf mentioned had annexed to it a full and true schedule of the defendant's debts; and the same schedule and petition then were pursuant to and then duly contained all the matters in that behalf mentioned in the said statute, according to the form and effect thereof, and the same petition, bearing date, to wit, on the 16th day of June 1843, was forthwith afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, duly and according to the form and effect of the said statute filed of record in the said Court of Bankruptcy; and that such proceedings were thereupon had in the same court, upon the said petition of the defendant, pursuant to the said statute and, in all respects conformably thereto; that afterwards, and before the commencement of the suit, to wit, on the 28th day of August, A.D. 1843, according to the form of the said statute, and pursuant thereto, a final order for protection and distribution was made by a commissioner duly authorized in that behalf; that is to say, such final order as aforesaid was then made by R. G. C. F. Esq., one of the commissioners of the said county, duly authorized in that behalf, for the protection of the person of the defendant from all process, and for the vesting of the estate and effects of the defendant in T. M. A., one of the official assignees of the said court of bankruptcy; that the several debts in the declaration mentioned arose before the said date of the said filing of the said petition; and that the said order and discharge still remain in full force, and in all respects valid in law. Verification.

Demurrer, assigning for causes that it is alleged in the plea that a final order for protection and distribution was made by a certain commissioner of bankrupts therein mentioned, whereas no power or authority was given to such commissioner by the statute, in the said plea mentioned, to make any order whatever for distribution, as in the said plea mentioned, but merely an order for the protection of the person of the petitioner from all process, and for the vesting of his estate and effects in an official assignee, to be named by such commissioner, together with an assignee to be chosen by the majority in number and value of the creditors who might attend before the commissioner on a certain day, and for carrying into effect such proposal as the petitioner should have set forth in his petition; and also that the final order in the said plea mentioned is not such an order as the commissioner in the said plea named was authorized by law to make; and also that it is not stated in and by the said plea, that the petition therein mentioned was referred by the Court of Bankruptcy to R. G. C. F. Esq., therein named, &c.

Joinder in demurrer.

The plaintiff's points were, that the plea, as a plea of protection, under the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, is bad. First, because it merely negatives the defendant being a trader at the time of the passing of that statute, instead of negating his being so at the time of his presenting his petition for protection; secondly, because the order, which is therein alleged to have been made, is not such as is warranted by the statute; thirdly, that it is not a general plea, in the form given by the 10th section of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and, as a special plea, it is bad for not stating that the defendant gave the necessary notices, or that the necessary proceedings were had to warrant the making of the final order; fourthly, that, a general plea being given, the defendant cannot plead specially.

This case was argued in Michaelmas term (Nov. 12,) by—

Archbold, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is ill, as it does not pursue the general form given by the statute; and being special it does not state the particulars required by the statute—Sheen v. Garrett (1), Leaf v. Robson (2).

[COLERIDGE, J.—What does it omit?]

It does not omit, but adds matter which shews that the proceedings are void on the face of them. The order, as set out in the plea, is for vesting the bankrupt's estate in the official assignee only, whereas the 4th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. requires also a creditors' assignee. This objection was taken by Maule, J., in Nicholls v. Payne (3).

[ERLE, J.—The Court do not appear to have given any judgment in that case, as the defendant's counsel elected to amend.]

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Would the order as set out here support an issue taken on the making of the order in pursuance of the statute?]

Clearly not: it is necessary that an order for distribution, in pursuance of this statute, should vest the insolvent's estate in two assignees. The plea is also ill for not shewing that the defendant was not a trader in 1842; and if so, it should be shewn that he did not owe more than 300*l*.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The plea states that the defendant was not a trader within the statutes in force concerning bankrupts.]

The plea is also bad, if the alleged date of presenting the petition is to be taken to be the real date; as the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, which amends the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, gets rid of the plea altogether—Toomer v. Gingell (4).

[COLERIDGE, J.—But you might raise that question by replying specially that the petition was subsequent to the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96.]

Cowling, contra.—It is a sufficient answer to say that the plea is good under the 10th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, which provides, "that if any action is brought against any petitioner for or in respect of any debt contracted before the date of filing his petition, it shall be a sufficient plea in bar of the said suit or action that such petition was duly presented and a final order for protection and distribution made by a commissioner duly authorized, whereof the production of the order, signed by the commissioner, shall be sufficient evidence." This act is not wholly repealed by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, which must, at all events, be taken to extend only to cases subsequent to the 9th of August 1844. The petition in this case was filed in 1843, and the order was made under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116: and it is stated in the plea that the order is still in force. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. empowers the commissioner to give protection to the person of the petitioner from all process. The subsequent act only protects in reference to debts mentioned in the schedule. Then as to the form of the plea. The 6 Geo. 4. c. 16, by section 126, gives a precise form of plea; but the 10th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. gives no form. The plea should shew that the petition was after the debt accrued, and that brings it within the operation of the section. It need not be stated that the petition was duly presented. In Cook v. Henson (5) it was held sufficient to plead that a petition was duly presented and a final order for protection and distribution was made: in that case Leaf v. Robson was cited; and Tindal, C.J. observed, that "if the decision of the commissioner as to the motion authorizing the making of a final order is not to be controverted, there can be no reason for requiring the plea to set out all the facts necessary to give him jurisdiction." In Leaf v. Robson it was not alleged that the petition was duly presented, or that the order was final, or that it was for protection and distribution. In Nicholls v. Payne it was not stated that the final order was for distribution. It is no objection that it is not stated that there was a creditors' assignee; the Court will not assume that the creditors attended, and if they did not attend a creditors' assignee would not be appointed.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—But is not the order prima facie bad for not shewing either that the estate was vested in the creditors' assignee, or some reason why such assignee was not appointed?]

In Gillon v. Deare (6) the plea did not state that the order was for protection and distribution. If the argument on the other side is tenable, the plea would have been bad in that case, on the very ground that there was no creditors' assignee shewn.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The point was not made in that case.]

[WIGHTMAN, J.—In that case, too, the plea gave the reason for the omission. Would the order support the plea as it is set out?]

Yes. If the order is not correct in form the creditors may, under the 12th section, apply to have it rescinded. The order, in fact, is duly made, and is in the usual form.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Your difficulty is that you do state particular circumstances. It may be that you state too much.]

All the averments are under a videlicet.

Archbold, in reply.

The judgment of the Court was now (Feb. 26,) delivered by—

COLERIDGE, J.—In this case the plea contains all that is required to make it valid under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. s. 10. (see Cook v. Henson), and also an allegation describing the final order to be for vesting the effects in the official assignee. The plaintiff contended that the plea must be taken to describe the form and effect of the final order mentioned therein; and as, by section 4. of the above-named statute, the effects are to be vested in an official assignee and an assignee to be chosen by the creditors, a final order, as stated in the plea, would be void both in form and effect (see Nicholls v. Payne); but it appears to us that the plea is valid. The description of the final order does not purport to set out the form; and although we have no judicial knowledge of any forms settled under the regulations authorized by section 13. of the statute, still it is obvious that a final order may be silent as to the vesting of the effects, and may leave that consequence to follow by force of the statute, and that, therefore, the plea may only describe the effect of the final order. Then, with respect to the effect, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. s. 10, enacting that the official assignee shall have all rights alone until a creditors' assignee is chosen, shews that a final order may have the effect stated in this plea; and as in many cases of insolvency no creditors' assignee is ever chosen, perhaps the majority of final orders operate in the way here pleaded. These objections fail, and it is, therefore, not necessary to resort to the further answer, that as the plea is complete and valid, if the objectionable part is struck out, that part may be treated as surplusage, which does not vitiate.

Master and Servant—General Hiring—Discharge under 4 Geo. 4. c. 34.—Notice—Pleading—Indebitatus Counts—Rescinding Contract—Payment pro rata.

The plaintiff declared on a contract by the defendant to employ the plaintiff in his service until the service should be determined by due and reasonable notice, and alleged as a breach, that the defendant wrongfully dismissed him without notice; with a count for work and labour. The defendant pleaded to the special count, that the plaintiff misconducted himself by refusing to work, and that the defendant discharged him; and he also pleaded to that count, that the defendant, in consequence of the plaintiff's misconduct in absenting himself, summoned him before a magistrate under the statute 4 Geo. 4. c. 34; and that the magistrate discharged him. The proof was, that the plaintiff was hired generally as an agricultural labourer, and left work before eight o'clock on a particular day because beer was not supplied, and that he was on the following day taken before a magistrate, who ordered his dis- charge from service:—Held, that the hiring being general, the defendant was entitled to a verdict on the first count on the ground of variance.

Held, secondly, that the defendant was entitled to a verdict on both the special pleas, though the jury did not find that the plaintiff wrongfully absented himself; and lastly, that, the facts stated in those pleas being proved, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover on the count for work and labour.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated, that in consideration that the plaintiff, on &c., at the request, &c. would enter into the defendant's employ and service, to wit, in the capacity of a servant in husbandry, and serve him in that capacity for a certain time then understood and agreed between them, to wit, from the day and year aforesaid, to wit, until the said service should be determined, to wit, by due and reasonable notice in that behalf on either side, at and for certain reasonable hire and wages, to wit, &c., the defendant undertook and promised the plaintiff to retain and employ the plaintiff in the capacity aforesaid, upon the terms aforesaid, and pay, &c., and continue him in such service until it should be determined by due and reasonable notice. Averment, that although the plaintiff, to wit, on &c., did enter into the employ of the defendant, &c., and hath always from the commencement thereof been ready and willing to remain and continue in the said service, &c., and during all the time aforesaid tendered and offered himself to the defendant in such service, yet the defendant did not nor would continue the plaintiff in his said service, but on the contrary, on &c., refused to continue the plaintiff in his service, and wrongfully discharged the plaintiff without any previous notice, per quod the plaintiff lost wages, to wit, 20*l.*, which he might have earned in the defendant's service, and has been deprived of divers other great gains and profits, &c.

There were also counts for work and labour, and on an account stated.

Pleas—First, non assumpsit; second, to the first count, that the defendant did not refuse to continue the plaintiff in his service, nor did the defendant discharge the plaintiff therefrom modo et formâ. Third plea, to the first count, that before the discharge of the plaintiff, as in the first count mentioned, to wit, &c., the plaintiff, as such servant, &c., was requested and commanded by the defendant to mow and reap the corn then standing in a certain field of the defendant, and to continue so mowing and reaping the said field until the hour of eight o'clock in the evening of the said day, the same being the usual period for continuing to mow corn at the said time, and to set and place the corn so mown in shocks on the following morning, and then it became and was the duty of the said plaintiff so to do, of which the said plaintiff then had notice; but although the plaintiff, at the command of the defendant, then commenced mowing and reaping the said corn, and continued so reaping and mowing the same for a portion of the said day, to wit, till the hour of four in the afternoon, and although the said plaintiff might and could have continued mowing and reaping the corn in the said field, yet the said plaintiff neglected and refused to continue mowing and reaping the said corn until the hour of eight o'clock in the evening, and when a small quantity only of the said corn was reaped, and while a large portion, to wit, one-half of the corn in the field, was still standing unmown, and whilst a long time, to wit, four hours of the said day remained unelapsed, and before the said hour of eight o'clock, the plaintiff refused to continue mowing, &c., and wrongfully and in breach of his said duty and of the said command of the said defendant, then quitted and absented himself from his said work, and left the corn so then standing in the said field, and then refused to return to his said work of mowing and reaping the said corn, wherefore the defendant did discharge the plaintiff from his said service, as he lawfully might for the cause aforesaid. Verification. Fourth plea, to the first count, that whilst the plaintiff was in the said service of the defendant, and before, &c., he, the plaintiff, was a person so hired and employed as such servant in husbandry, and the plaintiff, so being such servant of the defendant, did before his discharge, to wit, &c., unlawfully quit his work before the same was completed, contrary to his duty as such servant in husbandry, and in breach of his said contract, wherefore the defendant afterwards, to wit, &c., made his complaint on oath before John Sladden, Esq., one of

Her Majesty's Justices, &c., and the said plaintiff then being brought before the said John Sladden, and having admitted the truth of the complaint, and that he, the plaintiff, was guilty of the same, he, the said John Sladden, did then and there adjudge, order and direct that the plaintiff was guilty thereof, and that he should be forthwith discharged from the said service and employment of the defendant, whereupon the defendant did discharge the plaintiff from his said service. Verification. Fifth plea, as to so much of the second count as respects the sum of 2*l.* 5*s.*, that after the accruing of the causes of action, he, the said defendant, paid to the plaintiff, who then accepted and received, the said sum of 2*l.* 5*s.* in full satisfaction, &c.

Replication to the third and fourth pleas de injuriâ, and nolle prosequi as to the 2*l.* 5*s.*

At the trial, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the Spring Assizes for Kent, 1847, it appeared that the plaintiff was an agricultural labourer, and was hired by the defendant at Michaelmas 1845, as a waggoner. No precise amount of wages was agreed on, but it was proved that 10*l.* 10*s.* a year was a reasonable sum for wages for that class of servants to which the plaintiff belonged. On the Thursday before the 4th of August 1846, the plaintiff was sent with other labourers to a field of the defendant's to mow wheat. For some days they continued to work at the mowing (according to what appeared to be the usual course) until half-past six in the evening; at which time they had an allowance of strong beer, and then they desisted from mowing and proceeded to put the wheat into shocks, which operation they continued till eight o'clock, when they finally left off work in the harvest field, and the plaintiff then proceeded to look after the horses. On the 4th of August the plaintiff and the other labourers were at three or four o'clock told by the bailiff, that they were not to shock the wheat till the next morning. They continued to work till half-past six as usual, when they sent for their beer, and they were told that they would have no more till the corn was carried. They then left work in the harvest field, instead of continuing to mow till eight. The defendant said nothing that evening, though he was present when the labourers were at supper at eight o'clock, but on the following morning he told them he had no work for them, and on that day they were all taken before a magistrate, and charged with absentiug themselves from work contrary to the provisions of 4 Geo. 4. c. 34. They admitted that they were guilty of leaving off work at half-past six the previous evening, and the magistrate ordered them to be discharged from their employ and to forfeit their wages. His Lordship directed the jury, that the absentiug of the plaintiff from work was a refusal to continue working; but it was for them to say under the third plea whether the defendant had a right to discharge the plaintiff on this ground, and also whether the refusal of the beer was a good ground for the plaintiff absentiug himself; and that the same question was raised on the fourth plea, which alleged an unlawful leaving of the defendant's service by the plaintiff. His Lordship reserved leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a nonsuit. The jury found for the plaintiff, damages 8*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*

In Hilary term—

Shee, Serj. obtained a rule nisi for a nonsuit, or for leave to enter a verdict on the third and fourth pleas, or for a new trial. He cited Turner v. Mason (1).

Montagu Chambers and Lush shewed cause (Jan. 20.)—First, there is no ground for a nonsuit, as the contract was proved. The hiring was general according to the evidence, though that might be in point of law a hiring for a year—Fawcett v. Cash (2); and it is averred in the declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to reasonable notice, which was a question for the jury as well as what was reasonable notice—Williams v. Byrn (3). Besides, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to a verdict on the count for work and labour. Secondly, as to entering a verdict for the defendant, the substance of the third plea is, that the plaintiff was commanded to do a certain act. But even if it be taken that he was lawfully commanded, still it appears that the plaintiff was hired as a waggoner; was he bound to mow or reap at all? At all events, was he bound to continue reaping till the time specified? No wilful disobedience is alleged, and therefore this case is distinguishable from Callo v. Brouncker (4) and Turner v. Mason. The fourth plea is founded on the statutes 5 Eliz. c. 4. and 4 Geo. 4. c. 34. s. 3; and as the whole plea is put in issue by the replication de injuriâ, it should have been shewn that an offence was committed. The statute 4 Geo. 4. c. 34. s. 3. provides, that if any servant in husbandry (amongst others) having entered into service with any person shall absent himself from his service before the term of his contract, a Justice of the Peace upon complaint, &c. may punish the offender by abating the whole or any part of his wages, or discharge such servant from the service, but the magistrate cannot both stop a servant's wages and discharge him; and the jury must be taken to have found that the plaintiff did not unlawfully absent himself. It is evident that in this case the magistrate acted as a peacemaker, and at most only decided that it was better that the servant should be discharged, leaving the question of wages open.

[COLERIDGE, J.—Was not this decision a judicial determination of the contract?]

If that were so, still this action is not brought for wages accruing after the time of the discharge. Besides, the plea must state all the facts necessary to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the magistrate; if that jurisdiction is not shewn, the adjudication does not prove the plea, and if the adjudication is bad the plea is bad. It may also be contended, that the statute 4 Geo. 4. c. 34. does not make the "leaving work" such a misconduct as to give the magistrate jurisdiction, it only mentions "absentiug from service." The averment that the plaintiff unlawfully left work might be satisfied by proof that the plaintiff left work for five minutes only—In re Turner (5).

[COLERIDGE, J.—That would be a question for the magistrate if he had jurisdiction.]

If the magistrate had not jurisdiction, it is clear that there was no such wilful disobedience as to entitle the defendant to discharge the plaintiff. It was not proved that the 10*l.* 10*s.* was fixed as the amount of wages payable at the end of the year, but it was given by the jury as the usual rate of wages.

Shee, Serj. and Ogle, in support of the rule.—First, the defendant is entitled to a nonsuit. If there was an express hiring for a year, notice is out of the question. It cannot be that a yearly contract of hiring in the case of agricultural servants can be determined by notice, which might be given just before harvest time. The month's notice or month's warning in the case of domestic servants is matter of custom. If so, the plaintiff cannot fall back on the count for work and labour—Cutter v. Powell (6).

[COLERIDGE, J.—It would appear that the conduct of the plaintiff was submitted to the magistrate, who has annexed a specific penalty, leaving the question of wages still open.]

[PATTESON, J.—It is contended, on the other side, that the magistrate could not both discharge the servant and also deprive him of his right to wages. Something is said incidentally on this point in Lancaster v. Greaves (7).]

If the magistrate does not imprison the servant, he may abate the whole of the wages due; but if he discharges the servant, the common law itself will deprive him of the wages. Spain v. Arnott (8) is in point. Then, the third plea is said to involve a mixed question of law and of fact, which ought to have been left to the jury, and might have been found in the same way as it has been decided; but it is submitted that it is solely a question of law. The plaintiff insisted on a customary allowance of beer, but no custom was proved; and then the only point was, whether this was a lawful order, disobedience of which justified dismissal. It is conceded on the other side that wilful disobedience is sufficient to justify the dismissal—Turner v. Mason. As to the fourth plea, it is said that this plea being under the statute is not supported by the adjudication.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—There is no question as to the validity of the adjudication, but only whether the plea was proved.]

proves the third plea proves the remainder of the fourth. The fact of a charge being made is all that is necessary to give the magistrate jurisdiction to discharge the servant; and there is no necessity that the facts stated in the complaint should be alleged or proved.

COLERIDGE, J.—The plaintiff in the first count declared on a special contract of hiring, determinable on reasonable notice, and alleged a breach in discharging him without such notice. The proof was a general hiring as an agricultural labourer, a waggoner. That is in law a hiring for a year, and not determinable at any time on reasonable notice. This is a fatal variance, and the defendant is entitled to a verdict on the plea of non assumpsit so far as regards the first count. There was also a traverse of the discharge, on which the plaintiff is entitled to retain the verdict. But there were two special pleas to this count: one (the third plea) stating a discharge by the defendant for disobedience of orders, in not working during harvest till eight o'clock at night; the other (the fourth plea) stating that the plaintiff quitted his work, and a discharge by the magistrates under 4 Geo. 4. c. 34. s. 3. There was also a count for work and labour, to which the only plea was non assumpsit, on which the plaintiff had a verdict. The plaintiff had a verdict on the special pleas, but leave was given to enter a verdict for the defendant on them. It is necessary to consider those pleas and the evidence with regard to them, not only on account of costs, but because the facts proved essentially affect the plaintiff's right to retain his verdict on the indebitatus count. The hiring was for 10*l.* 10*s.* for the year; no part of the wages being due till the end of the year. The discharge was at the end of ten months. If the plaintiff had been guilty of disobedience of orders and of unlawfully absenting himself from his work, so as to justify that discharge, (assuming the defendant could have discharged the plaintiff,) then, no wages being due, the plaintiff was entitled to nothing, and the indebitatus count cannot be sustained.

(6) 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 1.

(7) 9 B. & C. 628; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. M.C. 116.

(8) 2 Stark. N.P.C. 256.

If, on the other hand, the discharge was not justifiable, then the plaintiff was at liberty to treat that discharge as a rescinding of the contract by the defendant, and to adopt that rescinding and sue for wages pro ratâ up to the time of the unjustifiable discharge, and so to retain his verdict on the indebitatus count. We do not think it necessary to go through the authorities which establish this view of the law ; they will be found collected in Mr. Smith's Leading Cases, vol. 2, p. 1, in the notes to the case of Cutter v. Powell.

The discharge in this case was not directly by the master (the defendant), but by a magistrate, under the statute 4 Geo. 4, on the complaint of the master. But we are of opinion that it is sufficiently the act of the defendant to entitle him to a verdict on the third plea, supposing the alleged misconduct of the plaintiff to be established, and also to entitle him to a verdict on the plea of non assumpsit to the indebitatus count, on the like supposition, because, in that case, he never was indebted to the plaintiff at all. It was contended, that the only material part of the fourth plea is the discharge by the magistrate, and that the alleged misconduct stated in the plea by way of inducement was not put in issue by the replication, for that the magistrate may have discharged the plaintiff on other grounds, as by way of settling the dispute in an equitable way, and so leaving the question of right to wages pro ratâ untouched. But on reference to the statute, it will be found that the magistrate has no jurisdiction to discharge unless it shall appear to him that the servant "shall not have fulfilled such contract, or hath been guilty of any such misconduct or misdemeanour as aforesaid." So that the question on the two special pleas, and also on the plea of non assumpsit to the indebitatus count, ultimately depends on the facts, whether they do, or do not, establish such misconduct of the plaintiff as justified his being discharged.

The plaintiff was engaged as a waggoner, but during the harvest worked in the field generally ; and we think it must be taken as part of the contract that he should so do. The practice was during harvest to work till eight o'clock in the evening. The plaintiff refused to work till that hour, not as being an unreasonable hour, or as not being within the terms of his contract, but because strong beer of good quality was not allowed to him, according to a custom which he alleged to exist, the beer supplied being, as he contended, very bad small beer, not so good as water. This supposed custom the plaintiff wholly failed to establish by evidence, and his desertion of his work was left without justification. The defendant, therefore, had a right to discharge him, and must be taken to have exercised that right by ordering him not to return, taking him before a magistrate, and acquiescing in the magistrate's order of discharge.

The jury, indeed, negatived the wrongful absence of the plaintiff from his work ; but their opinion on that point cannot do away the effect of these facts, which are stated in the plea and were clearly proved. It follows that the plaintiff cannot recover for the time of his actual service on the indebitatus count, as he was bound to give a whole year's service before claiming any wages, and broke his contract by leaving that service before the year's end.

Dec. 29. } NEWTON v. BANKS.

Error—Costs—Court of Requests—Suggestion.

By a court of requests act it was provided that a plaintiff suing in any of the courts at Westminster, for a cause of action recoverable in the court of requests, should not be entitled to any costs if he succeeded:—Held, an error brought on a judgment in the Court of Queen's Bench for debt and costs, the fact of the defendant being resident within the jurisdiction of, and liable to be sued in the court of requests being assigned as error, and the plea being in nullo est erratum, that the judgment, so far as regarded the costs, was erroneous.

Error coram nobis. The error assigned was, that the record and proceedings were erroneous in this, that judgment had been entered for debt and costs, whereas the plaintiff in error (the defendant below), at the time when the action was brought, resided within the jurisdiction of the court of requests for the western division of the hundred of Brixton, and was liable to be sued in that court. Joinder in error.

Newton, the plaintiff in error, in person.—The Court of Requests for the western division of the hundred of Brixton is established by stat. 46 Geo. 3. c. lxxxviii., and by the 14th section of that act a plaintiff suing in any of the courts at Westminster for a debt recoverable in the above court of requests, shall not by reason of a verdict for him be entitled to any costs whatsoever. The judgment as to costs is therefore erroneous, and will be reversed on error—Todd v. Todd (1), Baddley v. Oliver (2), where the Court interfered after execution; and Cassidy v. Stewart (3) is an authority that the Court will only look to the time at which the proceedings are commenced.

[PATTESON, J.—My only difficulty is the assigning as a fact something which affects the judgment alone.]

[COLERIDGE, J.—If you had entered a suggestion to deprive the plaintiff of costs, and judgment had been given for costs in spite of the suggestion, you then might have raised the question on the record.]

Such a suggestion can, after verdict, only be entered by leave of the Court, and a Judge on circuit has no power to grant leave—Baddley v. Oliver. To make the judgment for costs erroneous, it is enough that the privilege of the plaintiff in error existed at the time of the commencement of the suit—Hamley v. Hutton (4). This is similar to the case of an infant; and in the case of a member of parliament the privilege may have accrued pending the proceedings.

Hoggins, contra.—The assignment is, that the record and proceedings are erroneous, because the defendant resided within the jurisdiction of the court of requests; but how does that fact appear on the record at all? A new fact cannot be assigned for error; and the only question appearing on the record is, whether there is a cause of action on the record.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The answer you give might be given in every case in which infancy is assigned as error.]

But it is assigned in respect of some matter appearing on the record.

[PATTESON, J.—There are many cases in which error may be assigned, in respect of something not appearing on the record. For example, in the case of outlawry, it is assigned as a fact, that the party was beyond seas. The statute, here, makes no particular provision for depriving the plaintiff of costs.]

[COLERIDGE, J.—If there is anything in your objection, it might be made the ground of setting aside the writ of error.]

[WIGHTMAN, J.—There is also this further difficulty: you might have traversed the fact of the defendant residing within the particular district, but you have joined in error. In the common case of a writ of error to reverse an outlawry, if the defendant in error chooses to say, in nullo est erratum, he confesses the facts. Those facts being before the Court, the question is, whether the judgment for costs is right or wrong.]

The defendant cannot do that by writ of error which he ought to have done by suggestion.

Pleading—2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71. ss. 5, 7.
—Prescription—Life Estate.

Where a defendant pleads an enjoyment of an easement as of right for thirty years, under 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71. and the plaintiff relies on the existence of a life estate, or any of the other portions of time which, by section 7, are to be excluded from the computation of the thirty years, not being inconsistent with the actual fact of enjoyment, he is bound, under the 5th section of the above statute, to plead such life estate, &c. specially.

Trespass for breaking and entering a close of the plaintiff, called Lavenham Hill Green, and laying large quantities of dung, soil, and rubbish upon it, &c.

Fifth plea,—that the defendant, long before and at the said time when, &c. was and still is seised in his demesne as of fee of and in a certain farm and divers, to wit, 500 acres of land, contiguous and near to the said close in which, &c., and that the defendant and those whose estate he has, for thirty years next before the commencement of the suit have continually had and enjoyed as of right and without interruption, and have been used and accustomed to have and enjoy as of right and without interruption, and the defendant still of right ought to have for himself and themselves, his and their tenants and farmers, occupiers of the said farm and lands, with the appurtenances, for the necessary and efficient cultivation and manuring the same, as to the said messuages, &c. belonging and appertaining, the right and privilege in every year, and at all times of the year, of entering into and upon the said close in which, &c. to cart and carry all the muck, dung, &c. made, arising, and accruing in and upon the said messuages, &c. into and upon some certain small and reasonable portion of the said close in which, &c., to wit, &c. necessary and fit for the purpose of intermixing thereon such muck, dung, &c. and of making manure thereof, and of continuing such muck, dung, &c. thereon until the same was mixed and rolled together and formed into manure, and had become in a fit and proper state to be carried, and of carrying the same from and off the said close in which, &c. to be put, placed, and spread upon and over the said farm, &c. of the defendant. The plea then justified the alleged trespasses in exercise of this right. Verification.

The replication to this plea traversed in its terms the right alleged in the plea; and issue was joined thereon.

The cause was tried, at the Spring Assizes for Suffolk, 1847, when the plaintiff had a verdict on all the issues, with nominal damages, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict on the last issue. It appeared on the evidence that the plaintiff was lord of the manor of Lavenham, in Suffolk, and that the close in question was part of the waste of the manor, adjoining a farm of the defendant. The defendant proved the enjoyment, as alleged in the plea, for the space of thirty years next before the commencement of the action. But it appeared that by a settlement of the 19th of February 1813, the manor was limited to Emily Pye for life, with remainder to James Pye for life, with remainders over. In 1839 Emily Pye died, leaving James Pye surviving, who died on the 25th of February 1845. The period of enjoyment proved included the period between 1813 and 1845; but if this interval was excluded, the period proved did not amount to thirty years. The plaintiff contended that on the last issue he was entitled to rely on the duration of the life estates as defeating the right claimed. The defendant objected that such life estates ought to have been specially replied.

A rule nisi, to enter the verdict for the defendant on the last issue, having been obtained,—

Byles, Serj. and O'Malley shewed cause (Jan. 21).—This case depends on the proper construction to be given to 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71. The defendant relies on section 5, the plaintiff on section 7. of that act. By the 7th section it is expressly provided, that the time during which any person otherwise capable of resisting any claim, shall be tenant for life, is to be excluded in computing the prescribed periods; but it is said that section 5. requires such an answer to be specially pleaded, and the words of that clause relied on are "if the other party shall intend to rely on any proviso, exception, incapacity, disability, contract, agreement, or other matter hereinbefore mentioned, or on any cause or matter of fact, or of law, not inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment, the same shall be specially alleged and set forth in answer to the allegation of the party claiming, and shall not be received in evidence on any general traverse or denial of such allegation." Now the excepted periods mentioned in section 7. cannot be said to be hereinbefore mentioned without doing violence to the language of the act.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Has the parliamentary roll been examined, to see if this word is correct?]

It has not: but assuming it to be so, the effect of giving the construction contended for by the defendant will be that a life estate is not excluded in computing the thirty years, contrary to the express proviso of section 7. The words of section 5. may receive a reasonable construction. Suppose before more than thirty years ago there had been a licence, that would not be inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment, and must be pleaded—Tickle v. Brown (1), Beasley v. Clarke (2); so an interruption within section 4. must be replied—Clayton v. Corby (3), which is quite consistent with the present argument of the plaintiff; for it only decides that the thirty years to give a right may be made up partly of the time previous to, and partly of the time since, the existence of a life estate. No doubt the Court there threw out some expressions which will be relied on as an authority that the life estate must be specially replied, but these dicta are merely extra-judicial.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—How is a defendant who has a mere easement to know what the course of the plaintiff's title has been, so as to be able to meet it by evidence?]

[WIGHTMAN, J.—What state of things applies to the words "incapacity or disability"? Need idiotcy be replied?]

No; for it is not "hereinbefore mentioned."

[COLERIDGE, J.—Those words may be confined to "other matter": it would not be necessary to use words of reference with respect to matters specifically mentioned in the same section.]

Such a replication as is contended for by the defendant would not be good, as it would not confess such an enjoyment for thirty years as is alleged in the plea, i. e. thirty years irrespective of any life estate, and the defendant by his rejoinder would depart from his plea.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—The plaintiff would admit an enjoyment, in fact, for thirty years, but reply that there was a life estate in existence during part of those thirty years: then the defendant by his rejoinder alleges thirty years' enjoyment, such as will support the right alleged in his plea. Until replication, the plea may mean either thirty years absolutely, or thirty years exclusive of the life estate, and the replication fixes which of these meanings is to be adopted. There would be no departure.]

Onley v. Gardiner (4) is decisive to shew that the years during which the life estate subsisted are to be considered as struck out in reckoning the thirty years next before the commencement of the suit.

[PATTERSON, J.—According to your argument, a replication such as suggested would have been bad as amounting to an argumentative denial that the user was of right. It does not appear that this point was taken in Wright v. Williams (5).]

There is no more necessity for a special replication in cases within the 7th section than in cases under the 4th section. It would not be necessary to reply specially that the lands were in possession of a tenant during any part of the time — Kinloch v. Neville (6), Bright v. Walker (7).

[WIGHTMAN, J.—In what cases do you say that a special replication is necessary?]

In the case of a special agreement or interruption. Several instances are given in Tickle v. Brown.

Biggs Andrews and Worlledge, in support of the rule.—The argument for the defendant must go to the extent of shewing that it is impossible to reply a life estate, idiocy, coverture, or any other matter which would defeat the right claimed under the statute, and yet the words of the statute distinctly require it. The thirty years in the plea may mean either the thirty years immediately before the commencement of the suit, or if there is a life estate it may mean thirty years exclusive of the life estate. The 7th section provides, that the time during which any person, otherwise capable of resisting any claim to any of the matters before mentioned shall have been or shall be an infant, &c., or tenant for life, shall be excluded in the computation of the periods hereinbefore mentioned. But such a tenancy for life is an incapacity within the meaning of the 5th section; and, at all events, it is a matter of fact not inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment. The defendant cannot know of the existence of the life estate, and only relies on the actual fact of enjoyment.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Your argument would equally apply to a lease for years. Suppose a party pleads twenty years' enjoyment as of right, and the evidence is that for fifteen years the land was in lease, and the landlord knew nothing of the enjoyment, or had directed the tenant to prevent the user: it may be important to consider this, as it was held, in Tickle v. Brown, to be only necessary to reply specially matters covering the whole time of enjoyment.]

claim shall be tenant for life, &c. is to be excluded from the computation of the period; but in the other section, it says, that the facts shall be pleaded. The clauses must be read together. The word "hereinbefore" must be read "herein"—Bengough v. Edridge (8). The whole point was, in fact, involved in Clayton v. Corby. The thirty years may mean either of two periods. In Wright v. Williams the plea was held bad on a different ground, and the replication was also held bad.

[PATTESON, J.—The decision in Clayton v. Corby may, at all events, amount to this, that prima facie the words "thirty years" must be taken in their plain and ordinary meaning. If the plaintiff has the option of treating them in their ordinary sense, or as thirty years, exclusive of the time mentioned in the act, he may traverse: but you contend he cannot do that.]

If he could, every sort of evidence would be given at the trial, for which the opposite party were unprepared.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—A replication such as you suggest should, as it seems to me, go on to say that there was no thirty years' enjoyment exclusive of the tenancy for life, by special traverse or otherwise, so as to exclude any thirty years—unexceptionable years. According to your argument, the particular thirty years is immaterial. I put that to shew that it may come to a traverse after all.]

The consent given in Tickle v. Brown was equally within the terms of the act.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—A licence is not only not inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment, but accounts for it.]

[PATTESON, J.—The question comes to this, whether the life estate is an answer to the plea, or is only an element in the computation of time necessary for the proof of the plea.]

But if under the 7th section it is set up at all, the 5th section renders it necessary that it should be replied specially. Prima facie, the plea must be taken to mean thirty years immediately before the action. If a life estate were replied, the rejoinder would either traverse the life estate or shew another thirty years, and the question would be raised by the surrejoinder. Here one party relies on one section of an act, and the other on another section: the party who relies on the subsequent section must plead it. It is clear that the 7th section virtually says, that under certain circumstances "thirty years" shall have a different meaning from their ordinary meaning. It would be necessary to reply specially a tenancy for years—Thibault v. Gibson (9).

COLERIDGE, J.—This was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. The defendant pleaded the enjoyment of a right on the land for thirty years, under the 1st section of 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71. The plaintiff, by his replication, traversed the enjoyment. On the trial the defendant proved the enjoyment for thirty years next before the action; in answer to which the plaintiff proved that during part of those thirty years the land had been held by a tenant for life. The question in the cause is, whether the plaintiff was at liberty to do so, or whether he ought to have replied that fact specially. By section 7. it is plain that the time during which the tenancy for life subsisted is to be left out in computing the thirty years; and the defendant, if the point be properly raised by the pleadings, must shew an enjoyment for thirty years exclusive of that time, either subsequent to that time, or partly prior and partly subsequent. This was established in Clayton v. Corby. Whether the point was properly raised depends on the 5th section, which enacts—[His Lordship read the section].—Now, the tenancy for life is clearly a matter of fact, not inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment; and, therefore, if it be an answer to the defendant's plea, it is plain that, by the express words of the 5th section, it ought to be replied, and cannot be received in evidence on the traverse taken. Whether it be an answer to the plea depends upon the sense in which that plea is to be read; if the plea asserts thirty years' enjoyment computed, as the 7th section directs, that is, exclusive of tenancies for life, &c., then the statement of a tenancy for life would obviously be no answer to the plea, for the plea has already excluded the time of such tenancy. The plaintiff, in such case, could not rely on the tenancy for life, and therefore need not and could not reply it. If, on the other hand, the plea is to be read as prima facie asserting an enjoyment for the actual thirty years next before the action, counted in the ordinary manner, then the tenancy for life during a part of that time would be prima facie an answer to the plea, and would be relied on by the plaintiff, and ought to be replied. The defendant would then be driven to rejoin, either denying the tenancy for life, or in some form asserting an enjoyment for thirty years, exclusive of the time of that tenancy. It is said that such a rejoinder as last mentioned would be a departure from the plea, because to make it consistent with the plea, the sense first supposed must be given to the plea, and then the replication would be unnecessary, whereas the sense secondly supposed is the only one which calls for a replication. The Court, in Clayton v. Corby, said, that "The thirty years, alleged in the plea, will be the thirty years actually or constructively next before the commencement of the suit, according as the plaintiff shapes his replication." We think this the true construction of the plea. The defendant cannot be supposed to know the plaintiff's title, or to be cognizant of any tenancy for life; he may well intend to set up thirty years' enjoyment actually next before the action, but when he is informed by the plaintiff's replication that a tenancy for life existed, he may well prepare to establish an enjoyment for thirty years constructively. The words of the plea are large enough for either case, and the second sense put on them by the rejoinder is in the nature of a new assignment. It is true that a new assignment proceeds on the supposition that the other party has mistaken the meaning of the previous pleading, and doubtless any new assignment which enlarges and goes beyond the previous pleading of the same party is bad. The rejoinder, therefore, in such a case as the present cannot be taken as being strictly a new assignment: it would be a departure, and contrary to the rules of pleading. But it would be necessary, and therefore good by force of the statute, if we are right in saying that the statute requires that a tenancy for life should be specially replied. No other view of the pleadings would put the parties on equal terms, nor meet the plain intention of the legislature, collected from the words of the 5th and 7th sections of the act. Some argument was raised in respect of the word "hereinbefore" used in the 5th section; but it is not necessary to consider this, for that word is not applicable to the subsequent words, "matter of fact not inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment," on which our judgment turns. We are, therefore, of opinion that the evidence was improperly received, and that the rule ought to be absolute to enter a verdict for the defendant on the fifth plea; but, under the circumstances, we think that the plaintiff ought to be at liberty to amend on payment of costs, and a new trial granted.

Rule absolute accordingly.

Bill of Exchange—Notice of Dishonour—Admission of Liability.

A. drew a bill for 10l. on B, who owed him 20l. The bill was payable on Saturday, the 10th of August. On the following Wednesday A. was told by the bankers of C, the holder, that they understood that he, A, had received the money to take up the bill. He said he should keep the money, as B. still owed him 10l., and that he wished the bankers would sue B. on the bill:—Held, evidence to go to the jury that A. had received due notice of dishonour.

Assumpsit by the indorsee against the drawer of a bill of exchange for 10l., drawn on and accepted by one Hackwood.

Plea (amongst others), that the defendant had no notice of the dishonour of the bill.

It appeared at the trial, before Erle, J., at the Sittings in London, after Michaelmas term, that the bill was drawn by the defendant on one Hackwood, who owed him 20l. The plaintiff discounted the bill. The bill became due on Sunday, the 11th of August. The bill was not paid on the Saturday, by reason (as was alleged) that the acceptor thought that it was not payable till the Monday. Hackwood, the acceptor, afterwards sent the defendant 10l. to take up the bill; and it was proved by the clerk of the plaintiff's bankers, that the defendant called at the bank on Wednesday, the 13th, when the clerk told him that they had received advice that he (the defendant) had received the money from Hackwood to take up the bill. The defendant said that Hackwood still owed him 10l., and that he should therefore keep the 10l. he had received, and leave the plaintiff to sue Hackwood on the bill.

The learned Judge thought that there was no evidence of notice of dishonour of the bill, and directed a nonsuit, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for 10l. and interest.

In this term—

Crowder obtained a rule nisi accordingly. —He cited Wilkins v. Jadis (1), Campbell v. Webster (2), Curlewis v. Corfield (3), Brownell v. Bonney (4).

Humfrey and Corrie shewed cause.—The drawer made no admission of liability on the bill so as to bring the case within those cited in moving for the rule. The defendant is silent on the subject of notice or liability.

[COLERIDGE, J.—We can hardly help seeing that in the conversation on Wednesday he assumes his liability, and has recourse to a shift.]

But notice on Wednesday would be too late. It is quite consistent with all that took place that no notice was in fact given; and it is not to be presumed, against all the probabilities of the case, both that notice was given, and given in the proper time, and by the proper party—Tindal v. Brown (5), Chapman v. Keane (6), Roberts v. Bradshaw (7). In Tindal v. Brown, Ashurst, J. observed, that "notice means something more than knowledge, because it is competent to the holder to give credit to the maker."

LORD DENMAN, C. J.—In some cases great strictness has been required in proof of notice of dishonour; but there are cases in which the rule has been relaxed, and I think there is good sense in holding that, under certain circumstances, the rule should be relaxed. No doubt the notice should be given in proper time; but here the acceptor, who ought to have provided for the bill, sends the money to the drawer after the time when the bill was payable. The drawer admits that he had received the money, and merely says he means to keep it. The question is, whether there was evidence for the jury. I think the rule must be made absolute.

PATTESON, J.—We must take it on these pleadings that the bill was duly presented, and therefore that it was presented on Saturday. There may, no doubt, have been some misapprehension on this point; but however that may be, it is clear, from the evidence of the banker's clerk, that the defendant, the drawer, had the money sent him on Monday. The clerk, in fact, tells the defendant that he, the clerk, has received a letter informing him that he, the defendant, had on Monday received the money to take up the bill. The defendant does not deny this; on the contrary, he says it is true, but that he wants to keep the money in payment of a further debt owing him by the acceptor. It comes to this, that after the bill was due, and after it was dishonoured, the defendant gets a notice on the Monday from the acceptor. If so, and as we are not inquiring whether there was an admission of the defendant's liability, but of the fact of notice, I think that that was evidence amply sufficient to go to the jury.

COLERIDGE, J.—The only question is, whether the defendant received notice of dishonour in due time. I think that a distinct admission of his liability, after the bill was due, will be sufficient to go to the jury as evidence that he had received notice. On Wednesday the drawer is told by the clerk that the clerk has heard that he has received money to take up the bill. Now, he had either received the money or he had not. If he had, then surely he must be taken to have received notice. If not, then there is the evidence that he did not stand upon his non-liability; but he says he means to keep the money, which is the answer of a man who meant to admit his liability.

WIGHTMAN, J. concurred.

Lease—Tenant for Life—Power of Leasing—Operation of invalid Lease as a surrender of existing Lease.

B, tenant for life, with a power of leasing, made in April 1788 a lease to A. for ninety-nine years, determinable on three lives, of a portion of premises already demised to A. by two several leases of 1760 and 1784. The lease of April 1788 purported to be granted "for and in consideration of the surrendering up to B." of the leases of 1760 and 1784; "and in order to effectuate an agreement entered into between A. and one C. for the sale to C. of the residue of the premises, which residue the lease recited was intended to be demised by B. to C., by indenture of lease bearing even date therewith." The lease to A. of April 1788, was not a good execution of the power. The lease of 1784 was a good execution of the power. The lease of 1760 had determined. The residue of the premises, mentioned in the lease to A. of April 1788, was demised to C, by indenture of that date, by a valid subsisting lease:—Held, that the acceptance by A. of the lease of April 1788 did not, as to the premises thereby demised to A, operate as an absolute surrender in law of the lease of 1784, and that, on ejectment being brought by the remainder-man after the death of the tenant for life, the lease of 1784 must be considered as a subsisting lease.

Ejectment to recover the possession of certain messuages, &c., situate in the parish of Stogursey, in the county of Somerset, being the premises expressed to be demised in the indenture of lease marked A, herein-after mentioned. The declaration contained demises from the said Robert Biddulph, Lawrence Walker, Joseph Steward, and William Cookesly Thompson, dated the 10th of April 1845, and from the said Alexander W. Grant, dated the 26th of May 1845.

The defendant entered into the usual consent rule to defend as landlady.

By Judge's order of the 4th of November 1846, the facts were stated for the opinion of the Court in the following

CASE.

The Right Hon. Charles Earl of Egremont, before and at the date of his will, bearing date the 31st of July 1761, and from thence to the time of his death, was seised in his demesne as of fee of the premises mentioned in the declaration, and being so seised, by his will, bearing date as aforesaid, and duly executed and attested as by law is required, gave and devised all his manors, messuages, lands, advowsons, rents, and hereditaments (including the premises sought to be recovered in this ejectment), in the several counties of Somerset, Dorset, and Cornwall, with their respective rights, members, and appurtenances, part of the estate of his father Sir William Wyndham, Bart., deceased, unto his eldest son George Lord Cockermouth and his assigns for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to his sons successively in tail male, with remainder to testator's second son, Percy Charles Wyndham and his assigns for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to his sons successively in tail male, with remainder to the testator's third son Charles William Wyndham and his assigns for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to his sons successively in tail male, with remainder to the fourth, fifth, and all and every other the son and sons of the said testator's body lawfully begotten or to be begotten, whether born in his lifetime or after his decease, severally, successively, and in remainder one after another, as they should be in priority of birth, and of the respective heirs male of the body of such son and sons lawfully issuing.

The said will contained the following power:—"And I do hereby further will and declare that it shall and may be lawful to and for the several and respective persons to whom any estate for life is hereinbefore devised, when and as they shall be in the actual possession of the said manors, messuages, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises hereinbefore devised to them respectively for their said respective lives as aforesaid, or any part thereof, by virtue of the limitations hereinbefore contained, by indenture or indentures, under their respective hands and seals, to demise, lease, and grant all or any of the said manors, &c., parts and shares of manors, &c., hereinbefore mentioned to be hereby devised or limited to any person or persons for any term or number of years not exceeding twenty-one years, to take effect in possession and not in reversion, or by way of future interest, so as in every such lease or demise there be reserved to continue payable, half-yearly or oftener, during the term thereby to be granted, and to be incident and go along with the reversion or remainder of the same premises expectant thereon, the best and most improved yearly rent that can, at the time of making such lease, reasonably be got for the same, without taking for the making of such lease any fine, premium, or foregift; and also to demise and lease, grant in possession or reversion for one life, or for two or three lives, or for any term or number of years determinable upon one life or two or three lives, any part of the said premises usually so leased, so that all the leases to be made by virtue hereof, which shall be in force at the same time, shall be determinable on the dropping of one life, or the dropping of two or three lives at the most, so that there be reserved in every such lease, during the continuance thereof, the ancient and accustomed rents and heriots for the premises therein contained or more, and so that in every of the leases so to be made and granted by virtue of the several powers aforesaid, there be contained the usual and reasonable covenants, and a condition of re-entry for non-payment of the rent or rents thereby respectively to be reserved in case the rent or rents be behind or unpaid by the space of twenty-one days, and for non-performance of the covenants therein to be contained, and so as no clause or clauses be contained in any of the said leases, giving power to any lessee to commit waste, or exempting him from punishment for committing the same, and so as the respective lessees do execute counterparts of all such leases."

The said Charles Earl of Egremont died on the 21st day of August 1763, without having revoked or altered his said will, leaving four sons born in lawful wedlock, namely, George O'Brien, his eldest son, in the said will called George Lord Cockermouth, who succeeded his father as Earl of Egremont, the said Percy Charles Wyndham, his second son, and the said Charles William Wyndham, his third son, and William Frederick Wyndham, his fourth son, who was born on the 6th of April 1763.

The said Charles William Wyndham, his third son, died on the 7th day of July 1828, without ever having had any issue. The said Percy Charles Wyndham, the second son, died on the 5th day of August 1833, without ever having had any issue. The said William Frederick Wyndham, the fourth son, died on the 18th day of February 1828, leaving George Wyndham, afterwards Earl of Egremont, his eldest son and heir-at-law, him surviving. The said George O'Brien Earl of Egremont, died on the 11th day of November 1837, without ever having had any issue.

Upon the death of the said testator, the said George O'Brien Earl of Egremont entered into the possession and receipt of the rents of the said manors, lands, &c., so devised as aforesaid, as tenant for life under the said will. In the year 1837, the said George O'Brien Earl of Egremont and the said George Wyndham, afterwards Earl of Egremont, barred the estate tail of the said George Wyndham in the said manors, lands, &c., devised by the said Charles Earl of Egremont, and the inheritance in fee of the same manors, lands, &c. was thereupon settled upon and became vested in the said George Wyndham, subject to the estate for life of the said George O'Brien Earl of Egremont. The said George Wyndham, who became Earl of Egremont, died on the 2nd day of April 1845, having first made his will, duly executed for passing real estates whereby he devised to the said Robert Biddulph, Lawrence Walker, Joseph Stroad, and William Cookaley Thompson, the inheritance of the said manors, lands, &c., devised by the said will of the said Charles Earl of Egremont, and such devises upon his death became seised thereof. The said George O'Brien Earl of Egremont, whilst such tenant for life, made and executed an indenture of lease to one Abraham Symons, bearing date the 29th day of April 1788, being the lease in question in this cause. A copy of this lease was annexed to the case. A counterpart thereof was duly executed by the lessee. It is admitted between the parties for the purposes of this case, that the above-mentioned lease of the 29th day of April 1788, was not a due execution of the leasing power contained in the will of Charles Earl of Egremont.

Copies of two leases respectively in 1760 and 1784, mentioned in the above lease of the 29th day of April 1788, were annexed to the case. It is admitted for the purposes of this case, that the said lease of 1784 was a due execution of the said leasing power, and that one of the cestui que vies mentioned therein is alive.

The lease of 1760 has determined.

The said lease of 1788 demised part only of the lands and premises contained in and demised by the said prior leases, of 1760 and 1784, as will be seen by reference to the leases. The residue of the lands and premises contained in such prior leases were demised by the said George O'Brien Earl of Egremont to John Ackland, Esq., by a lease bearing date the same 29th day of April 1788, which lease was afterwards surrendered to the said George O'Brien Earl of Egremont, and a new lease granted of the premises therein contained to the said John Ackland, by a lease bearing date the 29th of April 1794, and which last lease is still a subsisting lease.

By the lease of the 29th of April 1788, which was between George O'Brien Earl of Egremont, of the one part, and Abraham Symons, of the parish of Stoke Curry, in the county of Somerset, yeoman, of the other part, it was witnessed, that for and in consideration of the surrendering and yielding up into the hands of the said Earl, at or before the sealing and delivery of these presents, two certain indentures of lease, the one bearing date the 1st of January 1760, and purporting to be a demise and grant from Charles late Earl of Egremont, deceased, to Bartholomew Symons, since deceased, and Abraham Symons (and which now is vested in the said Abraham Symons) for ninety-nine years, and now determinable on the death of Joseph Dowdon, of the hereditaments and premises hereinafter mentioned to be hereby demised, with other lands and premises now parted and disencumbered therefrom, and demised by indenture of lease, bearing even date herewith by the said Earl (party hereto) to John Ackland, of Fairfield, int he said county of Somerset, Esq., for the term of ninety-nine years, determinable on three lives; and the other bearing date the 23rd of March 1784, and purporting to be a demise and grant of the whole of the same premises from the said Earl (party hereto) to the said Abraham Symons, for ninety-nine years, determinable on the deaths of Betty Symons and Sarah Symons, his daughters, and to commence and take effect immediately on the death of the said Joseph Dowdon, and also in consideration of the sum of 5s., and in consideration of the covenants, and in order to effectuate the agreement entered into between the said Abraham Symons and John Ackland, with respect to that part of the premises sold off as aforesaid, and which is intended to be demised by an indenture of lease, bearing even date herewith by the said Earl (party hereto) to the said John Ackland, for the term of ninety-nine years, determinable as therein mentioned, he, the said Earl, demised, &c. to Abraham Symons, all that messuage, &c., habendum to the said Abraham Symons, his executors, administrators, and assigns from henceforth, for, by, during, and unto the full end and term of ninety-nine years from thence next ensuing and fully to be complete and ended, if Joseph Dowdon, son of John Dowdon, of &c., aforesaid, aged &c., Betty Symons, aged &c., and Sarah Symons, aged &c., and daughter of the said Abraham Symons, or any or either of them, should so long happen to live, reddendum certain quit rents and heriots.

The lease of the 1st of January 1760 was a devise from Charles Earl of Egremont to Bartholomew Symons and Abraham Symons; habendum at the expiration or other sooner determination of a certain term of ninety-nine years, granted of all and singular the said premises, by indenture of lease, bearing date the 13th of December 1723, by Sir William Wyndham, bart., since deceased, to Roger Dowdon, for ninety-nine years.

The lease of the 25th of March 1784 was as before recited.

The plaintiff's points were:—That the term created by the lease of 1784 was well surrendered in the year 1788, as to the whole of the premises comprised in such lease; and it being admitted that the lease of 1788 is invalid, that there is, consequently, no valid subsisting lease of the premises sought to be recovered in this action.

The defendant's points were:—That the lease of 1784, as it regards the lands and premises sought to be recovered in this ejectment, was at the date of the demise in the declaration a valid subsisting lease, and that the acceptance of the lease of 1788, being an invalid lease, did not operate as a surrender in law of the said lease of 1784, as it regards the said lands and premises.

This case was argued (May 3, 1847,) by—

Crowder, for the lessors of the plaintiff.—Though a lease which is wholly void and conveys nothing may not amount to a surrender, yet this lease, which is only voidable, amounted to a surrender by operation of law, whatever the intention of the parties may have been—Com. Dig. tit. 'Surrender,' and Shep. Touch. p. 300. In Roe v. the Archbishop of York (1) the lease was considered void, and the judgment proceeded on that assumption, though in point of law the lease might have been good during the life of the archbishop. It is true that in Doe d. Lord Egremont v. Forwood (2), in which it was held that the first lease was to be considered as surrendered under circumstances similar to the present, the second lease had the words "which is hereby surrendered accordingly," which are not to be found in the present case; but the question is, what is the legal operation of taking the second lease? The express stipulation in Doe d. Lord Egremont v. Forwood was that which the law would have implied, or it would amount to nothing. In Lyon v. Reed (3), where the case of Roe v. the Archbishop of York was not referred to, it was held that the acceptance of a new lease was a surrender in law of the old one. It is to be observed that the lessor in the lease of 1788 makes no reference to the power, and the lease cannot be said to pass nothing; and if any interest passed it would not be a lease by estoppel—Bac. Abr. tit. 'Leases,' 'Estoppel,' (O), Co. Litt. 47, b. The cases of Devson v. Stanley (4), and Wilson v. Sewell (5), were decided on that ground.

[PATTERSON, J.—Suppose the former lease had expired before the present lease had been granted, could it be contended that it passed nothing at all?]

It gave an interest for the life of the grantor, and that is a sufficient consideration for the surrender, though it may be void as against a remainder-man. This question was much considered in Doe d. the Bishop of Rochester v. Bridges (6); but in that case there was a clear act of surrender. The circumstance of hardship cannot alter the rule of law; and the question is, was anything taken under the second lease? It may be said that a portion only was surrendered, and that now is demised to Ackland.

[PATTERSON, J.—The taking of a part would not amount to a surrender of the whole—2 Roll. Abr. 498, and Thursby v. Plant (7); but the new lease shews the intention of all parties to demise a portion at all events to some one else—Hamerton v. Stead (8).]

Kinglake, Serj., for the defendant.—The lease of 1788 is wholly invalid, as not being a due execution of the power. The surrender by operation of law can only be that of which the grantor grants a valid lease, viz., of the portion demised to Ackland, if that be by a valid lease. The Statute of Frauds will not be satisfied by a mere recital of some arrangement made between the parties; and by the common law, "If lessee for years accepts a new lease by indenture of part of the same lands, this is a surrender for that part only, and not for the whole"—Bac. Abr. tit. 'Leases and Terms for Years,' letter S, p. 882, and Fish v. Camplin (9) there cited; the reason being "that there is no inconsistency between the two leases for any more than for that part only which is so doubly leased." Here, though there has been a demise of part to Ackland, and a surrender of that, yet as to the part retained by the lessee, he has not got what he bargained for.

[COLERIDGE, J.—Would there not be the same inconsistency if the lessee only took under the new lease, during the life of the lessor?]

The mere granting a lease to a third party does not operate as a surrender, unless it is granted with the full assent of the lessee—Thomas v. Cook (10), Doe d. Lord Egremont v. Forwood. It is contended that the lease must operate in one way, though it purports to operate in another; and that because there is a grant of a part there is by law a surrender of the whole; but the same argument was relied on unsuccessfully in Roe v. the Archbishop of York.

[ERLE, J.—Suppose the lease professed to have been made "under any power which I have;" and it turned out not to have been a due execution of any power which the lessor had, and was therefore invalid, would that be a good surrender of the whole?]

Clearly not. The case of Roe v. the Archbishop of York is a distinct authority to the contrary. The parties to the second lease might take something less than they had before; but such lease will not operate as a surrender, contrary to the express intention of the parties who contracted with reference to another object.

Crowder, in reply.—If Roe v. the Archbishop of York had decided the question, the argument in Doe d. Lord Egremont v. Forwood would have been unnecessary. Did anything pass by the lease of 1788, or not? If it did, the surrender is valid. There is nothing to shew that the lessor had any intention to execute the power. Symons held the property under the lease of 1788 from that time to the present. He did not hold under the lease of 1784, as Ackland had part of the premises demised by that lease. The lease of 1788 was only voidable. Thomas v. Cook does not apply. Besides, the authority of that case is shaken by Lyon v. Reed.

COLERIDGE, J.—In this case it appeared that before 1788 the premises in question, with a parcel mentioned below, were held under two leases for ninety-nine years, determinable at the end of three lives; and that in 1788 the lessee had sold that parcel to one Ackland, and wished to surrender it to the reversioner, so that he might lease it to Ackland, which lease was to be made at the same time as the lease in question; it further appeared that by lease of 1788, stated by way of recital to be made in consideration of the lessee's surrendering the two former leases, and in order to effectuate his agreement with Ackland, the lessor demised the premises in question to the lessee for ninety-nine years, determinable on the same three lives, and with an apportionment of the rents and heriots, the parcel being severed. This lease, being granted by tenant for life, with power to lease, and not being a due execution of the power, was void after his death against the remainder-man, who brought ejectment; and as the former leases are not otherwise determined, he has contended that the acceptance of the lease of 1788 was a surrender in law of the former leases then subsisting.

It was not disputed that the acceptance of a valid lease is a surrender in law of a former lease inconsistent therewith, and that the acceptance of a void lease is not, and that the acceptance of a lease made voidable upon condition, may also be a surrender in law, if rendered void according to the contract. But the question has been, whether acceptance of a lease which is voidable, and afterwards made void, contrary to the intention of the parties thereto, and which does not pass an interest according to the contract, is still an absolute surrender in law, provided it has operated to pass any part of the term contracted for, as during the life of a lessor tenant for life, which is the present case; and we are of opinion that this question must be answered in the negative.

The doctrine of surrender implied by law was introduced for the purpose of giving effect to the intention of the parties. The surrender is presumed for the purpose of making a grant operative, which otherwise would be without effect—Thompson v. Trafford (11). The surrender is in consideration of the grant; and if the grant fails contrary to the intention of the parties, it seems unreasonable that an absolute surrender should be presumed to have been intended. The facts of the present case are remarkable to negative an intention to surrender, unless the new grant should be valid. The object of the parties was to sell a parcel to Ackland, and to apportion the rent on the residue; and if the lessee had assented to a demise of the parcel by the lessor to Ackland, and he had accepted it, that would have been a surrender in law of the parcel by such lessee—Walker v. Richardson (12), and see Doe d. Huddleston v. Johnston (13). Also a surrender of parcel is no surrender of the residue—2 Roll. Abr. 497, 'Sur.' M, pl. 1; and an apportionment could be made without a surrender. The lease, therefore, of 1788 was unnecessary. It did not substantially alter the lessee's interest in the premises, and was intended to confirm his interest under the subsisting leases. Now it is not possible to conceive a more perverted application of the doctrine of giving effect to the intention of the parties, than to hold that an instrument intended solely to confirm leases should be effective solely to destroy them. It has been objected that the surrender must have been absolute, if the second lease has been valid for any time, because the valid leases for the same term cannot co-exist; but the objection does not arise, if the surrender of the first lease be held to be conditional; and this, we think, is the true construction.

That an express surrender may be on condition, either precedent or subsequent, is clear upon the authorities, as if it be with reservation of rent, and conditioned to be void if the rent be not paid—Shep. Touch. p. 307. "A condition annexed to a surrender may reave the particular estate, because the surrender is conditional"—Co. Litt. 218. b. This being so, as to express surrenders, we can discover no reason why an implied surrender may not also be taken to be conditional to be void on a given event. As the surrender is by implication only, it is equally open to imply a conditional or an absolute surrender; and where the implication of a conditional surrender prevents injustice and gives effect to the real intention of the parties, the true spirit of the law requires that implication to be made, and forbids an implication leading to the contrary consequences.

The implication of a condition that the surrender should be void in case the new grant should fail, appears to us to be free from objection. Indeed, where the terms of a lease import an express surrender solely in consideration of the new grant, we think that a construction that such surrender was conditional would be warranted, and would give effect to the intention of the parties. This construction would not interfere with the mutual estoppel from a deed between lessor and lessee; the doctrine would not apply till the new term had been defeated by title paramount, and all estoppel was removed.

The same results to the parties would follow if the new lease when made void was held to be void as a surrender ab initio on account of legal fraud upon the surrenderor, the lessor being taken to have asserted that he had power to make the lease, and induced the surrender upon the faith of that assertion. This was one ground of decision in Davison v. Stanley; but a construction that a surrender in law is conditional appears to us the preferable opinion. The presumption in favour of this view from its justice is confirmed by decided cases. In Davison v. Stanley the new lease was valid during the life of the lessor, who was tenant for life of the reversion; and it was held that the new lease was not a surrender in law of a former lease, because it did not pass an interest according to the contract. This important decision, which is in point for the present defendant, is supported as well on the ground that the implied surrender was conditioned to be void, if the new lease should not continue according to the intention of the parties thereto, as on the ground of fraud. In Wilson v. Sewell the present question was discussed without being decided, as the new lease was valid; but the Court declares that "if a surrender is intended for a particular purpose, and that purpose, the only motive of it, fails, the surrender ought to fail too." Where a dean and chapter made a valid lease before the 13th Eliz., and granted a new lease after that statute, which was void thereby, and the question was, whether the acceptance of the second lease was a surrender in law of the former lease, it was held, not. And this opinion was independent of the question, whether the second lease was valid during the time of the dean who granted it or not, the Judges saying that they do not give an opinion on that point—Lloyd v. Gregory (14). Now, as the second lease was valid during the time of the dean who granted it (15), though afterwards void, this case is also in point for the defendant.

Where tenant in fee leased to A. for forty-one years, and afterwards to B. for ninety-nine years, and afterwards to A. by deed for forty-one years, it was held, that the acceptance of the second lease for forty-one years by A, was not a surrender in law of the first lease for forty-one years, because, if it was, the lease for ninety-nine years would make the second lease inoperative—Watt v. Maydewell (16). In 1 Saund. 236, note c, by Serjeant Williams, it is said, if the new lease be not a good one, if it does not pass an interest according to the contract and intention of the parties, the acceptance of it is no implied surrender of the former lease, and the above cases are cited.

In Roe v. the Archbishop of York, the approval of the general reasoning in Wilson v. Sewell and Davison v. Stanley, and also the recognition of the principle, that the intention should govern according to the authorities cited in pp. 104, 105, are in support of our opinion. The judgment itself is wholly beside the present question, because it passed for the defendant on the point that the second lease was void ab initio, and it thus became unnecessary to adjudicate on the precise view now relied on by us, which was there presented to the Court by Holroyd and Gibbs, as a second ground of defence, with much clearness. The authorities relied on in that and other cases, to prove a surrender to be absolute in case an interest, however small, has passed, are reduced in importance on close consideration.

There are numerous dicta by learned

Judges and in text writers, but, with the exception of Whitley v. Gough (17), there does not appear to be any decision on the point; and even in that case the facts are so scantily reported as to leave it uncertain whether the point arose at all. There husband leased for ninety years by deed, and assigned the reversion, so as to vest it in himself and wife, and afterwards leased for eighteen years by parol, and died, and his widow sued the lessee in trespass; and it was held that the acceptance of the second lease was a surrender in law of the first, though by parol, and for a shorter term. If the action was brought before the expiration of the eighteen years, this case would be in point for the present plaintiff; but it is consistent with the statement of facts and of the points decided, that the action may have been after the eighteen years, and after the lessee had had the term he contracted for, and it would then be irrelevant. The Digests, into which this case has been adopted, throw no light on this question of fact. In Fulmerston v. Steward (18), the second lease of sixty years was made void as to all beyond twenty-one years, by the retrospective effect of 30 Hen. 8. c. 13, and still it was held to be a surrender in law of a former lease for sixty years. But both leases were, when made, valid; and there is no analogy between the avoidance of a valid lease without breach of contract by a retrospective statute, and the avoidance of a voidable lease contrary to the contract, from the failure of the title of the lessor. In Mel-lows v. May (19) there was a lease to baron and feme for lives, and afterwards baron and feme and son accepted another lease for lives, and it is said that the second lease was void ab initio, i. e. being to commence at dies datus, i. e. in futuro, and still was valid as a surrender of the first lease. But this report is of no weight, both from the unsoundness of the position itself, that a void lease involves a surrender—see Roe v. the Archbishop of York,—and also because in the report of the same case in Moor, 636, the second lease is stated to have been held valid, in which case, of course, it involved a surrender in law. Fludd v. Gregory, 2 Roll. Abr. 495, 'Sur.' F, pl. 7, is the case reported by Sir W. Jones, as Lloyd v. Gregory; and the report of that Judge, as before mentioned, does not bear out the statement in Rolle, that a voidable lease, if made void, is a surrender. In Shep. Touch. p. 301, it is said, "That the acceptance of a second lease is a surrender, though it be avoidable, as if it be upon condition, which happens, or if it be made by tenant in tail, or the like." In the first case, the lease avoidable, according to the contract of the lessee, would be a surrender; but in the second case, if it was made void, contrary to the contract, it would raise the present question; and Sheppard cites for that position only Whitley v. Gough. In Willis v. Whitewood (20), the question was, whether lease by tenant in fee of socage lands was surrendered in law by accepting a new lease from the guardian in socage, and two Justices against one held, that the first lease was determined, though not surrendered; but enough particulars are not reported to decide whether the lessee knew what the interest of the guardian was, and had that which he contracted for. In Lane's case (21), Ives's case (22), and Thompson v. Trafford, the second estate was valid, and so the question was not raised. In Cary (23), the abstract of an application to Chancery for a specific performance of an agreement for the first lease, is too short to ascertain its application to the present question. These are the earlier cases, which have been heretofore referred to in support of the point now relied on for the plaintiff. In Doe d. the Bishop of Rochester v. Bridges, there was an express surrender by separate deed at a different time, and the lessee is stated to have had that which he contracted for. In Doe d. Lord Egremont v. Forwood there was also an express surrender in the lease in consideration of its grant. These cases, therefore, might be distinguished from the present, on the ground that the new leases were founded on express and not implied surrender. But the general reasoning, above mentioned, would lead to a different decision of the latter case. The nature of the transaction, and the intention of the parties is really the same, whether those expressions of surrender are added in the lease or not; and the principle of Lord Mansfield's judgment extends equally to surrenders so expressed, and to surrenders implied by law, and accordingly this case has been reconsidered in the present term—Doe d. Lord Egremont v. Courtney (24). The hardship resulting from a strict application of what was supposed to be the rule, led us to doubt the correctness of that supposition, and to review the authorities cited for it; and our inquiry has led us to the conclusion, that the position which would produce such a result is not supported by law. The case for the lessors of the plaintiff consequently fails, and our judgment is for the defendant.

In 1755, a tenant for life, under a power of leasing demised lands to the defendant for ninety-nine years, determinable on lives. In 1812, the tenant for life under the same power granted a further lease in reversion of the same lands to the defendant for ninety-nine years on additional lives. The lease purported to be made "in consideration of the surrendering up into the hands of the lessor by the lessee" of the lease of 1755, "which surrender is hereby made and accepted accordingly." The lease of 1812 was not a valid execution of the power:—Held, that as it did not pass an interest according to the contract, it did not operate as a surrender of the lease of 1755, and one of the lives named in that lease being still in esse, ejectment would not lie.

Ejectment for lands in Devonshire, the day of the demise being the 20th of October 1844.

At the trial, before Coleridge, J., at the Spring Assizes for Devon, 1845, the lessor of the plaintiff rested his title on the same pedigree as in the preceding case. It also appeared that on the 29th of September 1755, Charles Earl of Egremont demised to Richard Courtney the premises which were the subject of this action, habendum to the said Richard Courtney, his executors, administrators and assigns, from and immediately after the expiration or other sooner determination of a certain term of ninety-nine years, or some such term of years now determinable on the death of Sarah Peppin, for and during the further term of ninety-nine years, if the said Richard Courtney, aged about twenty-eight years, and Betty, the daughter of Thomas Hill, of Rackenford, in the county of Devon, aged six years, or either of them, should so long happen to live.

By indenture of the 11th of July 1785, Percy Charles Wyndham (the third tenant for life under the limitations of the will set out in the preceding case), in consideration of the fine of 90*l.* and the reservations and covenants, &c., demised the premises to Richard Courtney from and immediately after the expiration or other sooner determination of the term granted by the lease of the 29th of September 1755, for the term of ninety-nine years from the date, if Richard Courtney, son of Richard Courtney the younger, and grandson of Richard Courtney party hereto, should so long happen to live.

By indenture of the 25th of March 1812, between Percy Charles Wyndham, the lessor, of the one part, and Richard Courtney the younger, the lessee, of the other part, it was witnessed, that in consideration of the surrendering up into the hands of the said lessor, by the said lessee, at or before the delivery thereof, of a certain lease of the 29th of September 1755, granted of the premises hereby demised for the term of ninety-nine years now determinable on the death of Betty Hill, daughter of Thomas Hill, which surrender is hereby made and accepted accordingly, and also in consideration of 240*l.*, &c. the lessor demised to the said Richard Courtney the same premises, habendum, from the expiration or other sooner determination of the term of ninety-nine years granted by the lease of the 11th of July 1785 for ninety-nine years, if Bartholomew Courtney aged two years, and Hannah Courtney aged one year (children of the said lessee), or either of them, should so long live.

It also appeared that the estate of the present plaintiff, as tenant for life, vested in him in possession in November 1837, (Percy Charles Wyndham, the grantor of the lease of 1812, having died in August 1833). The steward of the lessor of the plaintiff had received the rents of this property from the defendant in 1838, 1839, and 1840. And that, on the 27th of September 1843, a notice, dated the 25th of September, was given on behalf of the solicitors of the lessor of the plaintiff to the defendant, "to quit and deliver up on the 25th day of March next the peaceable and quiet possession of all messuages, tenements, &c., situate &c., which you now hold of the said Earl of Egremont, provided that your tenancy commenced at Lady-day, or otherwise that you quit and deliver up peaceable and quiet possession of the said premises at the end of the year of your tenancy which shall expire next after the end of one half year from the time of your being served with this notice." This notice was accompanied by a letter intimating that an investigation was proceeding, with respect to the validity of the leases for lives held under Lord Egremont; and in the event of his lordship being advised that the lease under which the defendant held was bad, an ejectment would be brought; but if it was considered good, the notice would be withdrawn. For the defendant, it was contended that if the lease of 1812 was a void lease under the power, it would not operate as a surrender of the lease of 1755; and that as Betty Hill was not proved to be dead, that lease was still subsisting—Doe v. Forwood (1). Secondly, that the notice to quit was insufficient to support the demise laid in the declaration, and was not a positive notice by reason of the accompanying letter. The learned Judge directed a verdict for the lessors of the plaintiff, with liberty to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit on the objections raised at the trial.

Kinglake, Serj., in Easter term, 1845, obtained a rule nisi, accordingly; and in Easter term 1846 (April 19),

Crowder and Montague Smith shewed cause.

Kinglake, Serj. and Merivale were heard in support of the rule.—The arguments and authorities are fully stated in the judgment of the Court, which was now (February 26, 1848,) delivered by—

COLERIDGE, J.—This case was tried, before me, at the Devon assizes; and it being admitted that the lease under which the defendant had supposed himself to be in possession could not be sustained with reference to the power under which alone it could have been valid, a verdict passed for the lessor of the plaintiff. But two points were made at the trial and on motion before us for a nonsuit, which are now to be considered.

There were the counterparts of three leases produced, of the respective dates of 1755, 1785, and 1812; and the plaintiff's case was, that the two latter were invalid, which was admitted, and that the last was granted in consideration of a surrender of the first, and operated as a surrender of it. This was necessary to his case, as one of the lives on which the lease of 1755 was granted was still in being, and that lease still in force, unless so surrendered. But the defendant contended, that the surrender having been made only in consideration of the grant of a new valid lease, did not take effect, because the new lease was invalid.

Secondly, assuming that this point should be decided against him, he contended that he had become tenant from year to year, and that his tenancy had not been determined by any good notice to quit. Upon the first point, the counsel for the plaintiff contended that it had been already decided in their favour by this Court in Doe v. Forwood. It is remarkable that in the judgment in that case not a word is said upon this point, and what is reported to have dropped from the Judges in the course of the argument, seems against the plaintiff; but as the judgment could not have passed for him unless the Court had thought there had been a good surrender of the valid lease, it must be taken that they did so hold under the circumstances of that case. There the former lease was particularly described in the invalid one, which was said to be granted for the consideration of the surrender of such former one, (adding—"which is hereby surrendered accordingly,") and of the sum of 157*l.* 10*s.* paid by the lessee to the lessor. This surrender was relied on by the counsel in that case as being an express surrender, and taking it out of the principle of decision in Roe v. the Archbishop of York (2), and bringing it within that of Farmer v. Rogers (3). That case, however, turned on no distinction between an express and an implied surrender; but on whether the note in writing there relied on was a sufficient surrender to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Nor is there any thing in the judgment in Doe d. the Bishop of Rochester v. Bridges (4) (a case also referred to) which points to the importance of the distinction. There the surrender of the valid lease was by a deed-poll executed a few days before the invalid lease; and the consideration of such surrender was not stated to be the granting of the new lease, and what is of more importance, the new lease, as the judgment remarks, was "in terms precisely conformable to the intent mentioned in the deed of surrender. The surrender obtained exactly the lease for which he bargained, and therefore it cannot be said that the new lease is a fraud or deception upon him; and if the surrender be deemed conditional," (i. e. on the granting of a new lease, as stipulated for) "the condition has been complied with." It was said, on behalf of the defendant in the present case, that the surrender in Doe v. Forwood was taken to be express, and that in the present case it was only implied; that in that case it was found that, on the execution of the second, the first was, in fact, delivered up to the lessor, but that in the present case no such delivery up was proved. These differences in fact were relied on to distinguish the two cases; but we think that they are not made out satisfactorily. In Doe v. Forwood the ground for calling the surrender express was the introduction of the words "which is hereby surrendered accordingly," whereas in the present case the words were "which surrender is hereby made," or equivalent words. On the words "hereby surrendered accordingly" in Doe v. Forwood, Patteeson, J. is reported to have said "that is on the supposition of the new lease being granted," referring to the consideration immediately before expressed. As to the delivery up of the old lease, the fact was not shewn either way on the trial of the present case, nor was any point made of it on either side. But this fact can only be evidence of intention, which was not needed in this case: it will not be in itself a surrender. In Roe v. the Archbishop of York, the fact existed, together with cancellation, and yet the surrender was not held complete.

But then it was said that the whole doctrine, which vacated the surrender of a prior lease whether express or implied, where the consideration was the grant of a new lease, applied only to the case where such new lease was void, and not where it was merely voidable; that here the second lease was not void; that it bound the grantor, and might have been confirmed by each succeeding tenant for life to its expiring by efflux of time. We have had occasion to consider this doctrine in another of these cases (5), and to examine the decisions at some length; we will not, therefore, now repeat that examination, contenting ourselves with saying that the principle to be found laid down by Lord Mansfield in Wilson v. Sewell (6) and Davison v. Stanley (7) seems to us the true one: that where the new lease does not pass an interest according to the contract, the acceptance of it will not operate a surrender of the former lease; that in the case of a surrender implied by law from the acceptance of a new lease, a condition ought also to be understood as implied by law, making void the surrender in case the new lease should be made void; and that in case of an express surrender, so expressed as to shew the intention of the parties to make the surrender only in consideration of the grant, the sound construction of such instrument, in order to effectuate all the intention of the parties, would make that surrender also conditioned to be void in case the grant should be made void; see Doe d. Biddulph v. Poole (8). Tried by this principle we are, on consideration, satisfied that the lease of 1755 was not surrendered, and was a good answer to the action. Our decision upon

Feb. 26.

Power, Execution of—Lease—Usual and Reasonable Covenants—Premises usually leased.

Under a power to make leases for years, determinable on lives, of premises usually so leased, reserving the usual rents and heriots, and so as there should be contained usual and reasonable covenants, a lease was granted, in 1831, of a tenement, called C, "together with so much of the water from the shuts in D.'s ground as R. M. has been accustomed to have, and at the same time for the purpose of working a mill, and also the use of the water descending from the head weir, reserving to the occupiers of the meadows watered by the said course running from the head weir through Little Moor Meadow, and thence by a trough into T. Meadow, the right to enter and cleanse the said watercourse, and to take the water for watering the meadows, having the right thereto as heretofore accustomed." This lease contained a covenant to do suit and service at the courts of the manor of W, but no covenant to pay fines, &c.

In what was taken as the pattern lease, executed in 1749, there was a demise of C, with all waters, watercourses, &c., excepting to the lessor a watercourse flowing from the head weir, through Little Moor Meadow, and from thence by a trough into another meadow, for watering the same and other lands of the lessor; and there was a covenant to pay fines, &c., as well as to do suit and service.

It appeared that from a date prior to 1749, there had been no courts baron or customary courts held for the manor, and no evidence was given of the existence of any freehold or copyhold tenants:—Held, that the covenant to pay fines, &c. was not a usual or reasonable covenant, the omission of which avoided the lease.

Held, also, that the lease of 1831 did not demise more than had been formerly leased, the effect of the pattern lease being to pass the channel of the watercourse, reserving only the water itself.

Held, also, that it was properly left to the jury to say what quantity of water R. M. was accustomed to have to turn the mill, in order to see whether it was in excess of what was formerly granted.

Ejectment for lands in Somersetshire.

The cause was tried, before Platt, B., at the Summer Assizes, 1845, for the county of Somerset, when it appeared that the action was brought to recover possession of premises, parcel of the manor of Williton Regis, leased in 1831 to the defendants, by George O'Brien Earl of Egremont, under a power reserved by the will of Charles Earl of Egremont in 1761, to the person in possession, "to demise, lease, and grant, in possession or reversion, for one life, or for two or three lives, or for any term or number of years determinable upon one life or two or three lives, any part of the said premises usually so leased, so that all the leases to be made by virtue hereof, which shall be in force at the same time, shall be determinable on the dropping of one life or the dropping of two or three lives at the most, and so that there be reserved in every such lease, during the continuance thereof, the ancient and accustomed rents and heriots for the premises therein contained or more, and so that in every of the leases so to be made and granted by virtue of the several powers aforesaid, there be contained usual and reasonable covenants, and a condition of re-entry for non-payment of rent," &c.

A lease for ninety-nine years, determinable on two lives, of the premises in question, made by Charles Egremont, then Sir Charles Wyndham, dated the 22nd of April 1749, and which was taken as the pattern lease, contained the following description:—"All that messuage, &c., called Cutwell, &c., together with all houses, outhouses, edifices, buildings, ways, passages, waters, watercourses, &c., to the said messuages, &c. belonging and appertaining, &c., excepting out of the present demise and grant, unto the said Sir C. Wyndham, his heirs and assigns, a watercourse, flowing or descending from a head weir, formerly erected on the croft parcel of the premises in and through a meadow, parcel of the said demised premises, called Little Moor Mead, and from thence conveyed by a trough into a meadow, formerly in possession of B. W. &c., for watering and improving the same and other lands of the said Sir C. Wyndham." The rent reserved was 1*l.* 4*s.* and the best beast, or 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* as a heriot. In the lease was contained a covenant by the lessee to "do suit and service unto all and every the court and courts of the said Sir C. Wyndham, his heirs and assigns, to be holden and kept for or within the manor of Williton Regis aforesaid, in such manner as other the tenants of the same manor in respect of their several estates are used and accustomed to do, and also to pay all fines, amerciaments, penalties, and sums of money, which shall be then set, laid, or imposed upon or against the said lessee for or by reason of any neglect, offence, or just cause."

The lease to the defendants, which was granted on the 24th of December 1831, by George O'Brien Earl of Egremont, and was for ninety-nine years determinable on three lives therein named, demised a tenement, called Raglands, and the tenement called Cutwell, "together with so much of the water from the shuts in Dawes's ground as the late Mr. Richard Morle has been accustomed to have; and at the same time for the purpose of working the said leather mill; and also the use of the water descending from the head weir, formerly erected on the croft parcel of the said tenement, called Cutwell, except and reserving to the occupiers of the meadows watered by the said course running from the head weir aforesaid, through the Little Moor Meadow, parcel of the said tenement called Cutwell, and thence by an aqueduct or trough into Townsend Meadow, now in the occupation of &c., the right to enter and cleanse the said watercourse, and to take the water for watering the meadows, having the right thereto as heretofore accustomed." This lease reserved a rent of 1*l.* 6*s.*, and also heriots for Ragland, 2*l.*, and for Cutwell the best beast; and contained a covenant by the defendants, to "perform suit and service at all the courts to be held by the said lessor, his heirs and assigns, in and for the manor of Williton Regis."

It appeared by the evidence that, in 1817, a leather mill was erected, and when it was at work the water, which ought to have been conveyed from the head weir through Little Moor Meadow, was diverted into the mill leet, and thence into the natural stream, thereby depriving Little Moor Meadow and the meadows beyond of irrigation. It further appeared, that anciently the water ran through the shuts in Dawes's ground towards Cutwell for three days only during the week, but that after the mill was built Morle used to take half of the water during the three days, and that the shuts were altered to meet this state of things. With regard to the covenant to pay fines, no evidence was given to shew that any courts baron or customary courts had been held for the manor of Williton Regis since 1739, and it appeared that there had been no freehold or copyhold tenants of the manor within the time of living memory.

The objections by the lessor of the plaintiff to the lease of 1831 were (amongst others), that the ancient and accustomed rents and heriots are not reserved by it; that it does not contain the usual and reasonable covenant to pay fines and amerciaments imposed at the court of the manor, and that the lease includes premises not usually so leased, viz. the water from the shuts in Dawes's ground, and the use of the water descending from the head weir erected on the croft.

The learned Judge left only this one question to the jury—whether the lease of 1831 assumed to grant more than was enjoyed by former tenants of the same premises, viz. Cutwell. The counsel for the plaintiff contended that this was a question of law, and ought not to be left to the jury. The jury found that more was not granted than had been before enjoyed, and the verdict was entered generally for the defendants, leave being reserved to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff on the objections raised at the trial.

A rule nisi to enter a verdict or for a new trial having been accordingly obtained, cause was shewn (Jan. 12, 1847) by—

Cockburn, Butt, and Kinglake, Serj.—First, as to the demises of both Cutwell and Raglands at one rent, Doe d. the Earl of Shrewsbury v. Wilson (1) decides that such a lease is good—Doe d. Earl of Egremont v. Stephens (2), in which this very point is decided. [This was admitted on the other side.] Secondly, the omission of a covenant to pay fines and amerciaments is immaterial, as no courts have been held since the lease of 1749; and all the freehold tenements in the manor having long been extinguished, there can be no manor court—Baldwin v. Tudge (3), Chetwode v. Crew (4), Com. Dig. tit. 'Copyhold,' (R), 1, 2, Glover v. Lane (5), Bradshaw v. Lawson (6). Besides which, a covenant is mere surplusage, as it is incident to the jurisdiction of the lord of the manor. The covenants should be both usual and reasonable. Thirdly, as to the water, which is said not to be usually leased, the exception in the pattern lease is not inserted, but the present lease is, in substance, the same. The reservation in the pattern lease is to the lessor for the improvement of the meadows, whereas in the present lease it is to the occupiers of the meadows for the same purpose. The intention in both leases was not to create a new right in the lessor or the occupiers, but simply to recognize a pre-existing right. The mill mentioned in the lease of 1831 having been built by Lord Egremont in 1817, the lessee might have used the water in any way not inconsistent with the right of others—Mason v. Hill (7). The new lease, in fact, instead of excepting all the water, only excepts a certain portion; but it, by exception, gives the occupiers of the lands above the right as theretofore accustomed. No new right is therefore created. The right to the water would not be affected by unity of possession—Sury v. Pigot (8). It is also said, that the exception in the lease of 1831 is bad, as not being to the lessor, his heirs and assigns; but no form of words is necessary. This indeed is not the creation of a right, but only the declaration of the existence of the former one.

Crowder, M. Smith, and Phinn, in support of the rule.—It is admitted that the first point is decided by Doe d. Lord Egremont v. Stephens. Secondly, as to the usual covenants, a covenant to do suit at the courts and to pay fines is a reasonable covenant, and is found in the pattern lease.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—A covenant which the lessee has no means of performing cannot be said to be a reasonable covenant.]

The same may be said of the covenant to do service at the mill, which may be pulled down. Thirdly, as to the watercourse, before the lease of 1831, the land was demised to Morle, with liberty to make the cut or leet, and to erect the mill; and the miller, accordingly, uses the water. It is a fallacy to suppose that by the lease he would acquire any right as against the lessor of the plaintiff; the right would expire with the life of the then tenant for life. The cut or leet enables the miller to carry off all the water; and the reversionary interest of the lessee is thereby injured. The exception in the lease of 1831 amounts to nothing. The occupiers cannot have the water as they are strangers to the grant; and the grantor cannot have that, by way of exception, which he has granted out already; the grant being construed most strongly against him.

[PATTERSON, J.—The original lease excepts so much of the water as was necessary for the purpose of watering; and the lease of 1831 gives so much water, provided the lessee does not interfere with the right of the people below.]

It may be difficult to put a construction on the exception as it stands. It ought to have been intelligible.

[COLERIDGE, J.—Is it not for you to shew that something is granted which is prejudicial to the reversioner?]

Prima facie something is granted which was not granted before. If the watercourse was demised, an additional rent should have been reserved. The pattern lease reserves to the tenant for life the right of dealing with the water as he pleased. The lease of 1831 is good as to the grant, but bad as to the exception.

[COLERIDGE, J.—It may amount to a limitation of the grant, i.e. a grant of the water provided the lessor did not interfere with the rights of the occupiers.]

The judgment of the Court was now (Feb. 26, 1848) delivered by—

COLERIDGE, J.—This case was tried before my Brother Platt, when a verdict passed for the defendants, on a point submitted to the jury, with leave to enter it for the plaintiff if we should be of opinion that the question in the case was one of law, which ought to have been ruled in his favour. The case for the plaintiff rested on objections to the lease under which the defendants held, as not supported by the power under which it was made, and these objections were ultimately reduced to two, now to be considered. The first was stated thus:—In what was taken as the pattern lease, executed in 1749, was a covenant to do suit and service at the courts of the manor of Williton, on usual notice to be there sworn, and ordered by the steward, and to pay all fines and americiaments there lawfully imposed. In the lease in question was a covenant to do suit and service; but there was no express covenant to pay fines and americiaments for default of suit. The power required that in all leases granted under it there should be contained all usual and reasonable covenants. It was admitted that no courts baron or customary courts had been held within the manor from 1739, and it was admitted in the argument that there had been no freeholders or copyholders within the manor within the time of living memory, and there was no evidence to the contrary offered at the trial. It was, therefore, argued on the part of the defendant, that this being a lease for years the covenant was not properly a usual or reasonable covenant; that the court baron could not be now held, because there were no freeholders; nor could it be revived, because no freehold tenure of the manor could by law be created at this day; and by the same course of argument it was argued that no customary court could be held or revived for want of copyholders; and it was said, that although this covenant was found in the pattern lease of 1749, it was not conclusively to be taken to be a usual and reasonable covenant. We agree in these arguments, which in truth were not much disputed at the bar. But it was argued that although the court baron and customary court were irrevocably gone, and so there were no courts, properly speaking, of the manor that were or could be held, yet there might be courts, such as the court leet, that in a popular way might be called manor courts, which in order to the identification of property as belonging to this reputed manor, it might be reasonable to bind the tenants occupying lands in it to attend, and that so considered the covenant would still be a reasonable one. But it would be unreasonable to give the words in the covenant a meaning other than they would naturally bear, in order to avoid the lease; and even if we gave the words the sense desired, and allowed the inference that a covenant to attend them might be reasonable for the purpose stated, it by no means follows that it would be unreasonable to omit that which alone is omitted, the covenant to pay fines and americiaments for default of suit. On the contrary, such a covenant might raise such questions as to the jurisdiction to impose the fine or americiaments, and to whom it was to be paid, that it might be considered very reasonable to omit it, leaving the lord to his remedy by action for the breach of the simple covenant to do the suit. On this ground, therefore, we see no reason to disturb the verdict. The second point, which was much more contested at the bar, was stated thus:—In the pattern lease, out of the general grant of water, watercourses, &c. was excepted a watercourse flowing by means of a head-weir out of a natural stream into an artificial channel made through the demised lands on a higher level, for the purpose of irrigating them and other lands of the lessor lower down the stream. In the interval between 1749 and the grant of the lease in question in 1831, one Morle, then tenant of the premises, had erected a mill and diverted water from this watercourse, and so diminished the water for irrigation of the lands just mentioned; the water he so abstracted being returned not to the artificial channel but to the natural stream, and so made unavailing for the purposes of those lands. In the lease of 1831, the grant to the lessee is only of so much of the water as Morle had been accustomed to have for the use of his mill, and there was no exception of the watercourse to the lessor, but only to the occupiers of the meadows below a right to enter and cleanse the water-course, and take the water for the use of their meadows as heretofore accustomed; and this exception the counsel for the plaintiff urged, did not profess to include the watercourse, and was in itself merely void, so that the watercourse, which before was not demised, now passed to the lessee by the general words of the lease, and the remainder-men were also injured in respect of their lower lands, the abstraction of water by Morle being now made legal, if the lease in question was sustainable. This objection, therefore, is twofold: first, that more is now demised—the watercourse itself—than was granted by the pattern lease; secondly, the injurious consequence—the permanent diminution of water applicable to the irrigation of the lands below. As to the first, it appears to us the objection rests upon an assumption of fact as to the pattern lease which is not well founded. It is assumed that the artificial channel through which the water flowed from the head-weir did not pass by it, and was excepted out of the demise; but we collect the words of the exception in that lease to have been (following after a grant of all waters and watercourses belonging, &c.), “except a certain watercourse flowing through Little Moor Mead, thence into another mead (named) for watering it and other lands of Sir C. Wyndham.” Now, without saying that a watercourse may never mean the channel in which water flows, it certainly may mean the stream or flow of the water itself, and whether it means the one or the other in any instrument will very materially depend on the context; and in the case before us, it appears to us that that which flows through lands named for the purpose of watering them and other specified lands, must be taken to be the water itself, and not the channel through which it flows. If so, the channel itself would have passed by the pattern lease, subject only to the easement of the flow of water in it, which was substantially the thing excepted. And so the first part of this objection fails. It may be doubted whether, if this be removed, what remains is open for the plaintiff to insist upon with reference to the notice of objections; but if it be, it clearly raised not a point of law for the Judge, but a question of fact for the jury. It was necessary to ascertain what quantity of water Morle had been accustomed to have to turn his mill, before it could be determined whether a grant of that quantity was in excess of what was granted by the former lease. The jury have in effect been directed to consider that question, and their finding is not questioned. We are, therefore, on the whole, of opinion that this rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Nov. 25. } PLUMER v. BRISCOE.*

Sheriff—Replevin—Sufficiency of Sureties—Damages—Costs of Action against Sureties—Pleading.

A replevin bond which has been assigned by the sheriff, is admissible in an action against him for taking insufficient pledges, without proof of its execution, though there is an attesting witness.

The acts and declarations of the person who acted as replevin clerk are admissible against the sheriff, though there is no other evidence of his being such clerk than his acting as such on the occasion in question.

A writ of fi. fa., in an action on promises for the rent is also admissible against the sheriff, to shew that the proceedings taken against the plaintiff in replevin had proved fruitless.

The costs of an action against the sureties are recoverable as damages against the sheriff.

It is sufficient for the declaration to allege that the sureties were insufficient in fact, without noticing the tenant or shewing that the sheriff did not make due inquiry or even use reasonable caution.

Whether he used due caution is a question for the jury.

Case against the sheriff of Sussex for taking insufficient pledges in a replevin suit of Gladman v. Plumer (1).

The declaration was in the usual form, alleging the distraining, by the plaintiff, on the goods of Gladman, and that the sheriff caused the goods to be replevied and delivered to Gladman, with the averment that at the then next county court of the said sheriff, to wit, at the county court of the said sheriff, holden at, &c., the said Gladman did appear and levy his plaint, &c.; and that Gladman did not duly prosecute his suit, &c.; and that it was the duty of the sheriff, before making deliverance of the distress to Gladman, in pursuance of the statute, &c., to take from the said Gladman, &c., with two responsible persons as sureties, a bond, in double the value of the goods distrained, conditioned, &c.; yet the defendant, so being such sheriff as aforesaid, not regarding, &c., did not take from the said Gladman and two responsible persons as aforesaid, such a bond as aforesaid, conditioned as aforesaid, but wrongfully and injuriously wholly omitted, &c., and on the contrary thereof he, the said defendant, wrongfully took in the name of the said defendant, as such sheriff as aforesaid, of the said Gladman and two other persons, to wit, &c., C. and D, a certain bond conditioned, &c., as a bond taken in pursuance of the said statute; nevertheless the plaintiff in fact saith, that the said C. and D. so taken as sureties, at the time of their becoming pledges and sureties in that behalf as aforesaid, were not good, able, sufficient, and responsible sureties, &c. but were, and each of them was, and ever since have been and still are wholly insufficient, &c., and that the goods and chattels had not been retained, or the arrears of rent paid, &c.

Plea (amongst others) denying the execution of the replevin bond; and traversing the allegation in the declaration, that the plaintiff in the replevin suit appeared and levied his plaint at the next county court, modo et formâ.

At the trial, before Coltman, J., at the Summer Assizes for Lewes, the plaintiff put in the replevin bond, to which there was an attesting witness, and which bond had been assigned to him by the sheriff. The attesting witness was not called, the plaintiff contending that proof of the assignment, as against the sheriff, dispensed with proof of the execution—Barnes v. Lucas (2); and the learned Judge admitted the replevin bond.

In the course of the cause a writ in an action on promises, in the suit Gladman v. Plesner, was put in, being in fact a judgment for the rent. This, it was contended on behalf of the defendant, was not admissible, but was received by the learned Judge. The Judge also received evidence of the acts of Coppock, the replevin clerk, without any further evidence that he was such than that he acted in that character in these proceedings—Jones v. Wood (3), and The King v. Jones (4).

It further appeared that the plaint was not, in fact, levied at the next county court, but at the next but one. It was objected that there being a precise issue raised on this point, the declaration was not supported. The learned Judge held, that the averment was immaterial, and under his direction the jury returned a verdict for 24*l.* 5*s.* damages, which sum included the costs of an action against the sureties.

In the following Michaelmas term,—

Bovill moved for a new trial, on several grounds, and also in arrest of judgment.—First, the replevin bond was improperly admitted without due proof of its execution. Barnes v. Lucas is not consistent with the ruling of Tindal, C.J., at Nisi Prius, in The Fishmongers' Company v. Robertson (5); and though his ruling was not upheld by the Court of Common Pleas, the question is still pending on a bill of exceptions—Slatterie v. Pooley (6). Secondly, the writ of fi. fa. was improperly admitted. Thirdly, no foundation was laid for admitting in evidence the acts of Coppock, it not having been proved that he acted as replevin clerk on any other occasion. Fourthly, the plaintiff having taken upon himself to allege that the plaint was levied at the next county court, the Judge was wrong in directing the jury that the issue was immaterial. The condition of the bond is to prosecute the suit with effect and without delay; and at all events the jury should have been told that the plaint ought to be levied within a reasonable time.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—I do not see that it would be any objection if the plaint had not been levied for a year.]

(3) 3 Campb. 228.

(4) 2 Ibid. 131.

(5) 1 Com. B. 60.

(6) 6 Mee. & Wels. 664; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 8.

Fifthly, the costs of the action against the sureties should not have been included in the damages, without proof of previous notice to the sheriff that an action had been brought against the sureties—Baker v. Garratt (7). The sheriff might, upon notice, have paid the money. Sixthly, it was proved that the sheriff made all possible inquiry as to the sufficiency of the sureties, and did even more than has been held necessary. It was proved that inquiries were made of the bailiff and sheriff's officer, and the sheriff was not satisfied with the mere statement of the sureties themselves—Jeffery v. Bastard (8).

Seventhly, the declaration is also bad in arrest of judgment. The action is founded on 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 23, which enacts, that the sheriff shall take a bond from the plaintiff and two responsible persons as sureties. The declaration ought to negative the sufficiency of the plaintiff in the replevin suit as well as that of the sureties—Hucker v. Gordon (9). Also, the declaration merely alleges that the sureties were insufficient, and it is true that such is the common form. But surely it is not enough to allege their insufficiency in point of fact; in order to fix the sheriff with damages, it ought to be averred that he did not make due inquiry or take reasonable care—Hindle v. Blades (10).

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This case was moved upon several grounds: one, that the verdict was against evidence; but upon consulting the learned Judge who tried the case, we do not find that he is dissatisfied with the verdict, and we see no reason to doubt the propriety of the verdict of the jury upon the evidence before them. The due care of the sheriff as to the responsibility of the bail, was entirely a question for the jury.

But it was said, that there was no proper proof of the execution of the replevin bond, proof of the assignment by the sheriff being held sufficient evidence against him of the due execution of the bond. Upon this point, the case of Scott v. Waithman (11) is a decisive authority. The sheriff by taking and assigning the bond, admits its due execution and validity as a bond. The cases cited of The Fishmongers' Company v. Robertson and Slatterie v. Pooley turned upon very different points, and are clearly distinguishable.

Another objection was, that the declarations of the person who acted as the sheriff's replevin clerk were admitted. As these declarations related to a matter clearly within the scope of his duty as replevin clerk, and were made by him whilst acting as such in the very matter, we think they were properly admitted, and that the proof of his acting as replevin clerk was sufficient to shew prima facie that he was so.

It was also said, that a writ of fi. fa. was improperly received in evidence, because it was not in the replevin suit, but in an action on promises. As this was introduced merely to shew the fruitless proceedings that had been taken, we do not think that the admission of that document affords any ground for a new trial.

Another objection was, that the costs of the proceedings against the sureties could not be recovered against the sheriff, and Baker v. Garratt was cited; but that case only decided that damages beyond the penalty of the replevin bond could not be recovered in an action against the sheriff, which is not the case here; and, therefore, on that ground, the defendant is not entitled to a rule.

In arrest of judgment it was said, that the declaration only charged the not taking two sufficient sureties, without saying anything of the tenant, who might be sufficient. We think there is nothing in this objection. The distrainer has a right to have two sufficient sureties, and if he has not, is entitled to his action. One or two other objections were taken which were disposed of when the motion was made. There will, therefore, be no rule.

Rule refused.

BAIL COURT. }
 1848. } In re FEARON v. NOWALL.
 Jan. 20, 31. }

Prohibition—County Court—Jurisdiction—Landlord and Tenant—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 122.

Where a tenant, after notice to quit, refuses to deliver up possession of the premises occupied by him, and a plaint has been entered in, and a summons thereupon issued out of, the county court, under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 122, the fact of the tenant appearing to such summons, and shewing cause, is not sufficient to oust the county court of its jurisdiction to grant a warrant of possession; but it is for that Court to determine whether the cause shewn is sufficient or not.

So also the question, whether such tenancy has been "duly determined by a legal notice to quit," is one upon which the decision of the county court is conclusive upon the parties.

This was a rule calling upon the Judge of the County Court of Surrey, and the plaintiff in the action of Fearon v. Nowall in that court, to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to prohibit that Court from carrying into execution the judgment recovered in that action.

From the affidavits it appeared that the plaintiff was the landlord, and the defendant the tenant of certain land, held from year to year, under an agreement, at a rent of 40*l*. The tenancy commenced on the 25th of March 1841, the agreement containing a provision that "the tenant should, on receiving a written notice to that effect, deliver up possession of the whole or such part of the said premises as might for the time being be required, within one calendar month next after such notice should have been delivered to him, and that upon every such delivery up of possession a proportionate deduction should be made of the rent thereby reserved, according to the quantity of ground so delivered up; and that in case any crop should be upon the ground delivered up pursuant to any such notice, a reasonable amount of compensation should be paid to the tenant." Several notices had been served from time to time upon the tenant, in obedience to which he had delivered up a considerable portion of the land, but he had received no payment in respect of crops growing upon the land delivered up. At Michaelmas, 1846, a six months' notice to quit was served upon him, requiring him to give up possession of the residue of the land. At that time the claim of the tenant in respect of the growing crops amounted to 150*l*. On the 6th of June, possession not having been delivered up, a plaint was entered in the county court of Surrey, and a summons served upon the tenant, requiring him to shew cause why he should not deliver up possession of that residue to the plaintiff. On the 21st of July the defendant accordingly attended at the county court, and contended that the case was not within the jurisdiction of the court; but the Judge overruled the objection, heard the case, and gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff, directing that a warrant to recover such possession should issue on the 21st of December then next.

In the course of last Michaelmas term this rule was obtained upon two grounds: first, that on the appearance of the defendant at the county court to shew cause, the jurisdiction of that court to proceed further was taken away; secondly, that the notice to quit being insufficient to determine the tenancy, the Judge of the county court had no jurisdiction in the matter.

Bovill shewed cause (Jan. 29).—Neither ground of objection ought to prevail. The jurisdiction of the Judge of the county court, under the 122nd section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, is not taken away by the mere appearance of the defendant to the summons issued under that section. He must "shew cause to the contrary," that is to say, cause sufficient to satisfy the mind of the Judge; and a wrong decision of the Judge in this respect is no ground for a writ of prohibition. As to the second objection, that also was a matter for the Judge of the county court to adjudicate upon. It was for him to say whether the tenancy was duly determined or not. It is not open to the defendant to argue now that the notice to quit was insufficient under the terms of the agreement.

Otter and Hugh Hill, in support of the rule.—First, the defendant having appeared and shewn cause against the summons in the county court, the Judge had no longer jurisdiction to adjudicate in the matter. The statute of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 95.

should be so construed as to make all the sections thereof consistent one with the other. If, under the 122nd section, the Judge of the county court is allowed to go into questions affecting the title of the parties, why does the 50th section enact that that court "shall not have cognizance of any action of ejectment"? The 122nd section of that statute is very similarly worded to the 1st section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 74, except that the words which occur there, requiring the tenant not only to appear and shew cause, but "to shew to the satisfaction of the Justices reasonable cause why possession should not be given up," are omitted from the 122nd section. This strengthens the argument on behalf of the defendant, and would go to shew that the legislature only intended the powers under that section to be exercised in cases either of vacant possession, or where the tenant makes no claim to the further possession of the premises. Secondly, it is submitted, that under the special provisions of this agreement it is clear that the tenancy was not determined by the notice given in this case. The only notice which could be effectual would be the one month's notice, accompanied by a payment or tender of a sum as compensation for the crops upon the land.

No; the fact that the tenancy had been determined by a legal notice to quit, is essential to give the Judge of the county court jurisdiction.

ERLE, J. now (Jan. 31) delivered the following judgment.—In this case a rule for a prohibition to the county court of Surrey was moved for on two grounds: first, that the Judge had no jurisdiction to proceed, under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 122, where the tenant appeared and shewed any cause against proceeding, whether good or bad. The words of the statute are, "if the tenant shall not appear and shew cause to the contrary;" and in my opinion those words require the tenant to shew such cause as constitutes in the opinion of the Judge a defence. The construction contended for would render this part of the statute nugatory. The second ground was, that the notice to quit proved by the landlord did not determine the tenancy; that the Judge had no jurisdiction unless the tenancy was determined by a legal notice to quit; and that his mistaken decision upon a fact of jurisdiction was of no avail. It is unnecessary to say whether the Judge's decision on the fact was right, because it is clear that he had jurisdiction over the question of fact, and that it was his duty to commence the inquiry, and therefore his decision is now conclusive—The Queen v. Bolton.

Case. The declaration stated that the plaintiff before, &c. and after the passing of the stat. 4 & 5 Vict. c. lvii. (1)

(1) The statute 4 & 5 Vict. c. lvii. which repealed the 16 Geo. 3. c. xxxvi., provides by section 2. that the six stems or stations for the taking fish within the Bay of St. Ives, respectively called and known by the names of the Carrick Gladden, the Poll, the Ligh, Porthamaster, Peda-Oloer, and Carrick Leggoe stems, shall be bounded as therein mentioned.

By sect. 5, in case any boat holding or assuming to hold any turn or stem on any of the said stems or stations, shall in pursuit of fish or otherwise row or pass into any other stem or station, except in the cases permitted, provided for by the act, the master seynner and bowman of such boat shall forfeit a sum not exceeding 10*l.* each.

By sect. 16, if any boat having a seyne net on board shall be put out to sea before the warp-rope of her seyne net shall be landed, the hewer of such boat shall forfeit 50*l.*, and if any fish shall be taken by such boat, all such fish shall be forfeited to the owner or owners of the boat then next in turn upon the stem or station, within the limits of which such offence is committed, leaving her warp-rope on board.

By sect. 17, if any boat holding the second or other following turn or stem upon any of the aforesaid six several stems or stations, shall be put out to sea before the boat entitled to any prior turn or stem upon such station shall have shot out her seyne, or having begun to shoot shall desist from shooting the same, the hewer of such boat shall forfeit any sum not exceeding 10*l.*

Sect. 18 imposes a penalty of 50*l.* on any boat which having desisted from shooting her seyne, should resume such shooting after another boat should have taken possession of the stem.

("to repeal the 16 Geo. 3. c. xxxvi. for encouraging the Pilchard Fishery carried on in the Bay of St. Ives, in the county of Cornwall, and to make other provisions in lieu thereof,") and after the 7th of July 1841, was the owner of the seyne boat Alert, and of a seyne net, tow-rope, and warp-rope belonging to the same, conformable to the provisions of the act, and employed the boat and net in the fishery carried on in the Bay of St. Ives under the provisions of the act, and before, &c. (the boat being duly registered under the act), the plaintiff was entitled to have and to hold stem and turn of fishing upon one of the six several stems or stations for taking fish within the said Bay of St. Ives; and that the boat was, &c., having on board five men and a net, proceeding to take its stem and turn of fishing under the provisions of the said act, and was rightfully entitled under the provisions, &c., to have and to enjoy the benefit and advantage of fishing within the limits of the said stem or station, and being so entitled did put off the said seyne boat to sea, within the limits of the said Poll stem, and was preparing and about to cast and throw the said seyne net of the plaintiff from and out of the said seyne boat of the plaintiff into the sea, within the limits of the said Poll stem, in order by and with such seyne net to take, surround, and catch divers large quantities of fish, to wit, &c., being fit for human food, and of great value, to wit, &c., then being in the sea, within the limits of the said Poll stem, and the plaintiff did, acting lawfully and rightfully, and in all things in conformity to the provisions of the said act, commence to take, surround, and capture the said fish so then being within the limits of the said Poll stem, and was then in the course of taking, surrounding, and capturing the said fish, and would then, but for the committing, &c., have taken and captured the said fish and reduced them into his lawful possession, as he was lawfully under and by virtue of the said act entitled to do: yet the defendants, well knowing, &c., but contriving, &c. to injure, &c., and to hinder and prevent the said plaintiff from making and completing the capture of the said fish, and to deprive him of the profit, &c., and just after the plaintiff was preparing to take, surround and capture the said fish as aforesaid, to wit, on &c., wrongfully and unlawfully and against the will of the plaintiff, disturbed and obstructed the plaintiff in the lawful and rightful exercise and enjoyment of the said benefit and advantage of fishing, to which he was then so entitled, and was so lawfully and rightfully exercising, &c., and did then unlawfully and wrongfully and against the will of the plaintiff cast and throw into the sea a certain seyne net, near to the said fish which the plaintiff was so preparing to surround and capture, and then wrongfully, &c. inclosed, surrounded and captured the said fish in and with the said seyne net, and thereby hindered and prevented the plaintiff from taking, surrounding, and capturing the said fish by and with the said seyne net of the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff lost and was deprived of the said benefit and advantage of fishing to which he was so entitled, and was so in the lawful and rightful exercise and enjoyment of as aforesaid, and lost and was deprived of the said fish which he might and otherwise would have taken and captured as aforesaid, and of the sale thereof, and divers great gains and profits, to wit, &c., which he might and otherwise would have made from the lawful and rightful exercise of the said benefit of fishing, to the plaintiff's damage, &c.

Pleas—Not guilty; and other pleas traversing all the averments in the declaration; and also a plea setting up a right in the defendants to take their turn in the stem on the occasion in question. To this last plea the plaintiff replied de injuriâ.

At the trial of the cause, before Erle, J., at the Summer Assizes for Cornwall, 1846, a verdict was found for the plaintiff.

In the following Michaelmas term, a rule nisi was obtained for a new trial on various grounds, and also in arrest of judgment.

Crowder, Butt, and Slade shewed cause (Nov. 22).—The declaration shews the right of the plaintiff to catch the fish; and that he was interrupted when he was about to catch them, and had commenced catching them. There is therefore, primâ facie, a good cause of action. The defendants contend that the particular powers given by the statute for regulating the rights of the fishermen, and for enforcing penalties for the violation of those rights, deprive the plaintiff of his remedy at common law. To this it may be answered, first, that the plaintiff had not given the requisite notices, forbidding the other boats to interfere, so as to bring himself within the protecting clauses of the act, which, being penal as against the defendants, should be construed strictly. Secondly, the plaintiff is not confined to the summary proceeding for penalties; but if his common law right has been interfered with, he may pursue his common law remedy. The penalties are merely cumulative. The penalty of 50*l.* would be quite inadequate, as he has lost, through the defendants' interruption, fish to the value of 600*l.* or 700*l.* There is, no doubt, a right created by the statute; the obvious meaning of which was to give the plaintiff the same interest in the fish as if he had a several fishery at the time he was fishing. It is true that if the penalty is sought to be recovered, the means provided by the act are to be pursued; but it is a fallacy to say, that because a right is created by act of parliament, an action on the case will not lie for an injury occasioned by the violation of it: besides, in point of fact, the right existed at common law, and the statute only provides for regulating the mode of its enjoyment.

Cockburn and Montague Smith were heard in support of the rule.

The judgment of the Court was now (Feb. 26) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This was an action for infringing a right derived to the plaintiff under the provisions of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. lvii. for the improvement of the pilchard fishery, within the Bay of St. Ives, Cornwall. The declaration shewed that the plaintiff having the statutable right, and accordingly holding his turn in the Poll stem in that bay, and being about to inclose fish in his seyne net there, was obstructed by the defendant's capture of them in another seyne net. After verdict for the plaintiff, upon the issues raised by the pleas, it has been moved, in arrest of judgment, that the declaration discloses no cause of action; and we are of opinion that this objection is well founded.

In an ordinary case of fishing at sea, we are not aware of any action by one fisherman against another for anticipating him in a capture of fish which had not been appropriated, nor was any attempt made to maintain the case on that ground; but the case for the plaintiff was vested on the rights and duties created by the statute. The defendants answered that there was no general clause conferring the right and prohibiting infringement; but that specific infringements were prohibited, and for each case a specific penalty, with a specific mode of recovering it before magistrates, was provided. Thus the passing out of one stem into another, which comprises the act charged against the defendants, was so prohibited under a penalty, by section 5; and the infringing the turn by boats of the same stem was prohibited by sections 17. and 19; and by sections 41. and 48, mooring and hook-fishing by other boats, upon limited occasions, were prohibited under penalties; and by the 60th and following section, power to levy penalties and forfeitures by distress warrants, or imprisonment, was given to certain Justices. That therefore, if any infringement of a right was shewn, it was one in respect of which a specific remedy had been given; and that it was a rule of law that an action will not lie for the infringement of a right created by statute where another specific remedy for infringement is provided by the same statute.

It appears to us that the law is so, and that it governs the present case.

This general doctrine was adjudged in Underhill v. Ellicombe (2), where debt for composition-money for highway rates was held not to lie, inasmuch as the claim was given by statute; and the same statute which created it prescribed a particular remedy for its enforcement. In Doe d. the Bishop of Rochester v. Bridges (3), the Court say, "where a statute creates an obligation, and enforces the performance in a specified manner, we take it to be a general rule that performance cannot be enforced in any other manner." Therefore the judgment will be arrested.

1848. } STINDT v. ROBERTS AND
Jan. 19, 21. } ANOTHER.

Evidence—New Trial—Ship and Shipping—Bill of Lading—Freight and Demurrage.

Where a document which is not legal evidence of the facts contained in it, consists of an enumeration of items otherwise legally proved, the reception of such document in evidence is no ground for a new trial.

The assignee of a bill of lading, who claims and receives goods under it, is liable to pay not only the freight of the goods, but also for demurrage, according to the terms of the bill of lading.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that before the making of the promise, &c. certain cattle bones had been shipped in good order, and well conditioned upon the ship of the plaintiff by certain persons trading at Bremen, under the style of Rosing & Co., to be delivered according to the terms of a certain bill of lading, signed by the plaintiff, that is to say, upon the terms following,—to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the port of Hull, unto the order of the said Rosing & Co., or to their assigns, they paying freight for the said goods at the rate of 15s. 9d. per ton of 2,240lb., and gratuity 1l. 19s. 6d., with prime and average accustomed, the vessel to be discharged in four working days, or 2l. 10s. per day to be paid for laying days. That the vessel did proceed on her voyage and arrive at Hull with the said cattle bones on board in the like good order and well conditioned as aforesaid, whereof Rosing & Co. and the defendants had notice. That after the signing of the said bill of lading as aforesaid, and before the detention thereafter mentioned, Rosing & Co. duly indorsed and signed the said bill of lading so made and assigned as aforesaid to the defendants, and the defendants then became and were indorsees of the said bill of lading and the assignees of the said cattle bones, and entitled to have and receive the same under and by virtue of the said bill of lading; and thereupon, afterwards, &c. in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendants, would deliver unto the defendants as such indorsees and assignees as aforesaid, and would suffer and permit them to take the said cattle bones according to the terms of, and agreeably to the said bill of lading, the defendants then promised the plaintiff to accept and take the said cattle bones on the terms and conditions contained in the said bill of lading in that behalf and agreeably thereto, and to discharge the said schooner or vessel in four working days, or pay to the plaintiff 2l. 10s. per day for laying days for the detention of the said vessel, beyond the four working days so allowed for the discharge thereof as in the said bill of lading mentioned. Averment, that the plaintiffs were ready and willing to deliver the said cattle bones to the order of Rosing & Co. or their assigns, pursuant to the bill of lading, and to the said defendants as assignees and indorsees as aforesaid from the time of making the said promise, and that the plaintiff did afterwards deliver, and the defendants receive the said cattle bones upon the terms contained in the said bill of lading. Breach, that the defendants did not discharge the vessel within the said four working days, but detained the vessel for three laying days over the said four working days.

Pleas.—First, non assumpsit; second, that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to deliver the cattle bones, modo et forma; third, that the defendant did not detain the vessel over the said four working days, modo et forma.

At the trial, which took place before the under-sheriff for Hull, on the 4th of August last, evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff of admissions made by each of the defendants that they were consignees of the cargo on board the plaintiff's vessel, and that the discharging of the cargo took place by their order and under their directions. It was also proved that the vessel was detained thereby for three laying days beyond the four working days. No evidence was given of any indorsement by Rosing & Co. to the defendants of the bill of lading; but the bill of lading which was in the possession of the plaintiff, and which was to the effect stated in the declaration, was, after notice to produce, put in as secondary evidence of the bill of lading in the possession of the defendants. It appeared also that a person whose duty it was to make out the account of the freight, did so on this occasion, and sent it to the defendants, who paid it,—striking out and refusing to pay, however, the item relative to the demurrage. This account was copied into what is called "The Manifest Book," and this book, although objected to, was admitted in evidence at the trial. The entry was in this form:—

Manifest of the cargo of the Courier, J. D. Stindt commander, from Bremen.

A quantity of cattle bones, from H. Roberts & Co., 98 tons 18 cwt. 2 qrs., 15s. 9d. per ton.....	77	18	1
Gratuity to Captain.....	1	19	6
	£79	17	7
Three days' demurrage .....	7	10	0
	£87	7	7

No notice to produce the account served upon the defendants had been given.

The under-sheriff left it to the jury to say whether the defendants had performed their contract, and whether the vessel had been improperly detained. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 7*l.* 10*s.*

In the course of last Michaelmas term, a rule nisi was obtained, on behalf of the plaintiff, for a new trial; first, on the ground that the manifest book ought not to have been received in evidence; secondly, that there was no evidence of the promise stated in the declaration; and, in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that the consideration, as stated, was insufficient in law to support the promise alleged.

Hugh Hill now shewed cause.—Upon the first point, although the manifest book, being a copy of the account sent to the defendants, was not legal evidence, still, under the circumstances, its reception is no ground for a new trial. The amount of the freight and demurrage was abundantly proved alunde. Its having been received did not induce the jury to come to a different conclusion than they would have otherwise done—Hughes v. Hughes (1), Alexander v. Barker (2). Secondly, there was sufficient evidence of the promise alleged in the declaration to take the opinion of the jury upon it. The bill of lading was proved, and the defendants shewn to have received the goods as assignees thereof. They became therefore liable to fulfil all the conditions specified in the bill of lading; amongst other things to pay the demurrage—Scaife v. Tobin (3), Williams v. Thomas (4), Harman v. Clarke (5), Harman v. Mant (6), Jesson v. Solly (7), Sanders v. Vanseller (8). Thirdly, if the evidence was sufficient to satisfy the jury that the promise as alleged was made by the defendants, the consideration stated was in law sufficient to sustain it.

Willes, contra.—First, it is admitted by the other side, that the manifest book was not legal evidence. It is impossible now to say what effect its admission in evidence had upon the minds of the jury. It might have been a chief ingredient in inducing them to come to the conclusion they did. There ought, therefore, to be a new trial upon this ground—De Rutten v. Farr (9). Secondly, although in certain cases the assignee of a bill of lading is liable to the express terms contained in it, that is not, as a proposition of law, universally true. Where the assignee is the owner of the goods, the assignor of the bill of lading is his agent, and can therefore bind him to the terms of the contract. But that was not the case here. All that was proved in this case was, that the defendants received the bill of lading, and took the goods in question. The only promise which can be implied in law from such a state of circumstances was to pay for the freight only, and not for the demurrage—Amos v. Temperley (10), Williams v. Thomas, Sanders v. Vanzeller. Thirdly, there is no sufficient consideration stated to support the promise as alleged. It would only support a promise to pay for the freight—Roscorla v. Thomas (11), Jackson v. Cobbin (12).

ERLE, J. now (Jan. 21,) delivered the following judgment.—In this case, a rule for a new trial had been moved for, and it was objected, first, that the admission of the book of the plaintiff in evidence for himself, on the ground that it was a manifest and in the nature of a public document, was wrong. But although the book was not admissible to prove any fact, still I am of opinion, looking to the nature of the entry, that its reception is no ground for a new trial. It was a mere statement of the items of the plaintiff's claim—viz. that the freights for ninety-eight tons and a fraction at 15s. 9d. per ton amounted to 77l. 18s. 1d., and so forth. The facts on which those claims were rested were proved by legal evidence, and the book only added the results of multiplication and addition. A copy of the entry would have been analogous to the ordinary bill of particulars of a plaintiff's demand, which, after proof of the items, is often referred to by the jury for separate amounts and the sum total. It was also objected, that there was no evidence of the alleged promise to discharge the vessel in four days. But the claim of the cargo by the defendants as the assignees of the bill of lading, was evidence of an agreement to the terms therein mentioned, in consideration of which the master agreed to deliver the cargo.

The principle on which the consignee is taken to contract for the freight and demurrage mentioned in the bill of lading, applies in respect of other stipulations therein mentioned, and the promise to pay demurrage in case of detention is in effect a promise to discharge within the limited time, or pay for the detention.

It was objected in arrest of judgment, that the consideration, although valid for a part of the promise, was invalid as to the part relating to discharging the vessel in four days. But no principle or authority was adduced to shew that a consideration valid according to the general definition, can be insufficient in law to support any promise which the contracting party may in fact choose to make thereon. The objection, therefore, appears to me to fail.

April 29. } ANOTHER.

*Prohibition—County Court—Jurisdiction
—Power of Judge to alter Verdict.*

Where a cause in the county court is tried by a jury, the Judge has no power to alter their verdict.

A cause having been heard, an entry was made of judgment for the defendants. The defendants then left the court; and, subsequently, and as the defendants swore they believed, after the Court had broken up, the Judge rescinded his decision, and ordered a new trial, on which occasion he gave judgment for the plaintiff. The affidavits in answer did not shew affirmatively when the alteration had been made, but a copy of the entry in the register was produced, in which it was stated to have been at the same court:—Held, on application for a prohibition, that the Judge had exceeded his jurisdiction, and the rule for a prohibition was made absolute.

This was a rule calling on the Judge of the county court of Merionethshire and the plaintiff in the suit, to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue, directed to such Judge and his officers to prevent execution, or any other step being taken, or their giving validity to a judgment pronounced on the 13th of October last, under the following circumstances:—The plaintiff sued the defendants in the county court, for the recovery of 16*l.*, principal and interest due on a promissory note, dated February 18, 1834. The plaint was returnable July 23, 1847. On that day the defendants required to be furnished with a copy of the note as better particulars. The learned Judge ordered the better particulars to be given, and adjourned the case to the 11th of August, on which day it stood over until the 12th. A plea of the Statute of Limitations was pleaded; but no notice had been given pursuant to the 19th rule of practice of the county court as framed by the Judges (1), nor had any leave been asked of the Judge under the latter part of that rule. On the 12th of August the case was adjourned until the 9th of September, being the next court day; and, as was sworn by the defendants, to enable the plaintiff to answer the plea of the Statute of Limitations. On the 9th of September, after hearing the parties, a verdict was given for the defendants, with costs to be divided; and an entry was accordingly made by the clerk in the paper book as follows:—"Statute of Limitations

(1) The 19th rule is "Where a defendant intends to rely on the special defence of infancy, coverture, the Statute of Limitations, &c., he shall give notice thereof in writing to the clerk of the court, five clear days before the day on which the summons is returnable. Provided always, that where such notice shall not have been given, the Judge in his discretion, and on such terms as he shall think fit, may adjourn the hearing of the cause, to enable the defendant to give such notice such number of days before the day to which the hearing, may be adjourned as the Judge may think proper."

—verdict for defendants—costs to be divided.” After the defendants and their attorney had left the court, the Judge rescinded the decision, and ordered the case to be adjourned to the next court. The entry, of which the defendants produced a verified copy, was “Same court—the above decision rescinded, and case adjourned to the next court.” The case came on again on the 13th of October, when the learned Judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff, with costs, on the ground that the plea of the Statute of Limitations had been improperly pleaded. Subsequently this rule was obtained, against which—

F. Bailey now shewed cause.—The Judge was correct in the course he pursued, as the rule of practice had not been complied with.

[COLERIDGE, J.—What do you say to his rescinding his judgment in the absence of the parties?]

It was merely an entry or note, and not a final judgment.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The entry is “Statute of Limitations—verdict for defendants—costs to be divided.” It was made by the clerk in the paper book; and the parties then go away. You cannot contend it was no judgment.]

Still though it was a judgment the learned Judge could alter it during the same court, as the superior Courts can alter their judgments during the same term, which is but one day in point of law—Co. Litt. 260, a. So also the Quarter Sessions are as one day. Here the entry, of which a verified copy is produced, is as follows:—“Same court.—The above decision rescinded, and case adjourned to the next court.” It was therefore altered at the same court. The Court will not interfere unless there has been a clear excess of jurisdiction. He referred also to Keen v. the Queen (2), and The King v. Carlile (3).

Morgan Lloyd, in support of the rule.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The only point is the want of jurisdiction.]

The judgment had been once pronounced, and the Judge was functus officio. It is expressly stated in the affidavit that the defendants had gone away from the court, and knew nothing of the alteration, and their attorney swears that he believes that no revocation, alteration, or rescinding of such judgment took place at all upon that day. The affidavits on the other side do not negative this, but merely put forward a copy of the register book, the entry in which may have been made some days afterwards. Further, it does not appear whether this case was tried by a jury or not; and if it was a verdict by a jury, that cannot be altered after it is once recorded—Co. Litt. 227, b. If the Judge tried the cause alone then the rule would apply by analogy, for he is the jury as well as Judge. If this proceeding is to be allowed, the alteration may be made at any time. On the facts, it is clear that the Statute of Limitations was pleaded, with the full knowledge and assent of the plaintiff and the Judge.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be made absolute; not on the ground of an improper exercise of discretion by the Judge, because, however improper, I should not have the right to interfere, but on the ground that he has exceeded his jurisdiction unless it can be said that what took place previously on the 9th of September was altogether null and void. But this, however, is not so; for although the plea of the statute may not have been pleaded properly, yet it was, in fact, pleaded, and no objection was made to it. After the plea was put in time was applied for and given to the plaintiff to answer it, both on the 11th and 12th of August, and until the 9th of September, when judgment was given for the defendants. Whether or not it was heard by a jury does not distinctly appear; but if it was so heard, the Judge would certainly have no right to alter it at all. If it was heard by the Judge, still he had decided in favour of the defendants, and it is recorded in the book for that purpose, and the judgment was complete on that day. I do not mean to say but what a Judge may alter his judgment the same day and at the same court, but he can have no authority to do so in his own chambers after the court is over. The defendants, who had gone away as soon as they heard judgment pronounced in their favour, cannot, of course, speak to anything which transpires in their absence; but the clerk to the defendants' attorney does say that he believes, and the defendants also believe, that the judgment given for them, and recorded on the 9th of

(2) 16 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 180.

(3) 2 B. & Ad. 973.

September, was not altered or rescinded at any time on that day, and that if it had ever been altered at all, it must have been after the Court had risen, and on a subsequent day. Surely this calls upon the other side to say whether or not, in fact, the judgment was so altered on the same day. They had notice of this statement in the affidavit produced on the part of the defendants, and might have produced an affidavit in contradiction had this not been so; but, instead of this, they merely give a verified copy of the entry of the judgment and its being rescinded on that day as entered in the book, which appears to be rather an evasion of the facts. I think, therefore, that there has been an excess of jurisdiction, and that the rule for a prohibition should be made absolute.

Attorney, Privilege of—Costs—Suggestion on the Roll—County Court—Jurisdiction—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. ss. 67. 129.

*A creditor who sues in a superior court for a debt for which he might have sued in the county court cannot be considered as within the jurisdiction of the county court. And the words of sect. 67. of stat. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. being, that privilege shall not exempt "from the jurisdiction" of the county court, and not "from the provisions of the act,"—Held, that an attorney is not deprived of his privilege of suing in the superior court for a cause of action under 20l.**

Assumpsit by the plaintiff, an attorney, as indorsee against the defendant as drawer of a bill of exchange under 20l. A verdict having been obtained by the plaintiff for a sum under 20l., a rule nisi was obtained to enter a suggestion on the record to deprive the plaintiff of costs, pursuant to the provision of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 95. s. 129.

Lush, in Hilary term (Jan. 31), shewed cause.—To support the rule two things must be made out: first, that an attorney cannot sue in a superior court for a debt under 20l. without the penalty of losing his costs, which is equivalent to saying that his privilege as an attorney is taken away by the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 95. s. 149. Secondly, that a bill of exchange for a sum not exceeding 20l., is a cause of action which cannot be sued for in one of the superior courts. Several sections of the statute will be relied on on the other side. The 67th section provides, that "no privilege, except in certain cases, (this not being one of them) shall be allowed any person to exempt him from the jurisdiction of any court holden under the act;" but it is difficult to see how this provision affects an attorney plaintiff. The old privilege was, of being sued in this court when defendant, and of suing by attachment of privilege when plaintiff; but the taking away his privilege cannot oblige him to sue in this court, for the county court cannot have jurisdiction until the party is sued. Sections 140. and 141. provide that the act shall not "affect the privilege" of the universities and the stannary courts, and coupled with the preceding clause would seem to allow of no other privilege whatever. But the above privilege is not to be taken away except by express words, and section 129. only shews the mode of obliging parties who are within the provisions of the act to adopt those provisions, but does not extend the provisions themselves. In Board v. Parker (1), the words of the act of parliament were stronger than in this case, and yet it was held that an attorney plaintiff was not deprived of his privilege of suing in his own court.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—You must contend that the general words do not apply to an attorney.]

The privilege of an attorney has its origin in the fact that he is supposed to be always present in the court—Gerard's case (2); and the same doctrine was adhered to since the Uniformity of Process Act, which though it takes away the writ of attachment of privilege, does not interfere with privilege itself—Dyer v. Levy (3).

Creasy, contra. — Formerly attorneys were supposed to be personally present in this court, and were therefore allowed their privilege—Wiltshire v. Lloyd (4). That is not the case now. In Gardner v. Jessop (5) it was decided, on plea, that the privilege of an attorney did not extend to protect him from being sued in the county court of Middlesex; but Dyer v. Levy, Wright v. Skinner (6), and Hussey v. Jordan, cited in Board v. Parker, shew that his privilege as plaintiff was not taken away under the old acts. But though in former times an attorney was always supposed to be present in court during term—Com. Dig. tit. 'Attorney,' (B,) 3, and their number was limited by statute 33 Hen. 6. c. 7, viz. six for Norfolk, six for Suffolk, &c., the rules of the county court now suppose that attorneys are constantly present in them, though they are allowed only a limited scale of fees. The rule as to the construction of statutes in general is to adhere to the ordinary meaning of words; but if this is contrary to the obvious intention of the legislature, the Court will modify the language to avoid inconvenience—Becke v. Smith (7). If attorneys are allowed to sue in the superior courts, they will become the indorsees of bills of exchange of small amount, and harass the parties to them with excessive costs.

The judgment of the Court was now (May 1) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The question in this case is, whether an attorney plaintiff is within the provisions of the statute 9 & 10 Viet. c. 95, establishing county courts.

By section 58, jurisdiction is given in all personal actions where the debt or damage claimed is not more than 20*l.* By sect. 67, it is enacted that no privilege, except as hereinafter excepted, shall be allowed to any person to exempt him from the jurisdiction of any court holden under this act. The only exceptions are the universities and the court of the stannaries, by sections 140. and 141. By section 129, it is enacted, that if any action shall be commenced after the passing of this act, in any of her Majesty's superior courts of record, for any cause other than those lastly hereinbefore specified (the present action is not one of those specified), for which a plaint might have been entered in any court holden under this act, and a verdict shall be found for a sum less than 20*l.*, if the said action is founded on contract, the said plaintiff shall have judgment to recover such sum only, and no costs.

The present action is on a bill of exchange, and the verdict under 20*l.*, and the motion is to deprive the plaintiff of costs under the 129th section.

It is clear that the Uniformity of Process Act, 2 Will. 4. c. 39, which takes away the process by attachment of privilege, has not altered the right of an attorney plaintiff, although he is obliged to sue by summons like any other plaintiff—Dyer v. Levy. It seems equally clear that the 129th section would not of itself deprive an attorney plaintiff of his privilege to sue in the superior courts without the risk of losing costs. The language of that section is not at all stronger than that of the 39 & 40 Geo. 8. c. civ. s. 12;—"If any action shall be commenced in any other court than the said court of requests, for any debt not exceeding the sum of 5*l.*, and recoverable by virtue of this act in the said court of requests, the plaintiff shall not by reason of a verdict for him have or be entitled to any costs whatever"—under which act it was held, in Board v. Parker, that the plaintiff, an attorney, did not lose his privilege, and was not bound to sue in the court of requests, at the peril of costs if he sued elsewhere. Nor are the words so strong as those in 10 Geo. 3. c. xxix. s. 3, on which Dyer v. Levy was determined; for there it is provided, that no action for any debt recoverable by the said act, shall be brought in any of his Majesty's courts at Westminster, and if it be judgment shall be given for the defendant. Yet an attorney plaintiff was held not to be within the act. So by 23 Geo. 2. c. 33. (the Middlesex County Court Act), section 19, it is enacted, that if any action shall be commenced in any of his Majesty's courts of record, and the defendant shall be liable to be summoned to the said county court, and the jury shall find damages for the plaintiff under 40*s.*, no costs shall be awarded to the plaintiff in such action, but the defendant shall be entitled to double costs of suit. Yet an attorney plaintiff was held not within the act—Hussey v. Jordan—25 Geo. 3, cited in the note to Wiltshire v. Lloyd. Johnson v. Bray (8) is to the same effect on a similar act; also Willoughby v. Fenton. In all these cases the debt was recoverable in the court created by the act, and the plaintiff might have sued there if he pleased, yet (by reason of his privilege as an attorney) he was held not bound to do so.

Unless we overrule all these cases, we cannot hold that the 129th section of the County Court Act per se subjects the plaintiff to loss of costs. But the 67th section was relied on, which undoubtedly takes away the privilege of an attorney when defendant, for it enacts, that no privilege shall be allowed to any person to exempt him from the jurisdiction of the county court. It is contended, that these words are large enough to embrace the obligation of a plaintiff to sue, as well as the liability of a defendant to be sued, in the county court. In the Middlesex County Court Act, 23 Geo. 2. c. 33, there is no such clause; therefore an attorney, whether plaintiff or defendant, has been held not to be within that act. In the other acts, on which the cases cited have turned, there is such a clause. In the 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. civ. s. 10. it is enacted, that "no privilege shall be allowed to exempt any person from the jurisdiction of the said court of requests, on account of his being an attorney or solicitor; but that all attorneys and solicitors shall be subject to the several processes, orders, judgments, and executions in the same manner as any other persons." The Court, in Board v. Parker, held these words to be applicable only to defendants. The 67th section of the County Courts Act is in the same language as the early part of the 10th section of the 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. civ; but the subsequent words about "processes," &c. are not inserted, and the Court, in Board v. Parker, commented on those latter words undoubtedly, though the decision does not appear to have turned upon them.

A debtor, when sued in the county court, is at once placed within its jurisdiction; and the abolition of any privilege, which would otherwise exempt him from it, is intelligible. But it is difficult to see how a creditor, who does not choose to sue in the county court, though he may do so, but who chooses to sue in a superior court, as he still may at the peril of costs, can be said to be within the jurisdiction of the county court. That court cannot in any way punish him or call him to account for not suing in it, or exercise any sort of jurisdiction over him, as to costs or otherwise, when he sues in another court. He requires no privilege to exempt him from the jurisdiction of the county court, for he never was within it, and therefore the abolition of any privilege he may have cannot affect his position as regards the jurisdiction of the court. It is true that an unprivileged person suing in the superior courts, when he might have sued in the county court, is liable to forfeiture of costs; but that is by reason of the enactment in the 129th section, and in no way depends on the 67th section, which seems wholly inapplicable to a creditor not choosing to sue in the county court. If the words of the 67th section had been that "no privilege should be allowed to any person to exempt him from the provisions of this act," or any similar words, they would no doubt have embraced attorneys plaintiffs; but the words are, "from the jurisdiction" of the county court, that is, from being dealt with, from having power exercised over him by the county court. But it is plain that the county court cannot deal with, cannot exercise any power over, creditors privileged or unprivileged who refuse to sue in that court.

Neither of the sections, 67th or 129th, then per se affect an attorney plaintiff suing in a superior court. Can we then apply the 67th section to the 129th so as to see that, reading them together, the legislature clearly intended to take away the privilege of an attorney plaintiff, and subject him to the risk of costs, if he sue in a superior court, when he might have sued in the county court? We think that we cannot, and that however desirable it may be that attorneys should be subjected to that risk like other plaintiffs, the legislature has not so said even if it so intended.

Prohibition—County Court—Jurisdiction—Service of Summons.

The 11th rule of practice under the County Courts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. requires that where the service of a summons has not been personal, it must be proved to the satisfaction of the Judge that the service of such summons came to the know- ledge of the defendant ten clear days before the return day of the summons:—

Held, on motion for a prohibition, that the sufficiency of the proof of service is entirely a question for the discretion of the Judge of the county court, and that a superior court will not interfere where he has exercised such discretion.

Semble, per Coleridge, J., that the observance of such rule of practice is not a condition precedent to the jurisdiction of the county court in a case otherwise within its jurisdiction.

This was a rule calling upon the Judge of the county court for the Bloomsbury district, and the plaintiff in the above suit, to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to prohibit the said court from further proceeding in the suit, and from carrying into execution or giving effect to the judgment of the said court off the said plaintiff, and why the said court should not be prohibited from paying the sum of 24*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*, paid into the said court under the said judgment, to any other person than the defendant.

It appeared that the plaintiff was sued out of the county court of Bloomsbury to recover 19*l.* 7*s.*, the value of certain fixtures, and was returnable on the 23rd of December. The summons was not served personally, but was left at the defendant's dwelling-house either on the 11th of December, as was sworn by the bailiff, or on the 14th of December, as was sworn by the servant and the daughter of the defendant. The defendant obtained an order for a certiorari on the 18th of December; but the certiorari was not issued, it being supposed that the order was sufficient to remove the cause. On the 23rd the cause came on, in the absence of the defendant, and judgment was given against him. On the 30th a certiorari was issued. On the 13th of January, after due notice to that effect, the defendant applied for a new trial on the ground that the summons was not personally served and did not come to his knowledge until the 14th of December, being less than ten days, the time required in such cases by the 11th rule of practice (1). On the 13th, the application came on before the Judge of the county court, and facts were proved corroborating the statement of the defendant as to the time of service. It was stated in the affidavits upon which the rule was obtained, that on that occasion "the Judge, in deciding upon the said application, stated that he was of opinion that the said summons was served on Saturday the 11th of December, though it had not come to the knowledge of the said Aaron Smith until the Tuesday following, but as he, the said Judge, felt that the 11th rule was a very inconvenient one, very slight evidence satisfied him with regard to the service. That he, however, admitted that in this case he had no evidence whatever that the summons had come to the knowledge of the said Aaron Smith before the 14th of December; and that the said Judge went on to say, that he thought that the irregularity was one which the said Aaron Smith might waive; and that as he was of opinion that he, the said Aaron Smith, had, by the application to the Hon. Mr. Justice Erle for a certiorari, waived the irregularity, he should dismiss the application, with costs." The application was accordingly dismissed, with costs, and the present rule was obtained in Hilary term.

Knowles and Hawkins now shewed cause. —The clerk to the county court, in his affidavit, says, that the service was proved, as required, to the satisfaction of the Judge, and that is all that is necessary by the 11th rule of practice. There is no ground for a prohibition, as this is a point of practice only. This Court will never interfere in matters of practice in inferior courts—Ex parte Smyth (2). What is said as to the refusal of the application for a new trial only amounts to this, that the Judge, upon hearing the further evidence, had some doubt whether he had come to a correct conclusion upon the facts at the first hearing (3).

a summons to appear to a plaintiff shall not have been served personally, and the defendant shall not appear at the return day, it must be proved to the satisfaction of the Judge that the service of such summons has come to the knowledge of the defendant ten clear days before the said return day."

(2) 3 Ad. & El. 719.

(3) There were several other points discussed, but, as no decision was given upon them, the arguments are omitted.

(1) The 11th of the rules framed by the Judges is as follows:—"Provided that in all cases where

Willes, contra.—The Judge violated the general principle of law and justice in deciding against the defendant, without giving him the opportunity of making his defence as required by law. The 11th rule is not a matter of practice merely, for the defendant is not before the Court until the proper service or notice has been given. The terms of the rule are that "it must be proved" that the summons came to the knowledge of the defendant ten clear days before the return day. Here it is manifest the Judge thought proper to disregard the rule, because it was inconvenient in his opinion. The only evidence was, that the bailiff stated he had given the summons to the daughter, who told him that she would give it to the defendant. The Judge himself subsequently admitted that he was satisfied it did not come to the defendant's knowledge. The application for a certiorari could not be construed into a waiver, for it was resistance to the jurisdiction. There was no jurisdiction to try the cause, and it is peculiarly hard upon the defendant, as the plaintiff has before brought an action for the same cause in the Common Pleas, in which he was nonsuited.

COLERIDGE, J.—Several points have been made, upon which, if material to the decision of this case, I should have taken time to consider. But I think I can dispose of the case upon plain and intelligible grounds. A writ of prohibition never issues merely because a step taken in a court below may have been unwise or unjust, nor because we may think a decision unsatisfactory, but only because we find that the Court has exceeded, or is about to exceed, its jurisdiction. Now, in the present case the inferior court has acted upon two occasions, once on the 23rd of December, and again on the 14th of January; and on the first of those occasions, it is said that it acted without jurisdiction. Let me concede, for the sake of argument, that, on the first of those occasions, the due service of the summons was a condition precedent to the Court entering upon the case; and this is stating the case most strongly for the defendant. The rule directs, that in all cases where a summons to appear shall not have been served personally, and the defendant shall not appear on the return, it must be proved to the satisfaction of the Judge that the service of such summons has come to the knowledge of the defendant ten clear days before the said return day. There is certainly no direct evidence of what the proof of service was before the Judge, upon the 23rd of December; but it is sworn in the terms of the rule that it was proved to the satisfaction of the Judge that the service did come to the defendant's knowledge within the requisite time. I am bound to take it that there was some evidence before him; and it was for him to decide upon its sufficiency, although I might not have been satisfied had I been in his situation. But when I argue, as though it were necessary to originate jurisdiction, that this proof should be given, I by no means wish it to be understood that such is my opinion, for I should say that it is entirely the other way; and that if the cause is within the jurisdiction of the court, that it is merely a rule to direct the Judge in the exercise of that jurisdiction. It may be compared to a notice of trial. If no notice of trial had been given in an action in one of the superior courts, it would certainly be a ground for a new trial; but such notice would not be necessary to give jurisdiction to try. So much, therefore, as to what took place on the 23rd of December. Then as to the proceedings on the 14th of January: the defendant was then before the Court, and what then took place is very strong against the argument for the plaintiff; for the Judge then said, "I am now satisfied that the summons was served on the 11th of December, but that it did not come to the knowledge of the defendant before the 14th;" and he might well say, on that occasion, and declare his opinion on the conflict of evidence, that if all those facts had been brought before him on the 23rd of December he should not have decided as he did. But this has nothing to do with his decision upon the 23rd of December, which is the occasion to which we must look. Upon this short point, I think the rule must be discharged.

April 17. } OF EAST MARK.

Highway—Dedication—User.

If a road has been used by the public for a great number of years, a dedication by the owner of the soil may be presumed whoever he may be; and it is not material to inquire who the precise owner was, or whether he intended to dedicate the road to the public.

This was an indictment, for the non-repair of a public highway, alleging that the inhabitants of the tything had been immemorially accustomed to repair all roads within it.

At the trial, before Williams, J., at the Spring Assizes 1847, for Somersetshire, it appeared in evidence that fifty years ago a large moor in the manor of East Mark had been inclosed under a private act of the 34 Geo. 3. (1), which empowered the Com-

(1) Intituled 'An act for dividing, allotting, and inclosing certain moors, commons, or waste lands called Little Mark Moor and Summer Lease, and all the other open common or waste lands in the manor of East Mark, within the parish of Mark, in the county of Somerset.' The following clauses were those referred to in the argument:—

"That the commissioners may at any time or times, by notice in writing, to be affixed on the principal church door of the said parish, extinguish all or any part of the right of common in, over, and upon the lands to be inclosed, and that from thenceforth all such right of common shall cease and be for ever extinguished.

"That the commissioners shall, and are hereby authorized and required to set out, ascertain, order, and appoint both public and private roads, highways, &c., in, over, upon, and through, or by the sides of the lands and grounds hereby intended to be divided and allotted. * * * And all such private ways, &c. shall be made, and from time to time be amended, cleansed, renewed, and kept in repair by such person or persons, and in such manner as the said commissioners shall award, order, and direct, and that it shall not be lawful for any person after such new roads or ways are set out, and the objections (if any) are heard and determined, to use any other road or way either public or private, in, over, upon, or through the said moors and lands, and that the grass and herbage growing and renewing, in and upon all and every the public and private roads and ways, so to be set out and ascertained as aforesaid, shall be and for ever remain to and for the use and benefit of such person or persons as the said commissioners shall by their award order and appoint, and all former roads and ways which shall not be continued, set out, and ascertained as aforesaid, shall be deemed part of the moors and lands to be divided and allotted pursuant to this act.

missioners to make allotments in respect of rights of common, and other rights of the freeholders and copyholders, and to make an allotment to the lord in respect of his interest in the soil of the inclosed lands,

"That after the commissioners shall have set out and allotted the several and respective parts and parcels of the said moors, commons, or waste lands, for the purposes aforesaid, they, the said commissioners, shall, and they are hereby authorized and required to set out, allot, inclose, and award, to and for M. H. B., as lord or owner of the soil of the said moors, commons, or waste lands, in respect of his right and interest in the said soil in the said moors, commons, or waste lands, such certain parts or parcels thereof as to the said commissioners shall seem meet, so that such parts or parcels so to be allotted and set out to the said lord of the said soil be not more than one-twentieth part of the remaining parts of the said moors, commons, or waste lands (quality, situation, and convenience considered).

"That the said commissioners shall have power and authority, and they are hereby authorized and required, in the next place to divide, set out, allot, inclose, and award, all the residue and remainder of the said moors, commons, or waste lands, unto, for and amongst every person or persons, proprietor or proprietors interested therein, in respect of their several and respective rights in, over, and upon the same. * * * And that the several and respective allotments so to be assigned, set out and allotted unto and for the several persons who shall be entitled to the same by virtue of this act, shall be in full bar of, and compensation for, his, her, or their rights or interests in, over, and upon the said moors, commons, or waste lands, or any part thereof. And that immediately from and after the said commissioners shall have so set out and inclosed any part or parcel of the said moors, commons or waste lands to and for any person or persons by virtue of this act, all right of common in, over, and upon such part or parcel so inclosed as aforesaid, shall cease and be for ever extinguished.

"Provided, that nothing in this act shall prejudice, lessen, or defeat the right, title or interest of the said M. H. B. as lord of the said manor, or any future lord or lords of the said manor, in and to the seniorities, royalties, rights, and services belonging thereto; but the said M. H. B. and all future lords of the said manor, shall and may, from time to time and at all times for ever hereafter hold and enjoy all mines, minerals, goods, and chattels of felons and fugitives, felons of themselves, and persons put in exigent, deodands, waifs, estrays, forfeitures, and all other rights, royalties, jurisdictions, and pre-eminences whatsoever to the said manor appendant or appertaining (other than and except such for which compensation is directed to be made by this act) in as full, ample, and beneficial manner as he and they could or might have held and enjoyed the same in case this act had not been made.

"Saving always to the King's Most Excellent Majesty, his heirs and successors, and to all and every person and persons, bodies politic and corporate, his, her, or their heirs, successors, executors, and also to set out public and private roads, &c. The road in question was originally set out by the Commissioners as a private way for the purpose of the occupiers of the inclosed lands, and they directed that the inhabitants of the tything should repair it. There was evidence of an user of this road by the public since the time when it was set out, and also some evidence of repairs being done under the direction of the Commissioners.

The counsel for the defendants contended, that there was no proof given of a dedication to the public, as there was no owner of the soil who could dedicate, (and Barracough v. Johnson (2) was referred to,) the right of the lord in the soil being extinguished by the allotment which had been made to him in lieu of it under the act; and that if the right to the soil was in the Crown dedication could not be presumed without evidence of consent. The learned Judge left it to the jury to say, whether the owner of the soil had consented to this road being used by the public in such a manner that they could presume a dedication; and referring to Poole v. Huskinson (3) he told them, that according to a dictum in that case, the ownership of the soil remained in the lord; but that, at all events, it must be in somebody; and he directed the jury to find whether the owner, whoever he was, had given his consent in a way sufficient to justify them in coming to the conclusion that such owner had dedicated the road to the public, and also, whether the user by the public was sufficient to shew an intention on the part of the owner, whoever he might be, to dedicate. The jury returned a verdict for the Crown, and leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict. A rule nisi was obtained accordingly, or for a new trial on the ground and administrators, (other than and except the several persons to whom any allotment or allotments shall be made, and whose rights are hereby intended to be barred and extinguished), all such estates, rights, title, interest, claim, and demand which they, any or every of them, had and enjoyed of, in, to, or out of the said moors, commons, or waste lands so intended to be divided and inclosed or exchanged as aforesaid at the time of passing this act or could or might have held and enjoyed in case the same had not been made."

that the learned Judge misdirected the jury in telling them that the soil remained in the lord of the manor, and that he ought to have stated that there was a difference in the amount of evidence requisite to prove dedication against the Crown and against a private owner; and Barracough v. Johnson and The King v. Edmonton (4) were cited.

Kinglake, Serj. and Fitzherbert now shewed cause.—Poole v. Huskinson is a direct authority in favour of the learned Judge's ruling. The section of the Inclosure Act extinguishing the lord's right of soil is not general, as contended on the other side, but only applies to such part of the waste land as is allotted to others. The lord's right to the soil of the roads set out still remains untouched: this is evident from other clauses of the act, and particularly from that which saves all the lord's rights. Strong words are required to divest an estate which has once vested—Doe d. the Governors of Bristol Hospital v. Norton (5).

[PATTESON, J.—If the argument of the defendants is correct, it must apply equally to all inclosure acts; and if the soil is not given expressly to the lord of the manor, it will vest in all cases in the Crown.]

That would be a very unreasonable construction of those acts. Then the Judge properly left the question open, that a dedication might be inferred, whoever was the owner; and no difference could occur in this respect whether that owner was the lord or the Crown. There is no ground for saying that the Judge expressed any opinion that the right of the lord to the soil still remained.

Cockburn and Barstow, in support of the rule.—The learned Judge referred to Poole v. Huskinson, and reserved leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict on the point as to the lord's right of soil being preserved. No doubt he afterwards left it to the jury to say if there had been an intention to dedicate by the owner, whoever he might be, but the jury were previously told that the lord's right was not taken away. That, it is submitted, is a misdirection. The act clearly means to give the lord an allotment in respect of his rights over all the moor, including his right of soil in the roads set out; and, therefore, according to The King v. Edmonton, the property in the soil would be in nobody. If so, there could be no person capable of dedicating, and no animus dedicandi, which is essential. Poole v. Huskinson is distinguishable, for there it did not appear that the lord's right in all the soil was extinguished; and therefore the dictum of Parke, B. may be supported.

(4) 1 Moo. & Rob. 24.

(5) 11 Mee. & Wels. 913; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 418.

[PATTERSON, J.—There is a clause here, directing the commissioners, in the first instance, to set out roads, and then to allot to the lord, in respect of his right of soil, not more than one-twentieth of the remaining part of the moor; that seems to exclude the roads. In respect of what then is that allotment to be?]

In respect of his right of soil over all the moor: the words "remaining part" measure the quantity to be given, not the rights to be extinguished.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The law, as lately laid down, has led the Courts into unimportant inquiries as to there being an intention to dedicate a road to the public. It seems to me, that if the jury find that there has been a long user as a public road, I am not at liberty to inquire into the question whether there was such an intention or not. Then it is said that a case of dedication will not be the same against the Crown and against a private person. But the Crown can undoubtedly dedicate, and the question whether there was a dedication was put to the jury. If persons have found a road used as public, and have built a town by it, are we to enter into the question of whether it was intended to dedicate the road or not? On the contrary, I think that the mere fact of enjoyment of a public road, for a great length of time, ought to be perfectly conclusive of such an intention, and it is immaterial in whom the soil was vested as owner. The learned Judge seems to have stopped short of any inquiry into the precise ownership; and, in my opinion, left the question quite correctly to the jury.

PATTERSON, J.—I think my Brother Williams's direction was quite right. He stopped short of saying in whom the ownership of the soil was, and left it to the jury to say whether there had been a dedication, whoever was the owner. If there had been a lease for ninety-nine years, it might be there was no dedication without the consent of the owner of the freehold, because there was no person who could lawfully dedicate; but here there was no necessity for evidence of any intention or consent. There was no misdirection, for the Judge did not lay it down broadly that the lord of the manor was owner of the soil; if he had done so, the question as to whether that was really so or not might have been raised.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The direction of the Judge was perfectly correct. The fallacy in the defendant's case arises from the Judge at the trial referring to the decision of the Court of Exchequer, in Poole v. Huskinson, where it was intimated that the soil in such a case remained in the lord of the manor; but he merely referred to that decision as shewing what might be the case: he by no means told the jury that the soil was absolutely in the lord of the manor. On the contrary, he said, "Whoever was the owner of the soil, a dedication by that person may be presumed." Without, therefore, entering into the other points, I agree that the rule should be discharged.

ERLE, J.—There was fifty years' uninterrupted user of this road by the public. Then the learned Judge was quite right in leaving it to the jury to say, whether from that user they could presume a dedication. He might have gone further and told them that there was very strong evidence of a dedication, but he left it in fact more favourably for the defendants.

NIND v. RHODES.

County Court—Jurisdiction—Bills of Exchange—Costs—Suggestion on the Roll—Affidavit, Negating Exceptions in.

The 129th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, which prohibits a plaintiff from recovering costs in an action brought in a superior court, for which a plaint might have been entered in the county court, applies to actions on negotiable instruments in the same manner as to other actions.

Upon an application to enter a suggestion to deprive the plaintiff of costs under that section, the defendant need not aver that the Judge did not grant a certificate that the cause was fit to be tried in the superior court.

This was an action against the acceptor of a bill of exchange for 12*l.*, in which a verdict had been obtained for that amount.

In Hilary term a rule had been obtained, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the judgment should not be entered for the amount of the verdict alone, or why a suggestion should not be entered to deprive the plaintiff of costs, on the ground that the action ought to have been brought in the county court. It appeared on the affidavits that both parties resided within the jurisdiction of the county court for the Clerkenwell district, and that the bill was accepted at the residence of the defendant, within the jurisdiction of the said court. The affidavits stated the facts prima facie requisite to bring the case within the 128th and 129th sections; but it did not allege that the Judge had not granted a certificate that the action was not fit to be brought in the superior court (1).

Lush shewed cause (May 5).—The affidavit on which this rule was obtained is insufficient. All the facts stated may be quite true, and yet the plaintiff ought not to be deprived of his costs, as it is not alleged that the Judge at the trial did not certify on the back of the record that the action was fit to be tried in the superior court, which he may have done when this cause was tried. The plaintiff is entitled to the costs under the Statute of Gloucester, and he cannot be deprived of that right, unless the defendant shews clearly that the provisions of the County Courts Act apply; and the 129th section expressly excludes any case where the Judge certifies. This ought, therefore, to have been negatived.

The rule must, at all events, be discharged, because bills of exchange are not within the 128th section. That section excludes cases where the causes of action did not "arise wholly, or in some material point, within the jurisdiction of the court within which the defendant dwells," &c. In point of law bills of exchange have no locality as contracts. The right of action follows the holder of the bill wherever he may be, for which reason the venue cannot be changed in actions on bills upon the ordinary undertaking. The terms used in this section must therefore refer to causes of action which accrue in a particular place, and not to bills of exchange.

Barstow, contra.—The word "unless" in the 129th section, is the same as "except," and that part of the section is therefore an exception, to be noticed by the party who relies upon it. If the certificate was granted, it is within the plaintiff's own knowledge, for he has possession of the record, and the statute does not require the certificate to be given forthwith after the trial is concluded. The defendant, therefore, cannot be required to negative this exception. It is another answer to the objection, that this is a proceeding to satisfy the conscience of the Court. The suggestion, when entered, is not conclusive: the plaintiff may demur or plead to it. Moreover, the suggestion in the terms of the affidavit would be correct; and if the record were so made up, and judgment thereon given to deprive the plaintiff of costs, a court of error would uphold the judgment, in the absence of any affirmative allegation that there was a certificate.

The words used in the 58th section, which gives jurisdiction, are "all pleas of personal actions," which are large enough to include bills of exchange; and the argument is only founded upon a supposed analogy to the practice of changing the venue, which is attempted to be supported because the words "material point" are used. The exceptions are carefully stated in the statute; and no reason can be assigned why actions upon small bills of exchange should not be brought in the county court as well as other claims of a small amount. In the 97th section of the act bills of exchange are mentioned, so that the subject-matter was before the legislature; and the general words must include them in the absence of any special exception.

(1) The 128th section gives a concurrent jurisdiction to the superior court of record, where "the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the defendant, or where the cause of action did not arise wholly or in some material point within the jurisdiction of the court within which the defendant dwells or carries on his business at the time of the action brought, or where any officer of the county court shall be a party, except in respect of any claim to any goods and chattels taken in execution of the process of the court, or the proceeds or value thereof."

The 129th section enacts, that, "if any action shall be brought in a superior court for any cause other than those lastly hereinbefore mentioned, for which a plaintiff might have been entered in any court holden under the act, and a verdict shall be found for the plaintiff for a sum less than 20*l.* if the said action be founded on contract, or less than 5*l.* if it be founded on tort, the said plaintiff shall have judgment to recover such sum only, and no costs; and if a verdict shall not be found for the plaintiff, the defendant shall be entitled to his costs as between attorney and client, unless in either case the Judge who shall try the cause shall certify on the back of the record that the action was fit to be brought in such superior court."

[Lush admitted that there was jurisdiction to try actions upon bills of exchange, but contended that the 128th section did not apply to them.]

COLERIDGE, J.—I understand it to be admitted, that the county court has, at least, concurrent jurisdiction over actions of this kind; but then it is said, they are not within the 128th section. The 58th section, which gives jurisdiction, is as follows:—"That all pleas of personal actions where the debt or damage claimed is not more than 20*l.*, whether on balance of account or otherwise, may be holden in the county court without writ." Then follows in a proviso various specific exceptions, as actions of ejectment, or actions in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, &c. shall come in question. It is clear that bills of exchange are within the general words, and it follows therefore that the county court has general jurisdiction in actions upon them. How then are they to be excluded from the 129th section? It says, if any action shall be commenced in any of the superior courts for any other cause than those lastly hereinbefore specified, for which a plaint might have been entered in any court holden under this act, &c., the plaintiff shall have judgment to recover such sum only and no costs. I think there is no foundation for the objection. On the other point, as to the affidavit, I will take time to consider.

maining question on which I suspended my judgment, because it promised to be of frequent occurrence, was raised by the following circumstances:—The affidavit, on which the rule was founded for entering a suggestion to deprive the plaintiff of his costs, stated all the circumstances which were necessary prima facie to bring the case within the 129th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 5, but it did not negative that a certificate had been granted, by the Judge who tried the cause, that it was fit to be tried before him; and in shewing cause, Mr. Lush relied on this, alleging truly that everything in the affidavit might be true, and yet there might be no ground for the rule. But I am of opinion that the answer given by Mr. Bastow is satisfactory. Prima facie the statute deprives the plaintiff of his costs under the circumstances stated in the affidavit. The fact relied on by the plaintiff would make the case an exception, and it is one particularly within his knowledge. If the certificate was granted at all it would have been so on his application. If therefore he intended to rely on it, it was for him to bring it forward. As he has not done so, he cannot rely on the silence of the other side. The rule, therefore, will be absolute.

Practice—Notice of Trial—Setting down Cause.

A notice of trial may be given after a cause is set down for trial.

No particular form is necessary to make a good notice of trial; and therefore a notice correct in other respects, but incorrectly stating that the cause had been made a remanet from the preceding term, was held a good notice of trial.

A rule nisi had been obtained to set aside the verdict in this cause, and all subsequent proceedings, for irregularity. It appeared that issue was joined on the 17th of November 1847, and notice of trial was given for the sittings after Michaelmas term. It was then postponed upon an application of the defendant, until the sittings after Hilary term. The cause was set down for trial, but without a fresh notice for those sittings. The cause was then entered in the list as a remanet, and on the 8th of April a notice was given in the following form:—"Take notice of trial in this cause, for the first sitting in next Easter term to be holden in Westminster Hall, in the county of Middlesex, the same having been made a remanet from last Hilary term." The cause was tried as undefended, and a verdict found for the plaintiff. The rule was granted upon two objections—first, that the notice, being a notice of continuance, was not a good original notice; second, that the notice was bad, because given after the case was set down.

Addison (May 9,) shewed cause.—It is admitted there was no notice for the sittings after Hilary term; and that the cause was not therefore properly a remanet. But no particular form is necessary, if the notice gives the defendant the requisite information of the plaintiff's intention to try, and within sufficient time before the trial—Tyte v. Ste- venton (1). In other respects the notice is sufficient, and there is no rule that it must be given before setting down the cause.

Pickering, in support of the rule.—No notice of trial is necessary where the cause is a remanet; and this ought not to be treated as a fresh notice. It is clear there was no notice before it was set down in Hilary term, and the postponement of the cause by the Judge's order made a notice necessary. He referred to Jacks v. Mayer (2), and Ellis v. Trusler (3). The notice is bad, because given after the cause was set down, and it was set down before any notice having reference to that trial, for a fresh notice was necessary after the postponement.

The judgment of the Court was now (May 12,) delivered by—

COLERIDGE, J.—This was a rule for setting aside a verdict for irregularity, and the ground in effect was, that the cause had been set down for trial originally without notice of trial previously given. It was set down in Hilary term for the last sittings, and made a remanet to the said sittings in Easter term. In due time before those sittings, notice of trial was given, in which were inserted the words "the same (i. e. the cause) having been made a remanet," so that it did not purport to be an original notice. The objection was not much insisted on, nor does it appear to me of any weight. The case of Tyte v. Steventon, cited by Mr. Addison, is a satisfactory authority that the form of notice of trial is immaterial if it be delivered in time and clearly and unequivocally inform the defendant that the plaintiff intends to proceed to trial at a certain specified time. There, the notice purporting to be a continuance only of a former notice, was held to be good as an original notice. But it was said, that no cause can be properly set down until notice of trial has been given. No authority was cited for this. The two cases cited of Jacks v. Mayer and Ellis v. Trusler do not apply, nor can I find such a rule laid down anywhere in the books of practice. Certainly, in far the greater number of instances notice of trial is in fact given before setting down, because in far the greater number of instances it is indorsed on the issue delivered; but this is not necessary, nor does the marshal inquire whether notice has been given or not before he receives the record. Looking at the principle on which notice is required, I cannot see the necessity for holding the rule so strict. I therefore discharge this rule; and as it was an experimental motion, on the ground of irregularity, with costs.

On motion for a new trial of a plaint in the county court, which had been tried by the Judge alone, the Judge ordered that the second trial should be had before a jury, and that the costs of the application should be paid to the party opposing the application:—Held, that whether the Judge had power to make such order or not, the opposing party had, by accepting such costs, precluded himself from afterwards objecting to the order.

This was a motion for a rule for a mandamus, commanding the Judge of the county court of Sussex to give effect to his judgment of the 12th of November 1847. It appeared that in October the plaintiff levied a plaint in the county court of Sussex, which came on to be heard on the 12th of November. No notice for a trial by a jury had been given, and it was, therefore, heard by the Judge, who decided in favour of the plaintiff, with costs. The defendant applied subsequently, after due notice, for a new trial, and then asked that it should be tried by a jury. The plaintiff opposed the application, and also objected that the Judge had no power to grant a trial by jury when the first trial had been without a jury. The Judge ordered the new trial, and granted a jury, but ordered the defendant to pay the costs of the application and other costs incurred by the plaintiff. These costs were received by the plaintiff. The second trial took place on the 10th of December, before a jury, and the defendant had a verdict.

Hugh Hill, in support of his motion.—It is submitted that under the 20th rule of practice, approved by the Judges, the Judge had no power to order a jury. That rule directs that "every notice of a demand of a jury where the debt or demand claimed shall exceed 5*l.* must be made in writing to the clerk of the court two clear days before the return day of the summons."

[COLERIDGE, J.—Did the plaintiff receive the costs ordered to be paid by the Judge's order?]

Yes; and it will, no doubt, be a question whether he can now be heard to object to the order.

COLERIDGE, J.—The point intended to be raised is a very important one; but in the present case it would be in vain to grant the rule, as the answer would be that the plaintiff has acquiesced in the order. If he had merely attended the trial he would not, I think, have lost his right to object; but he was not bound to accept the costs, and by so doing he has precluded himself from making any objection (1).

Rule refused.

Poor Law—Order of Removal—Evidence—Entry in Discharge of Duty—Estoppel—Prior Order quashed.

The examinations on which an order of removal was made stated that G. was employed by the overseers of the respondent parish to remove the paupers to the appellant parish, under a prior order of 1826, and that after he returned from removing them he signed this indorsement on the order

(1) So in Pearce v. Chaplin, 16 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 49, it was held that acceptance of costs, under a Judge's order, precluded the party from moving to set aside so much of the order as directed no action to be brought. But consent to a trial under a writ of trial not within the statute, does not make the trial valid—Lawrence v. Willcock, 11 Ad. & El. 941; a. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 284.

—"Delivered to Mr. W, overseer of D, by T. G;" that G. was dead, and his handwriting was proved. On the trial of the appeal, it appeared that G. was not an overseer, but had been employed by the overseers to remove the paupers, and that they had been seen on the morning in question leaving the respondent parish with G, and that they returned the same night with 4s. The appellants objected to the admissibility of the indorsement in evidence; and also contended that the respondents were estopped by a prior order of removal in 1844, which was quashed without entering into the merits of the settlement, "by reason of the informality and insufficiency of the examinations." The Sessions held this decision not conclusive:—Held, that the examinations contained evidence of the removal under the prior order of 1826; and—

Semle, that the indorsement was evidence, as being made by a person deceased, in the course of his duty.

Held, also, that the Sessions having decided on the effect of the quashing of the order of 1844, this Court would not interfere with their decision.

1848. } WILLDING v. TEMPERLEY.
May 12. }

Bankruptcy—Affidavit—5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. ss. 11, 19.—Set-off—Reasonable and probable Cause—Costs.

The plaintiff filed an affidavit in bankruptcy, under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 11, against the defendant, for 99l. 19s. 7d. In the account previously delivered, as provided by that section, 10l. 15s. was given credit for as a set-off, but the balance was made by mistake to appear 99l. 19s. 7d., instead of 89l. 19s. 7d. At the trial the plaintiff recovered 86l.:—Held, that the defendant was not entitled to have his costs allowed, pursuant to the 19th section.

Quære—Whether a creditor is justified under the above statute in making an affidavit for the whole amount of his demand, without noticing any set-off, which he knows to exist on the other side.

In this case the defendant being a trader, and indebted to the plaintiff, the latter, under the provisions of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 11, on the 24th of December 1847, caused an account to be delivered of the particulars of his debt, with a notice requiring payment, according to the form (Schedule 2) of that statute. The particulars contained items of—

Goods sold, delivered, and money lent, amounting to . . . . £100 14 7

At the foot of these items was written

Creditor's balance, for coals supplied 10 15 0
£99* 19 7

The notice required payment of 99l. 19s. 7d.

On the 27th of December the plaintiff also filed an affidavit, in the Court of Bankruptcy, according to the form (Schedule 1.) of the above statute, that the defendant was indebted to him in 99l. 19s. 7d., and that an account had been delivered, &c., and the summons was therefore issued, calling on the defendant to appear at the Bankruptcy Court, on the 3rd of January 1848. The defendant appeared to the summons in the Court of Bankruptcy, and deposed that he had a good defence to the action as to the sum of 54l. 15s. 10d., and an action of debt was thereupon commenced by the plaintiff against the defendant, claiming by the indorsement on the writ 100l. 14s. 7d. The defendant pleaded nunquam indebitatus, and a set-off; and at the trial, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the sittings in London, after Hilary term, the plaintiff had a verdict for 86l. On affidavit of the above facts,

Butt, on a former day, had obtained a rule nisi, for allowing the defendant his costs under section 19. of the above statute, on the ground that the plaintiff had not reasonable or probable cause for making the affidavit in the amount of 99l. 19s. 7d.

Shee, Serj. now shewed cause.—The affidavit referred to the account; and by the simplest calculation it would appear from that that the 99l. 19s. 7d. was a mistake in the process of subtraction, and that 89l. 19s. 7d. was the sum which the plaintiff really claimed. If so, he has recovered the whole amount of his demand except 3l. 19s. 7d., and the Court will not deprive him of his costs on the ground of so slight an excess—Sherwood v. Taylor (1). In that case Tindal, C.J. observes, that in order to entitle a defendant to costs the sum claimed should be “materially larger” than the sum recovered. It was not necessary to allow the amount of the set-off at all—Smith v. Temperley (2), where all the authorities are collected. The defendant is not aggrieved in respect of the security required, in consequence of such an affidavit, as he is only to give security to pay such sum as shall be recovered by action. It is not certain that the defendant will plead a set-off.

Butt and Maynard, in support of the rule.—The amount for which the bond is taken must depend on the amount specified in the affidavit; and it is not even contended on the part of the plaintiff, that he had reasonable and probable cause for making an affidavit for the whole sum. The plaintiff ought to have deducted the set-off, which by giving credit for, he shews to have been within his knowledge—Dronefeld v. Archer (3), Mitchell v. Jenkins (4).

[PATTESON, J.—The statute 43 Geo. 3. c. 46. allowed the defendant the costs, when there was no reasonable and probable cause for making the arrest, not the affidavit. If under that statute a creditor made an affidavit for 100*l.*, knowing that his debtor had a set-off of 30*l.*, and issued a writ indorsed for 70*l.*, I am not prepared to say that he might not have had reasonable and probable cause for making the affidavit.]

The statute 5 & 6 Vict. refers expressly to the affidavit alone. It is no answer to say it was occasioned by carelessness. In Smith v. Temperley the Court of Exchequer gave no opinion on the point now raised, as the defendant was there held to be too late in his application.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—We wish to decide this application on an intelligible principle. I think that an affidavit, which shews what is the amount of the debt remaining, after giving the debtor credit for everything for which he is entitled to credit, is sufficient.

(1) 6 Bing. 280; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. C.P. 60.

(2) 16 Moo. & Wels. 273; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 105.

(3) 5 B. & Ald. 513.

(4) 5 B. & Ad. 588; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 35.

Is that done here? I think it is. The plaintiff swears to an actual balance, and he shews how he makes it out; for he refers to the account. He could not be indicted for perjury. The figures forming the account are correct, and it is admitted that the error of 10*l.* arises from miscalculation. The rule must be discharged.

PATTESON, J.—I should be sorry to lay it down as a rule, that in making an affidavit under this act, a creditor has a right to refuse to give credit for any set-off which he may know to exist on the other side. But that is a question we are not now called on to decide, as when we look at the affidavit, we see that the plaintiff refers to an account, by which he shews how the sum is made up. There is a mistake in the figures; but no one would be deceived by that; and we cannot say there was not reasonable and probable cause for making the affidavit for the amount mentioned.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am clearly of the same opinion; and without deciding whether it is necessary to give credit for a set-off in these cases, it is enough to say that here the plaintiff, by referring to the account, which must be read in connexion with the affidavit, does give credit for the set-off.

ERLE, J.—If the plaintiff were indicted for perjury, he must of course be acquitted, as he swears by reference to the account annexed, and he could not be said to have sworn falsely when the mistake was manifest. By the view thus taken this rule is therefore disposed of. I think it, however, right to add that there seems to me a great difference between an affidavit which is intended to be the foundation for an arrest, and an affidavit in bankruptcy, which is only to compel a party to come in and answer; and a creditor may well take upon himself to swear to an account, admitting that there is a set-off to some amount. It is true that it is highly proper that he should give credit for the exact amount due from him, but I am not aware that he is liable to any penal consequences for omitting to do so.

M'GREGOR v. FISKEN.

Arrest, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 3.—Protection under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, (Scotch Sequestration Act).—"In meditatione fugæ."

*The 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, (Scotch Sequestration Act) empowers the Lord Ordinary to grant to the debtor a warrant of protection or liberation, and, by section 18, it is enacted "that the warrant, granting protection or liberation, or a copy thereof, certified by one of the bill chamber clerks, shall protect or liberate the debtor from arrest or imprisonment in Great Britain and Ireland and her Majesty's other dominions, for civil debt contracted previous to the date of sequestration; but such warrant of protection or liberation shall not be of any effect against the execution of a warrant of arrest or imprisonment in meditatione fugæ," &c. :—Held, that a departure from England, for the purpose of returning to Scotland, was not a fuga within this exception, and that the defendant having been arrested by a Judge's order, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 3, made after such order of protection was granted, was entitled to his discharge.**

In this case the defendant had been arrested by a Judge's order, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 3, on the ground that he was about to leave England; and it appeared upon affidavit that he was a Scotch bankrupt, and had received a warrant of protection, from the Lord Ordinary, under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41. ss. 18, 19. The debt had been contracted prior to the sequestration.

Montague Smith now moved for a rule calling upon the plaintiff and the sheriffs of London to shew cause why the defendant should not be discharged out of the custody of the said sheriffs.—The defendant is privileged from arrest. By section 17, the Lord Ordinary is empowered to grant to the debtor a warrant of liberation or protection, which, by section 58, may be enlarged, or be renewed for a limited period. By the 18th section it is enacted, "that the warrant granting protection or liberation, or a copy thereof, certified by one of the bill chamber clerks, shall protect or liberate the debtor from arrest or imprisonment in Great Britain and Ireland and her Majesty's other dominions, for civil debt contracted previous to the date of sequestration; but such warrant of protection or liberation shall not be of any effect against the execution of a warrant of arrest or imprisonment in meditatione fugæ, or ad factum præstandum, or for any criminal act." That warrant had been duly renewed, and during its continuance the defendant was arrested.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—The question is, I suppose, whether the exception in meditatione fugæ applies?]

That is the only point. The exception must mean a flight from the jurisdiction of the Scotch Bankruptcy Court, and not when the bankrupt is going within the jurisdiction, where his presence may be required by his creditors. In the recent case of Jones v. Anstruther (not reported) in the Court of Exchequer, the defendant was discharged on a similar application.

Willes shewed cause, in the first instance.—This question depends upon the construction of the 18th section. No particular meaning is shewn to belong to the words in meditatione fugæ (1), and the words must be taken to mean flight from the country where the debtor is. The creditors will not be prevented from obtaining the attendance of the bankrupt, as by section 67. a warrant may be issued to bring him up from any prison in England. If the present arrest is not valid, an arrest because he was going to Ireland would be equally invalid, so that there would be no difficulty in his effecting his escape altogether.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Must not in meditatione fugæ mean going out of the jurisdiction of the Scotch court?]

In a similar case, before Mr. Baron Parke, the discharge was refused.

Montague Smith replied.

WIGHTMAN, J., after having retired to consult Mr. Baron Parke, said—My Brother Parke informs me that he refused the discharge in the case referred to, because the defendant was going to Toronto. In this case it seems to me the rule ought to be made absolute. No fuga is contemplated. The defendant here intends to go back to Scotland, within the limits of the very Court which has jurisdiction, and this cannot be said to be the fuga contemplated by this statute. It must mean some escape from the dominions of Great Britain, and not going from one part to another, and least of all, going back to Scotland. This statute is subsequent to the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, so that if there is any inconsistency the latter must prevail.

April 27; } THE QUEEN v. PETER A. LE COMTE
May 10. } FONTAINE MOREAU.

Evidence—Award of Arbitrator—Indictment for Perjury.

A. was indicted for perjury, on occasion of making an affidavit to hold C. to bail for 50l.

At the trial of the indictment it was proved that A. had prosecuted the action against C; that, at the trial, a verdict was taken for A, subject to a reference; and that the arbitrator awarded in favour of C:—Held, that the award was not admissible against A. on the trial of the indictment.

This was an indictment for perjury charging that the defendant wilfully contriving, &c. to aggrieve, &c. one Emile Encontre, and to put him to expense, and to cause him to be arrested for 50l., by virtue of a writ, &c., on the 18th of February 1846 came, in his own proper person, before Sir J. W. Knt., since deceased, then being one of the Justices, &c., and then and there produced a certain affidavit in writing of him (the defendant) and then before the said Sir J. W., in due form of law, was sworn, &c., and deposed, amongst other things, that Emile Encontre was indebted to him in 50l. and upwards, for work and labour done by the defendant for the said Emile Encontre, and also for money lent, &c., and that the said Emile Encontre, at the time the defendant swore, &c., was not indebted to the said defendant in the sum of 50l. and upwards, on any account whatever, but was indebted to the defendant in a small sum of money only, under the sum of 20l., to wit, the sum of 15l. 11s., and no more, as he the said defendant, at the time he so swore and made affidavit as aforesaid, well knew, &c. There was also a second count in the indictment.

At the trial of this indictment, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the sittings in Middlesex, after Trinity term, 1847, it appeared that the defendant, who was a patent agent, having been employed by M. Encontre in 1844 and 1845, sent in his account at the end of 1845, which, after giving credit for various sums received by the defendant from Encontre, exhibited a balance due to the defendant of 54l. 14s. 3d., and this not being paid, an action of debt was brought by the defendant against Encontre. The declaration in that action contained the common counts for work and labour, goods sold, money paid, &c. The defendant pleaded nunquam indebitatus, payment and set-off. The defendant, after action commenced, made the affidavit the subject of the indictment before a Judge at chambers, that Encontre was indebted to him in the sum of 50l., and that he was about to quit England, and the defendant was accordingly arrested on a capias. M. Encontre disputed in particular two items in the account delivered, one being for 27l. 2s. 8d., and the other 11l. 12s. 7d. The cause was set down for trial, at the Spring assizes for Surrey 1847, after the finding of the indictment at the Central Criminal Court, and a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, (the present defendant), subject to the award of a barrister. By the award the arbitrator directed a verdict for the defendant in the action (the prosecutor of the indictment). The award was tendered in evidence on the part of the prosecution. It was objected to on the part of the defendant, but was admitted. The jury having returned a verdict of guilty,

Sir F. Thesiger, in Michaelmas term, obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, or for entering a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the award was improperly admitted. He referred to 1 Stark. Evid. 3rd edit. p. 261.

Shee, Serj. and Bovill (April 27) shewed.

cause. — The question whether Encontre owed the defendant 50*l.* or not, depended on the question whether the defendant was entitled to charge two sums of 27*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* and 11*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.* If there was no pretence for charging those sums, the defendant was guilty of perjury. The affidavit was the commencement of proceedings, which the result of the arbitration shewed to be groundless. The award was, therefore, admissible. The objection taken is, that the parties to the civil action are not the same as those to the criminal proceeding, and that as it could not be used for the defendant, if made in his favour, it cannot now be used against him. It is true that in this case the award was made after the indictment was preferred, but the rule laid down in The King v. St. Pancras (1) nevertheless applies.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I admitted the evidence on the ground that the defendant having consented to the appointment of the arbitrator, the decision of that arbitrator was evidence as against him. If an admission made by him out of court would be admissible, is an admission in court less so?]

Sir F. Thesiger and T. Jones (Montagu Chambers with them), in support of the rule.—First, on the face of the indictment the award is inconsistent with the charge which is the foundation of the indictment. The indictment admits a debt of 15*l.*, while the award finds that there was no debt at all from Encontre to the defendant. But the evidence was inadmissible on principle. The question is put on the proper footing, by Parke, B., in Blakemore v. the Glamorgan-shire Canal Company (2), and the principle of mutuality regulates the admissibility of verdicts. The verdict in a criminal matter could not be evidence in a civil case—Brownsword v. Edwards (3), Gibson v. M'Carty (4), Jones v. White (5): if so, a verdict for the defendant in the civil action would have been no evidence against the plaintiff in a criminal proceeding.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Suppose the defendant had said "go to my clerk, and he will tell you the true state of the account," would not he have been bound by the statement of the clerk?]

The clerk would then be the agent; the arbitrator is not an agent for either party. He is placed by the order of the Court in the place of the jury. The arbitrator decides the case; he makes no declaration; he was not the agent for the defendant, for the purpose of confessing that he had made a false statement; but he disposes of the cause. If the award is to be treated as a verdict, which it must be, then it is also res inter alios acta.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I have some difficulty in treating it as res inter alios, the parties being in effect the same (6)].

The parties are not the same as regards the rules of evidence. The admission of the prosecutor is not receivable; and the question is decided more by the preponderance of the evidence in criminal cases than in civil. If in a civil action a prosecutor cannot be allowed to put in evidence a conviction which has been obtained on his own testimony, the converse of the rule must also hold—Gilb. Evid. 28, Stark. Evid. 261, 262, 3rd edit., Phill. Evid. 9th edit. 23, 25, The King v. the Warden of the Fleet (7).

Cur. ado. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now (May 10,) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This was an indictment for perjury, in an affidavit to found an application for a capias, alleging that the defendant in that suit, the prosecutor of this indictment, was indebted to him in the sum of 50*l.* In order to prove the falsehood of that allegation, an award was put in evidence at the trial. After the indictment was found, the cause between the parties came on at the assizes, and was then referred to the arbitration of a barrister, who decided in favour of the defendant, that he owed nothing to the plaintiff. His award is the document objected to, but admitted. On a motion for a new trial on this ground, we are of opinion that it was improperly received, not because the untruth of the statement was necessarily inconsistent with the defendant believing it to be true, for his knowledge of its falsehood would require to be proved by other evidence, but because the decision of the arbitrator in respect of that fact, is no more than a declaration of his opinion, and there is no instance of such a declaration of opinion being received as evidence of a fact against the party to be affected by the proof of it in any criminal case.

Error from the Court of Queen's Bench.

Case against the defendants below, who were sheriffs of Middlesex, for negligence in not arresting one A. Bacon under a writ of ca. sa., issued at the suit of the plaintiffs below.

The declaration alleged that the said A. Bacon, at the time of the delivery of the writ to the defendants below, and from thence for a long space of time, to wit, &c. was within the said sheriffs' bailiwick, and the defendants during that period (the same being then a reasonable and necessary time in that behalf) might have taken and arrested the said A. Bacon, and for a reasonable time after his discharge from his said imprisonment, were unable, and could not and did not take, arrest, or detain the said A. Bacon under the said writ of the plaintiffs, but were obliged to suffer and permit the said A. Bacon to depart from their custody, and the said A. Pleas—(inter alia) not guilty, and that the defendants could not nor might have taken or arrested the said A. Bacon modo et formâ. Issues thereon.

At the trial, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the Sittings at Westminster, after Trinity term, 1845, it was proved that a writ of ca. sa. at the suit of the plaintiffs below against Bacon was delivered to the defendants below, they being the sheriffs of the county of Middlesex. It further appeared that a parchment was brought to the defendants' office, purporting to be a writ issued out of the Court of Exchequer at the suit of one Arundel against the said A. Bacon indorsed for bail; that the defendants granted a warrant on such parchment to John Swan, an officer, and the attorney's clerk who brought such parchment informed Swan where Bacon was to be found, and Bacon was arrested on such warrant, the officer having at that time no other warrant in his possession, and he detained Bacon in custody until discharged by the order of Mr. Justice Coltman. It was further proved that the said parchment was not signed or marked in the manner required on writs issued from the Court of Exchequer; that no præcipe had been filed for such writ in the proper office, and that, in truth, it was no writ at all. Mr. Justice Coltman made an order for the discharge of Bacon at the suit of Arundel, and after the making of that order the defendants detained Bacon under the plaintiffs' writ until Mr. Justice Coltman made a second order for the discharge of Bacon at the suit of the plaintiffs. It was likewise proved that Bacon had, on his discharge, left the country. The Lord Chief Justice, on that evidence, directed the jury that there had been no arrest at the plaintiff's suit; that the order of Mr. Justice Coltman was no justification to the sheriff; that if the jury believed the evidence which had been given, the defendants were liable to an action for negligence and laches in point of law, and that the jury ought to find a verdict for the plaintiffs; and added that, if the jury believed, from the evidence, that the defendants had been guilty of such negligence, the only question was the amount of damages in the cause. On this direction, the defendants' counsel tendered a bill of exceptions, and insisted that the learned Judge ought not to have stated to the jury that if they believed the evidence they should find a verdict for the plaintiffs; and further insisted that the defendants had not been guilty of any negligence in having proceeded with the said pretended writ at the suit of Arundel, instead of the plaintiffs. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs on both of the above issues, with $251. damages.

Judgment having been accordingly signed, a writ of error was brought upon the record, and was (Dec. 3, 1846) argued by

Kennedy, for the plaintiffs in error.—The learned Judge was wrong in directing the jury to find for the plaintiffs below. There was an arrest under the plaintiff's writ, as it was in the sheriff's office when the arrest under Arundel's writ took place. It makes no difference that the writ under which the officer professed to act was bad, for he may justify under any other good writ in the office at the time—Dr. Grenville v. the College of Physicians (1), Crouther v. Ramsbottom (2), Lucas v. Nockells (3), Oakes v. Wood (4). If Bacon had sued the sheriff in trespass, he would be justified by the plaintiff's writ, and the officer acting under the warrant is entitled to the same protection as the sheriff himself.

[PARKE, B.—The officer stands in the same position as the sheriff for the purpose of executing the writ. You cannot carry it further than that.]

If this is not an arrest by the sheriff, cadit questio. But a known officer of the law, like a bound bailiff, need not shew his warrant when he arrests—Dalton's Sheriff, c. 22. p. 110. The case is different of a special bailiff.

[MAULE, J.—Is not this a special bailiff, as he is appointed only pro hac vice, though, in fact, the sheriff always appoints the same person?]

There is no evidence that Bacon ever required production of the warrant. The cases where an arrest under one bad writ has not enured as an arrest under another good one, turn on there being collusion, which is not set up here—Hodges v. Marks (5), The Countess of Rutland's case (6), Mackelley's case (7), Hall v. Roche (8), Robinson v. Fevens (9). In Ex parte Cogg (10), the point that the sheriff might justify under any writ in his office was not made.

[MAULE, J.—If that argument is carried to its full length, a person arrested illegally out of the sheriff's bailiwick may be said to be arrested as soon as he comes within it if there is another writ in his office.]

Reynolds v. Newton (11) supports the proposition that unless there be misconduct by the sheriff an illegal arrest enures as a good arrest under other writs. Next, the order of Coltman, J. was a justification to the sheriff. If it was wrong, the arrest remained good; if it was right, it gives the sheriff a defence—Dalton's Sheriff, c. 21. p. 106. Lastly, there was no negligence in the sheriff in not arresting on the writ at the suit of Lane: it should have been proved that the sheriff had an opportunity of arresting under Lane's writ, or had notice of Bacon being in the country.

[PARKE, B.—The allegation of notice is not traversable. The sheriff is guilty of negligence if, by taking proper means, he could have arrested.]

In The Dean of Hereford v. Macknamara (12) it was held there must be knowledge or means of knowledge by the sheriff: the mere fact of the party being within the bailiwick is not enough. Here there is no evidence of any knowledge by the sheriff. The utmost is that the officer knew where Bacon was just before he took him. It is not every constructive notice that will fix the sheriff—Gibbon v. Coggon (13), Drake v. Sykes (14). The proper question for the jury was, whether, independently of the writ at the suit of Arundel, the sheriff had any notice that Bacon was in his bailiwick.

Watson, for the defendants in error.—The question is, whether by using reasonable diligence, the sheriff might have arrested under Lane's writ, and notice to the officer, who is the sheriff's agent, that Bacon resided in the bailiwick is evidence against the principal. The sheriff ought to have seen, by merely looking at Arundel's writ, that it was mere waste paper, as the defect was a patent one.

[MAULE, J.—I do not see that any such question was put to the jury.]

The subsequent question as to the damages, leaves it in effect to the jury. Next, there never was a good arrest under Lane's writ; the only authority possessed by the bailiff was wholly void—Barratt v. Price (15). The cases cited on the other side were cases where the sheriff had adopted the unauthorized act of his bailiff, and, therefore, the question of collusion arose.

[MAULE, J.—How do you get rid of the principle laid down in Crowder v. Ramsbottom ?]

That would have applied if the bailiff himself had held a good as well as a bad warrant, or had professed to arrest under all writs then in the office, for in such case only could the sheriff's ratification make good his act (16). The true rule is laid down in Barratt v. Price and Robinson v. Yewens, that if the first arrest is illegal, detainers do not attach.

[PARKE, B. — The difficulty is to say that the party is not in custody of the sheriff, though the arrest may be under an illegal writ.]

[ROLFE, B.—Suppose, after the sheriff had the party in custody under Arundel's writ, Lane brought an action of escape, could the sheriff say the arrest was illegal?]

That would be setting up his own wrong.

[WILDE, C.J.—When the sheriff gave notice to the officer of the other writ in the office, did not Bacon then become in his custody under that writ?]

Where the arrest amounts to actual false imprisonment, it is impossible to say the party is in custody at all. The arrest by the officer, who was only acting under a limited authority, is not equivalent to an arrest by the sheriff himself. The illegality of the former arrest prevented all other writs from attaching—Pearson v. Yewens (17), Collins v. Yewens (18). Then the decision of Coltman, J. was decisive.

Kennedy was heard in reply.

The judgment of the Court (19) was now delivered by—

WILDE, C.J.—This was an action on the case against the sheriffs of Middlesex, by the plaintiffs, who complained of an alleged breach of duty in not arresting one Anthony Bacon, on a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, at the suit of the plaintiffs, indorsed to levy the sum of 325*l.* At the trial, before Lord Denman, a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, damages 325*l.*, and a bill of exceptions having been tendered on the part of the defendants to the ruling of the learned Judge, the case now comes before the Court on a writ of error.—[The Lord Chief Justice stated the pleadings and substance of the bill of exceptions as before set out, and proceeded:—]The question before the Court arises on the second breach assigned in the declaration, and is, whether Lord Denman's ruling in the respect before mentioned was correct in point of law; and we are of opinion that that direction was correct in point of law in respect to there having been no arrest on the plaintiff's writ, and that the order of Mr. Justice Coltman was no justification for the defendant in the present action; but we are of opinion that it was a question of fact for the jury, whether the defendants had or had not been guilty of negligence in having arrested Bacon on the supposed writ at the suit of Arundel, instead of on the plaintiffs' writ; and we think the direction of the learned Judge to the jury, if they believed the evidence that the defendant had been guilty of negligence in point of law, was erroneous, and that it was a proper question of fact to be submitted to the jury; and as the question was not submitted, there must be a venire de novo.

The ruling of Lord Denman, that the arrest of Bacon on the supposed writ at the suit of Arundel was no arrest at the suit of the plaintiffs, was consistent with all the established authorities in the books, particularly the case of Barratt v. Price, followed by the cases of Collins v. Yewens, and Barry v. Newton. The rule will be found very distinctly laid down by Lord Coke, in The Countess of Rutland's case. He says, "But the truth of the case of the Countess of Rutland was, that the serjeants who had the sheriff's warrant to arrest the said Countess on the said capias ad satisfaciendum, being fearful that she would be rescued by her servants and friends, and so escape, for which the sheriffs (if she should be arrested on the capias ad satisfaciendum and escape) would be charged, the serjeants-at-mace advised the said S. to enter a feigned action of 1,000*l.* before the sheriffs in London, according to their custom, upon which they would first arrest the said Countess, and by force thereof carry her to the Compter, and then take her body in execution on the capias ad satisfaciendum. And afterwards the said serjeants in Cheap-side, with many others, came to the Countess in her coach, and shewed her their mace, and touching her body with it, said to her, 'We arrest you, madam, at the suit of the said S,' which were all the words they used; and thereupon they compelled the coachman to carry the said Countess to the Compter, in Wood Street, and at the door thereof the sheriff came and carried the Countess to his house, where she remained seven or eight days, till she paid the debt. And it was resolved, that the sheriff, or any other by his authority, who makes an arrest of the person of another, ought on the arrest to shew at whose suit it is; out of what court, for what cause he makes it, and when the process is returnable, to the intent that if it be for any execution he might pay it, and free his body (if he will) from imprisonment; and if it be on meane process, either to agree with the party or to put in bail according to law, and to know when he should appear. And therefore it was resolved, that the said general arrest cannot be said by force of the said writ of execution; and that the said arrest of the Countess by the serjeants-at-mace of their own heads without other warrant, is against law, and the said countess was falsely imprisoned." Assuming, then, the law, as laid down by Lord Denman, to be correct, that the defendant in the original cause was not in lawful custody on the writ at the suit of the plaintiff below, by reason of the wrongful act of the sheriff in arresting him on the supposed writ, or rather no writ at all, the plaintiff's case against the sheriff was, that he was guilty, in fact, of a breach of duty towards him, by causing the defendant (Bacon) to be arrested, on the supposed writ, whereby he was disabled from holding him in custody on the valid writ then in his possession, and the defendant was, therefore, discharged, and escaped from their bailiwick, so that he could no longer be arrested thereon. But, in order to make out that case, it was not enough to shew that the said supposed writ was void; he must shew that the defendants were guilty of a culpable neglect of duty and a breach of duty towards the plaintiff in acting upon it, since he must shew the defendants knew, or could, with reasonable care, have discovered, it to be void. The writ, no doubt, being void, would be no defence to the sheriff in an action of trespass by a person arrested thereon, whether the sheriff knew it to be void or not, or could have discovered its defect with ordinary care, because the sheriff in depriving a man of his liberty acts at his peril. If he authorize one who assumes to act upon a writ that is invalid, he is responsible to the party injured; but whether he be guilty of a breach of duty towards the party employing him to execute another writ is quite another and different question. He only engages to use proper care, and not wilfully and carelessly to do any act to prevent the arrest; and if without any default of the sheriff the party is not arrested, the sheriff is not liable. If at the time the sheriff had the plaintiff's writ delivered to him, he had several valid writs in his hand, the sheriff would without doubt perform his duty towards the plaintiff if he arrested on either of those valid writs: it would be an arrest in point of law on all, and he could not be bound to put the plaintiffs in all the writs to the expense of executing each. Now, if instead of executing a valid writ, he executed one which he had every reason to suppose was valid; as, for instance, if there was perjury, which by the exercise of skill and caution could not be discovered, he would not be guilty of any misconduct towards the plaintiff. The fact of the writ being really invalid could not be enough to charge the sheriff as against the plaintiff, who gives no guarantee that the writ he executes should be valid; but only undertakes to use due and reasonable care; and it is a question in every case when he chooses to act on it, whether he has used due care in acting on it—whether he knew or ought to have known, by the use of reasonable care, of the defect.

The second branch of the declaration is framed upon the supposition that the defendant was guilty of a breach of duty towards the plaintiff in arresting Bacon upon the pretence of a writ, when in truth there was no such writ, and so causing the discharge and departure of Bacon. If the breach is well assigned upon the supposition that it purports to charge negligence and want of care on the part of the sheriff in arresting the defendant on the supposed writ, and thus employed the word "wrongful," in that view the defendant's liability can only be established by evidence that, in arresting on the pretence of the alleged writ, he was guilty of negligence; and, if so, the summing up is incorrect for the reasons before mentioned, that it omits to leave the important question to the jury, whether the sheriff did know or ought to have known that the parchment delivered to him, on which he arrested Bacon, was, in fact, no writ at all; and, therefore, we are of opinion, there must be a venire de novo. If any doubt arises whether the second breach is well assigned or not, if the plaintiff obtains a verdict upon a second trial, it will be proper to consider if the damage should not be assessed separately upon each.

1848. { JACOBS v. TARLETON.

Trial—Evidence, in reply—Course of Proof—Bill of Exchange—Indorsement.

*In an action by the indorsee of a bill of exchange and an issue raised on a plea denying the indorsement, the plaintiff rested his case, in the first instance, on proof of the handwriting of the indorser. The defendant then gave evidence that the plaintiff was too poor to have discounted the bill, or to have had it indorsed to him, and that he had disclaimed having done so, or having anything to do with the bill:—Held, that the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to give evidence in reply, for the purpose of shewing the plaintiff's ability to discount the bill, and that, in fact, he had discounted it, as such evidence was merely confirmatory of the plaintiff's prima facie case, and not in contradiction of the defendant's witnesses.*

This was an action on a bill of exchange, drawn by Gadderer, and accepted by the defendant, and by Gadderer indorsed to the plaintiff. Third plea, that Gadderer did not indorse to the plaintiff; and issue thereon. There were also pleas of fraud and covin, and that the bill came to the plaintiff's hands without consideration.

At the trial, before Parke, B., at the Summer assizes for Surrey, 1847, the plaintiff, in support of the issue raised by the third plea, proved the handwriting of Gadderer, and rested his case on that evidence. The defendant then called witnesses, who stated that the plaintiff was too poor to have discounted the bill, or to have had it indorsed to him, and that he had disclaimed having done so, or having anything to do with the bill. The plaintiff then called, in reply, a witness named Lawrence Levi, for the purpose of proving that the plaintiff had the means of discounting the bill, and had in fact discounted it for Gadderer. This evidence was objected to, and rejected by the learned Judge; and the jury returned a verdict for the defendant on the issue raised on the third plea, and for the plaintiff on the other issues. A rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that the evidence of Levi had been improperly rejected, and also on affidavits, having been obtained,—

Sir F. Thesiger, Shee, Serj., and Ogle shewed cause (Jan. 29.)—The learned Judge was quite correct in refusing to allow the plaintiff to patch up the insufficient case which he had proved in the first instance, by giving evidence in reply, which he might have introduced in the course of his case. A plaintiff may, in some instances, wait till the defendant has proved his case, and then call evidence in reply to that case; but he cannot rely upon a prima facie case in the first instance, and then be allowed to prove the rest of the issue in reply. [The argument as to the affidavits is omitted.]

Montagu Chambers and Petersdorff, in support of the rule.—On a plea, denying the indorsement, it is sufficient for the plaintiff to prove the handwriting of the indorser. If the defendant gives evidence to shew that there was no indorsing mind, that is a new case started on the plaintiff, which he may rebut by evidence in reply.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The rule is, that a plaintiff cannot divide the evidence applicable to one issue into two parts; he must give all his evidence at once.]

The rule is not imperative or universal, but is merely a rule of convenience; and the practice at Nisi Prius in actions on bills of exchange by the indorsee, and a denial of the indorsement, shews that it has never been understood to apply to such cases. If the argument on the other side be correct, the plaintiff must always, under such an issue, not only be prepared with evidence to meet any possible case that may be set up by the defendant, but must adduce that evidence in the first instance.

[COLERIDGE, J.—Your only contest is, whether you are obliged to do this at one stage of the case or at another; you must be equally prepared with the evidence.]

[WIGHTMAN, J.—I find my Brother Parke's report to be, that he thought the plaintiff having made out a prima facie case of indorsement was bound to stand on that case. The defendant's evidence did not set up a new case, but only answered the plaintiff's prima facie case.]

That case might be answered in several ways; and the question is, whether the plaintiff was bound by anticipation to meet all possible answers. Rees v. Smith (1) is the case usually cited as to splitting evidence; and there Lord Ellenborough, C.J. says, "If indeed any one fact be adduced by the defendant to which an answer can be given, the plaintiff must have an opportunity given for so doing; but this must be understood of a specific fact; he cannot go into general evidence in reply to the defendant's case." So here the specific fact, that the plaintiff was not in a condition to discount the bill, was one which the plaintiff might contradict by evidence in reply. In Brown v. Murray (2), it was decided that if the plaintiff had given any evidence in the outset to repel the defence, he should not be permitted to give further evidence in reply, as such a course would be inconvenient to the due administration of justice; but in Williams v. Davies (3), an action of assumpsit upon several bills of exchange, to which the defendant pleaded a set-off, the plaintiff was allowed to divide his evidence, by proving in the first instance a small demand, and upon the defendant proving a set-off, to give further evidence of a larger amount due. Lord Lyndhurst, in that case, in adverting to the inconvenience of disallowing such proof, observed, that the "consequences would be that the plaintiff might have to go into many years' transactions, when it would be quite unnecessary he should do so."

[COLERIDGE, J.—That comes within the general rule where the plaintiff has set up a complete case, and the defendant sets up another totally new one: there the plaintiff gives the evidence in answer to the defendant's case, and not as part of his own.]

Suppose the consideration for a bill is not impeached on the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, he is surely at liberty to give evidence in reply to a specific case of want of consideration set up by the defendant. Marston v. Allen (4), cited at the trial, shews the meaning of the issue on the indorsement; but that case did not at all turn on the course of proof. Had it done so, can there be any doubt of the justice of allowing the plaintiff in reply to have contradicted the evidence of the defendant leading to the conclusion that the bill was not duly transferred by the indorsement? In Hayes v. Caulfield (5) Lord Denman lays it down that the only effect that a plea denying the indorsement can have is to call in question the handwriting of the indorser. The object of the New Rules was to oblige a defendant to disclose his case by his plea, and that object will be frustrated if the defendant be allowed to give evidence tending to shew that an indorsement to the plaintiff was improbable, and the plaintiff is to be precluded from rebutting that evidence by calling witnesses in reply. The consequence will be to compel the indorsee, where the indorsement is in issue, to prove in the outset not only the handwriting of the indorser, but the circumstances under which the bill was indorsed; thus, incidentally, requiring him to prove the consideration before it is impeached, and to negative fraud.

LORD DENMAN, C.J., subsequently, in this term, delivered the judgment of the Court.—The question in this case was, whether the learned Judge was right in refusing to allow a witness of the name of Lawrence Levi to be called by the plaintiff in reply, upon the trial of the issue, whether a bill of exchange had been indorsed to him, the plaintiff, or not. The issue was single, and the onus of proof was upon the plaintiff. He might either rely upon a prima facie case, or go into all the evidence he had to confirm the prima facie case; but we think that he was not entitled to rely in the first instance upon a prima facie case upon that issue, and afterwards, when that prima facie case was called in question by the defendant, to call other evidence to confirm his prima facie case. It was not proposed to call Levi to contradict any statement made by the defendant's witnesses, but to add a fact tending to confirm the plaintiff's prima facie case. This, we think, he was not entitled to do, if objected to, and that the learned Judge was right in refusing to allow him to call the witness.

1848. } DAVISON v. WILSON AND AN-
May 5. } OTHER.

Trespass—Forcible Entry—Pleading—Aggravation.

The declaration alleged that the defendant, with force and arms, &c., and with a strong hand, and against the form of the statute, broke and entered the dwelling-house of the plaintiff, and broke open doors, windows, &c., and in a forcible manner and with a strong hand disseised and expelled the plaintiff. The defendant pleaded as to the breaking and entering, &c. that the dwelling-house, &c. was his soil and freehold:—Held, that the defendant might confine his justification to the breaking and entering, and that the plea was good; the circumstance of entering manu forti being matter of aggravation, which the defendants were not necessarily called on to justify in a civil action.

Trespass, for that the defendants, on &c., with force and arms, and with a strong hand, and against the form of the statute in such case, &c., broke and entered a certain dwelling-house, messuage, and cottage of the plaintiff, then being in the actual occupation and possession of the plaintiff, and situate, &c., and made a great noise and disturbance, &c. for a long time, &c., and then in a forcible manner and with a strong hand forced, broke open, &c. the doors and windows, &c.; and also then, with force and arms, &c. assaulted the plaintiff, and beat, bruised, wounded, and ill-treated him, and pulled, pushed, and dragged him out of his said dwelling-house, and in a forcible manner and with a strong hand put out, disseised, dispossessed, and expelled the plaintiff therefrom, for a long space of time, to wit, &c.

Pleas—first, not guilty; second, as to the breaking and entering, and making a noise, &c., and continuing, &c., and breaking the doors, &c., that the said dwelling-house in which, &c., and the said doors, &c. were not, nor was any or either of them, at the said time when, &c., the plaintiff's; third, as to the trespasses in the introductory part of the preceding plea mentioned, that the said messuage and dwelling-house was and is now the dwelling-house, messuage, and cottage, soil and freehold of the defendant Richard Wilson, wherefore the said R. Wilson, in his own right, and the other defendants as the servants and at the command of the said R. Wilson, at the said time when, &c., broke and entered the said dwelling-house and messuage, and committed the said supposed trespasses, as they lawfully might, for the cause aforesaid. Verification. ♦

Demurrer to the last plea, assigning for causes, that it appears by the declaration that the said last-mentioned trespasses were committed by the defendants under circumstances which, in point of law, amounted to a forcible entry within the meaning of the statutes relating to forcible entries, and, consequently, a plea of liberum tenementum affords no answer to the said trespasses. Joinder in demurrer.

The plaintiff's points were, that a freeholder cannot legally take possession of his freehold dwelling-house in a manner which amounts in law to a forcible entry, whilst such dwelling-house is in the actual occupation and possession of a third party.

The defendants' points were, that the plea answers all which it professes to answer. That the defendants are entitled to select from the declaration those parts which they profess to answer; but if they are not, then that the declaration is bad as not bringing the plaintiff's case within any of the Statutes of Forcible Entry, as it does not shew that the plaintiff had a freehold, which is required by statute 8 Hen. 6. c. 9, or that the defendants had no right of entry—statute 5 Rich. 2. c. 8. That a forcible entry when the defendant has a right to enter is matter for indictment, but does not entitle the plaintiff to damages for a trespass to what is not his. That the word "disseised" is in a separate sentence from and not connected with the words "against the form of the statute," and is only introduced as aggravation of the assault.

Hunter, in support of the demurrer.—The plea of lib. ten. is no answer—Newton v. Harland (1).

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The plea does not profess to justify the indictable part of the trespass.]

If it is necessary to reply or new assign, the Court will allow the plaintiff to amend. But the plea is ill for omitting to justify the substantial trespass and injury to the plaintiff—Harvey v. Bridges (2), Hillary v. Gay (3), Turner v. Meymott (4).

[PATTESON, J.—In Turner v. Meymott Dallas, C.J. expressly remarks, that if the defendant had used force he might be indicted for the forcible entry.]

The declaration charges a trespass of a serious character; the plea justifies only a part. Besides, it would be very hard that any party—a leaseholder, for instance—should be called upon to shew his title when it is admitted that his possession has been intruded upon with violence. Trespass is maintainable whenever a party enters on the possession of another manu forti, though he have a good title—Doe d. Stephens v. Lord (5), Anthony v. Hancy (6).

Cowling, contra.—The plea is good even if the defendants are taken as justifying the entry with a strong hand, but they do not. The defendants are only bound to justify so much as the plaintiff would be bound to prove in order to support his count. If the defendants had only pleaded the general issue, the allegation of strong hand, &c. would only be matter of aggravation. In Harvey v. Bridges Alderson, B. appears to have thought that the plaintiff should have replied that the defendants entered with a strong hand.

This is like the case of Fisherwood v. Cannon, referred to by Buller, J., in Taylor

v. Cole (7), where in trespass for taking goods of the plaintiff, it was held sufficient to justify the taking, the conversion being only aggravation; and Sir Ralph Bovy's case (8), also referred to in the same judgment of Buller J., where, to an action for a voluntary escape, the defendant pleaded that he took the prisoner on fresh pursuit, without traversing the voluntary escape; and on demurrer it was held sufficient. If the defendants acted in violation of the Statutes of Forcible Entry, they may be proceeded against criminally. It was formerly considered that the words vi et armis were very important—1 Saund. 81, n. 1, Com. Dig. 'Pleader' (3 M. 7), and (3 M. 8); and it was afterwards expressly traversed for the purpose of avoiding being fined and imprisoned; but in 1 Hawk. P.C. c. 28. s. 3, it is said, that "even at this day, in an action of forcible entry . . . if the defendant make himself a title which is found for him, he shall be dismissed without any inquiry concerning the force. For howsoever he may be punishable at the King's suit, for doing what is prohibited by statute, as a contemner of the laws and disturber of the peace, yet he shall not be liable to pay any damages for it to the plaintiff, whose injustice gave him the provocation in that manner to right himself." In Taylor v. Cole, Lord Kenyon says, "It is true that persons having only a right are not to assert that right by force; if any violence be used, it becomes the subject of a criminal prosecution; . . . and the question is, whether a person having a right of possession may not peaceably assert it, if he do not transgress the laws of his country. I think he may." This amounts to saying, that force makes no difference as to the civil remedy. The Statutes of Forcible Entry, 5 Rich. 2. c. 7, extended by 15 Rich. 2. c. 2, only enable the party injured to proceed criminally by fine and imprisonment. The statute 8 Hen. 6. c. 9. s. 6. first gave a civil remedy to the party aggrieved; but that only applies when the party so aggrieved has the freehold—Cole v. Eagle (9), Fits. Nat. Brev. 560, 8th edit. In Newton v. Harland, the question was, whether the defendants could treat the plaintiff's wife as a trespasser for holding over after the expiration of the term, and was in fact a question of personal trespass. If the declaration had been in trespass quare clausum fregit, the defendants would have been justified. In Perry v. Fitzhove (10), it is observed, by Wightman, J., in the course of the argument, that the words, "with a strong hand," will not make that a trespass which would not otherwise be so. The law laid down in that case is not disputed; and it is not contended, on the part of the defendants, that they would be justified in demolishing a house, even though the plaintiff was not in it, e. g. if he were temporarily absent. Hillary v. Gay is the only authority against the defendants. Doe d. Stephens v. Lord and Anthony v. Harvey are not in point. What would be evidence of an entry manu forti would be another question. If the defendants, in company with nine or ten more, entered the dwelling-house, it might be an entry manu forti, and indictable, though the door was open: but that would not affect the legal character of the civil trespass, so far as the justification was concerned.

Hunter, in reply.—It is not true that the defendants are not bound to answer the forcible entry—14 Hen. 6. fol. 26. pl. 53, 15 Hen. 7. fol. 17. pl. 7.

[PATTESON, J.—It is quite clear law that when the justification is found for the defendant, the vi et armis cannot be inquired into. See the authorities collected in Lowe v. King (11).]

But it cannot be open to the defendants to admit that they committed a criminal offence, which they do in this plea. The Statutes of Forcible Entry must be taken to be cumulative.

[PATTESON, J.—When a trespass is substantially justified, it is not necessary to justify a conversion laid in the declaration.]

Cole v. Eagle only turned on the question of costs. The facts stated in this declaration make the trespass of a character different from that which is justified by the plea.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—We thought at first that as to the matters of aggravation, the plaintiff might not have been able to give evidence on not guilty as it stands; but the question really before us is as to the goodness of the plea. It appears to me that the words "manu forti," &c. are merely matter of aggravation, and on the authorities to which we have been referred, I think the defendants have shewn enough to justify. In Perry v. Fitzhove all the circumstances appeared in detail on the declaration, and we held that under the circumstances of that case the law would not justify: here, the breaking and entering alone is justified, and the case falls within the principle of Taylor v. Cole. The plaintiff may take at the trial any points which he may think open to him on the present state of the record.

(10) 15 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 239.

(11) 1 Saund. 81, a.

PATTESON, J.—The entry in a forcible manner is merely a circumstance of aggravation. I do not understand Mr. Cowling to contend, nor could he successfully do so, that if a declaration consisted of two parts it would be enough to justify one part only; but this is put like the case of the conversion in trespass, and the plaintiff would not be bound to prove it in order to maintain the action; and it is sufficient for the defendants to answer all that the plaintiff is bound to prove. How far the charge of acting manu forti may be entered into under the general issue I am not prepared to say.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the entering manu forti could be made a distinct ground of action, the question would have been different; but this is an action of trespass, with a further allegation of entering manu forti. That is a circumstance attending the trespass and an aggravation. The plea is sufficient if it justifies the gist of the trespass; and if the plaintiff intended to rely on a greater amount of force being employed than the law would allow, he should have replied it. I was struck with the passage referred to by Mr. Cowling from Hawk. P.C., which is indeed quite in accordance with the other authorities. This is not an action on the Statutes of Forcible Entry, and I think the plea good for the reasons which have been given.

ERLE, J.—It seems to me that this being merely an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, and the defendants having so treated it, the plea is good.

1848. { DOE d. THE EARL OF SHREWS-
May 11. { BURY AND J. H. ALLEN v.
T. KEELING THE YOUNGER.

Evidence—Private Writings; Production of—Custody.

The agent of the lessor of the plaintiff not being in the assize town when a deed was required material to the proof of his title, his carpet bag, which was identified, was cut open in court, and the deed produced from it by the attorney for the lessor of the plaintiff, who also identified the deed:—Held, that there was sufficient prima facie evidence of proper custody.

Ejectment for lands in Staffordshire.

At the trial, before Patteson, J., at the Spring Assizes for that county, it appeared that one of the lessors of the plaintiff claimed as reversioner on the expiration of a lease for ninety-nine years on three lives, granted by his father the late Earl of Shrewsbury. The last of the lives dropped in 1845. The defendant and his father had been in possession more than forty years.

It being necessary to produce the lease, Ward, Lord Shrewsbury's agent, in whose custody it was supposed to be, was called; but was not forthcoming when wanted. He had been at Stafford the previous evening, and had brought with him a carpet bag in which the lease as well as other documents connected with the property were. This carpet bag being at the inn at which Ward put up, was sent for and brought into court, and Cattlow, the attorney for the lessors of the plaintiff, cut the bag open in court. Cattlow was then put into the witness box, and stated that he had expected Ward to be in court, but that he produced the lease from Ward's carpet bag, and identified it as being the lease he had seen in 1846 in Ward's possession, after the death of the last of the lives. There was also an assignment of the lease which was made from Keeling to Allen, one of the lessors of the plaintiff, which was also produced from the carpet bag; and as to which Cattlow made the same statement, but did not know the handwriting of Keeling.

On behalf of the defendant, it was objected, that neither of the documents was receivable in evidence, as, Ward not being present, there was no one who could say whence he got them.

With respect to the assignment, Talfourd, Serj. submitted that the case of the plaintiff was strengthened, as Allen was in court, and might be considered as producing the document. Patteson, J. held that there was not sufficient proof that the deed came from the proper custody, and that he could not treat the possession of Cattlow as the possession of Allen. He therefore rejected the evidence, and the plaintiff was nonsuited.

In this term—

Talfourd, Serj. having obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that the deed ought to have been admitted in evidence,—

Whateley and Greaves shewed cause.—No explanation was given of Ward's absence, and there was nothing to shew where he got the documents. If Ward had been present it would have been necessary to have called him. It is in all cases necessary to shew that the party who produces muniments of title is entitled to the custody of them—Evans v. Rees (1). Nothing is known of these documents further than that they were taken out of a carpet bag belonging to Ward. It would be most dangerous to depart from the strict rule of evidence in such a case, as Ward might have kept out of the way purposely—Swinerton v. the Marquis of Stafford (2), Doe d. Neale v. Samples (3), Evans v. Rees, Doe d. Jacobs v. Phillips (4). There was nothing to shew occupation and payment of rent under the lease—Manby v. Curtis (5). In Randolph v. Gordon (6), which was a suit for tithes, a book produced from the custody of the defendant in the action, who was the grandson of a former rector, was held inadmissible without strict proof of the mode in which he became possessed of it.—Bertie v. Beaumont (7).

Talfourd, Serj. and Whitmore, contra.—It is important to see how the case stood when the production of the lease was required. It was admitted that the lives had dropped in, and the only question was whether the close in question was parcel of a larger piece of land. The lease would not have been conclusive, but it was necessary to produce it. As to the assignment, Allen was in court, and was surely competent to produce it as from his own custody.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The difficulty is, that we cannot say that any of these deeds came from Lord Shrewsbury's custody, unless there is some one to speak to the fact.]

[WIGHTMAN, J.—The evidence amounts to no more than if a witness had stated that Ward had given him the deeds.]

Was it necessary to call Ward at all? It is difficult to distinguish the case from that of Doe d. Jacobs v. Phillips. If the lease had not expired it might have been produced by any one on behalf of the lessee as a matter of course; and though it is essential to shew that an ancient instrument should be clearly shewn to come from the natural and legitimate repository—1 Stark. 383, The King v. Ryton (8), The King v. Netherthong (9), yet the agent is the same as an attorney for this purpose, and the counsel for the plaintiff might have produced it as Lord Shrewsbury's, out of the documents belonging to Lord Shrewsbury's attorney.

[PATTERSON, J.—I do not know that I should have rejected the assignment if Allen had produced it. If Ward had been there, could you have produced the document as from his custody, without putting him into the box?]

Yes; if Lord Shrewsbury had been in court, his counsel might have produced his title-deeds. Plaxton v. Dare (10) shews that expired leases produced by the lessor are evidence in questions of boundary.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This is a peculiar case: since it is for the Judge, sitting as it were in the place of a jury, to decide it as a question of fact; and we do not like to interfere in any way with his decision on the case presented to him, any more than we should like to interfere with the finding of a jury. I certainly think that in such a case a liberal construction of the rules of evidence ought to prevail; but the question is, whether, if we think the learned Judge was at the trial too strict, he was so far wrong that we ought to reverse his decision. In Rees v. Walters (11), Parke, B. observes, "I rather think it is for the Judge to say whether a document is produced from the proper custody or not, and we cannot interfere unless we think him wrong." In Doe d. Jacobs v. Phillips we acted on that principle, and set aside the decision of Parke, B., considering that he had improperly rejected a deed when there was reasonable evidence that it came from the proper custody. I think that my learned Brother should have admitted the evidence. The rule must, therefore, be absolute.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion.—Since the case of Plaxton v. Dare it must be considered that the custody of an expired lease is properly with the lessor, and therefore Lord Shrewsbury properly had the custody of this lease. But the question arises as to the custody of a person who was the agent of Lord Shrewsbury, as to the property in question. In The Bishop of Meath v. Lord Winchester (12), it is said, that "it is when documents are found in other than the usual place of deposit that the investigation commences whether it was reasonable and natural, under the circumstances in the particular case, to expect that they should have been in the place where they are actually found; and in those cases the proposition to be determined is, whether the actual custody is so reasonably and probably to be accounted for, that it impresses the mind with the conviction that instruments found in such custody must be genuine." Now, it appears to me that the custody in which this document was, was so probably the proper place of custody for it that it should be for the other side to impeach it.

PATTERSON, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think I construed the rule too strictly.

May 1. } NORRIS.

Baron and Feme—Conveyance by Husband of Reversion in Wife's Lands.

An issue, whether a husband conveyed to plaintiff the reversion, of which he and his wife were seised in right of the wife, to hold to the plaintiff during the coverture, is proved by an indenture, purporting to be made by husband and wife, but executed by him only, by which he professed to convey an estate during their joint lives.

Covenant on an indenture of demise by the plaintiffs, as assignees of the reversion. The declaration stated the demise by W. Wood, who devised the premises to Margaret, his wife, for her life, with remainder in fee to Mary Jane Davis, who married J. D. Rymer, and that thereupon the said J. D. Rymer and Mary Jane his wife, in right of the said Mary Jane, became seised in their demesne as of fee of the reversion of and in the demised premises; and that, by an indenture, dated May 13, 1844, the said J. D. Rymer released the said reversion of and in the demised premises to the plaintiffs, to hold to them and their heirs, during the coverture of the said Mary Jane, as wife of the said J. D. Rymer. Averment, that, at the time of committing the breaches of covenant, the said Mary Jane was, and still is, wife of the said J. D. Rymer.

Plea (inter alia), that the said J. D. Rymer did not release the said reversion modo et formâ. Issue thereon.

At the trial, before Williams, J., at the Somersetshire Spring Assizes, 1847, the indenture of the 13th of May 1844 was put in evidence, and appeared to be executed by the husband alone. The plaintiffs had a verdict, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict on the above issue if the Court should be of opinion that the conveyance by the husband alone did not pass the freehold during the joint lives of himself and his wife. A rule nisi having been accordingly obtained,—

Butt and Barstow shewed cause (Feb. 11).—The husband took an estate of freehold during the coverture, which he could convey to another—Co. Litt. 326, a, Com. Dig. tit. 'Covenant,' B, 3, citing Spencer's case

A right of entry vested in husband and wife in right of the wife passes to the assignees of the husband, upon his bankruptcy, and they may recover the freehold by writ of entry—Mitchell v. Hughes (2).

Crowder and Montague Smith, contra.—The husband has no separate estate in his wife's lands during coverture, but only a title to the rents and profits—2 Black. Comm. p. 433, Bac. Abridg. tit. 'Baron and Feme,' k, 1 Roll. Abridg. p. 350.

[PATTESON, J.—A husband can make a lease during the coverture.]

This is a conveyance of the reversion, so as to give the assignees the benefit of the covenants, which it is submitted the husband cannot do. The mode of pleading shews that the husband and wife, not the husband alone, are seised of lands in right of the wife—2 Chitt. Plead. p. 376.

The judgment of the Court (3) was now delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—A question arose in this case, as to the interest which a husband takes in lands which belong to his wife in fee simple, and as to his power to convey to another person an interest in those lands for the joint lives of himself and his wife. It is laid down in Co. Litt. 351, a, that he is entitled to the pernaney of the profits; and that if he be attainted that pernaney will pass to the Crown, the freehold still remaining in his wife. But it is also laid down in Co. Litt. 326, a, and in the notes, that he may make a tenant to the præcipe of his wife's land, and that he has an estate which he may convey to another. He has not, however, any greater interest than during the joint lives of himself and his wife. Now the second issue raised by the pleadings in this case, which was an action of covenant on a lease made by a person who had afterwards devised to the wife, was whether the husband did by indenture convey to the plaintiffs the reversion of which he and his wife were seised in right of the wife, to hold to the plaintiffs during the coverture of the wife with the husband. This he certainly did. The indenture professed to be made by him and his wife, but was not executed by her, and it passed no more than his interest. That was an estate during the joint lives of himself and his wife, which was all that he professed to convey by the terms of the deed. The rule to enter a verdict for the defendant on that issue must be discharged.

May 2, 13. } DOE d. MILLETT v. MILLETT.

Adverse Possession—Statute of Limitations—Presumption—Agreement for Partition—Recovery.

Three females being coparceners in tail, two of them suffered recoveries of their shares, but the third did not. They all married, and their husbands entered into an agreement for partition by deed of the lands held in coparcenery, but for nothing more. No such deed appeared to have been executed, but the lands had been held according to the agreement from its date. An action being brought by the heir in tail of the parcener who did not suffer a recovery within twenty years after her death, and before the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, to recover her share, which had been held by the husband of one of the other coparceners:—Held, that the possession was under the agreement, and not adverse.

Held, also, that nothing could be presumed, beyond what was contemplated by the agreement, which provided for a deed and not for a recovery.

Ejectment, to recover an undivided third part of lands in the parish of Tywardreath, in the county of Cornwall.

The cause was tried, before Patteson, J., at the Summer Assizes for that county, 1832, when a verdict passed for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court on a special CASE.

The lessor of the plaintiff made title under an estate tail created by the will of one T. Constable, bearing date the 20th of February 1718, by which he devised the premises in question, called Pennick, amongst others, to his nephew N. Trevorian for life, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail, remainder to his daughters in tail, remainder to W. Trevorian in tail, with the ultimate remainder to T. Constable the younger, in fee. T. Constable, the testator, died seised in fee, on the 20th of April 1719, without altering his said will, and his nephew, the said N. Trevorian, entered and took possession of the premises comprised in the will. The said W. Trevorian died on the 4th day of May in the year 1741, (and in the lifetime of the said N. Trevorian,) leaving three daughters, Mary, Dorcas and Elizabeth. The said Mary Trevorian, on the 29th of January, in the year 1746, married William Millett; and, on the 26th of July 1746, the said N. Trevorian, the tenant for life, died unmarried, and without issue, and the said W. Millett and Mary his wife, the said Dorcas Trevorian, and the said Elizabeth Trevorian entered, and took possession of the said premises. In Easter term, in the 21st year of the reign of George the Second, in the year 1748, a common recovery was duly suffered by the said W. Millett and Mary his wife and the said Dorcas Trevorian of their two undivided third parts of the said premises which was declared to enure, as to one undivided third part, to the use of the said W. Millett for life, remainder to the said Mary his wife for life, remainder to the use of the heirs and assigns of the survivor of them; and as to the other undivided third part to the said Dorcas Trevorian in fee. On the 15th of December, in the year 1748, the said Dorcas Trevorian married J. Millett, and on the 23rd of March 1759, the said Elizabeth Trevorian married Thomas Millett. On the 21st of June, in the same year, the said W. Millett, J. Millett, and T. Millett entered into an agreement for the division of Tresaire and Pennick, two of the estates comprised in the will of the said T. Constable, and for the recovery of the latter of which this action was brought, and some other estates referred to in the agreement, which is as follows:—“Memorandum, taken this 21st of June 1759, for drawing a deed of partition between W. Millett, of &c., and J. Millett, of &c., and T. Millett, of &c., of certain messuages, lands, and tenements hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, all that tenement [describing the parcels, including the premises in question] all which said tenements are divided or intended to be divided in such manner as is here set forth, that is to say, he the said W. Millett doth agree to take the aforesaid tenement, called Tresaire, for his share in the sum or consideration of 430*l.*; likewise he the said J. Millett doth hereby consent and agree to take the aforesaid tenement, called Little Pennick, in the sum or consideration of 430*l.*, likewise the tenement, called South Legaun, in the sum of 110*l.*, for his share; he the said T. Millett doth likewise consent and agree to take the aforesaid tenement, called Collurian, in the sum of 260*l.*, and the aforesaid part, which is held by lease, as aforesaid, of the said tenement of Collurian, in the sum of 80*l.*, likewise the aforesaid tenement, called Truthal, in the sum of 80*l.*, with the aforesaid field, which he takes in the sum of 70*l.*; and it is hereby further agreed, by and between the said parties, that the money so arising from the estates, by means of this division, shall be shared, share and share alike, with all tin and tin bounds that shall now be, between the parties to these presents; and further it is hereby declared and agreed, and the true intent and meaning of these presents is, that every clause, sentence, and thing herein contained shall be and enure till the said deed or indenture of partition be drawn, signed, sealed, and delivered by the said parties hereto."

This agreement was duly executed by the said William Millett, John Millett, and Thomas Millett, and in pursuance of it they respectively entered and occupied the estates which they agreed to take under it, and such occupation has been continued by them and those who claim under them as to the freehold parts to this present time, and as to such parts as were leasehold until the terms expired. The said T. Millett died on the 8th of December 1798, having first duly made and published his last will and testament, dated the 21st of July 1798, which so far as it is material to the question before the Court is as follows:—

"I give, devise, and bequeath unto my son Thomas Millett, and his heirs and assigns for ever, from and immediately after my decease, all that one field of land in Marazion, in the county of Cornwall, commonly called or known by the name of Venton Hall; and also I give, devise, and bequeath unto my said son Thomas Millett from and immediately after my decease, all that my dwelling-house and garden in the parish of Ludgvan, in the said county of Cornwall, commonly called or known by the name of Gilley House; and also I give and bequeath unto my said son Thomas Millett and his heirs and assigns for ever, from and immediately after my decease, all that my dwelling-house situate at White Cross, in the said parish of Ludgvan, now in the possession of one J. Nicholls; and also I give, devise, and bequeath unto my said son Thomas Millett, after the death of my wife Elizabeth Millett, all that my estate in the said parish of Ludgvan, both freehold and leasehold, commonly called or known by the name of Collurian, the freehold part to him and to his heirs and assigns for ever, and the leasehold part for and during the term which shall be then to come and expire therein; but my will and meaning further is, that from and immediately after my death, and during the lifetime of my said wife Elizabeth Millett, the rent and profits of my said estate of Collurian shall be equally divided, share and share alike between my said wife and my said son T. Millett."

After the death of the said T. Millett, the testator, the said T. Millett, who was the eldest son of the testator, and the said Elizabeth received the rents of the field in Marazion, and continued to receive the same up to the time of his death in 1802; and the said E. Millett and the said T. Millett, the son, received the rents of Collurian in the shares bequeathed to them by the will of the said T. Millett, the father, up to the time of his said death.

In the year 1802 the said T. Millett, the son, died, leaving T. T. Millett, the lessor of the plaintiff, his eldest son and heir-at-law. The said Elizabeth Millett, the widow of the said T. Millett, the father, died on the 15th of May 1818, having been in the receipt of the rents devised to her by the will of the said T. Millett, the father, in which were comprised the rents of the premises taken by the said T. Millett, under the partition made in 1759, up to the time of her death, leaving the said T. T. Millett, the lessor of the plaintiff, her heir-at-law.

The following letter from the defendant to the said T. T. Millett, the lessor of the plaintiff, who was then stationed in the Preventive Service at Foundless Island, formed part of the evidence at the trial :—

"London, January 22, 1830.—My dear sir,—Since my return from Foundless Island I have found that it is necessary that your wife should be a party to the deed I mentioned to you as well as yourself, and it will save me much expense and hasten the business considerably, if you and your wife will come to London for the purpose of going through some legal forms, which it appears must, at all events, be done. I will pay your expenses to London and back to Foundless, and whatever expenses you may incur whilst in London. If you cannot come to London I shall be obliged to take two lawyers with me to Foundless, which will occasion me considerable expense and trouble, as it is a great object to be expeditious in the business whilst the Judges are sitting in London. I shall be much obliged if you will let me know by return of post whether you can come to London with your wife or not; only say Yes or No, and I will arrange accordingly. Will you in the same letter tell me whether you have any other christian name besides Thomas, and also tell me the christian name of your wife. Believe me yours, very truly, J. N. B. Millett.

"P.S.—When I have your answer I will write you again on the subject of your coming to London (if you can come) appointing the time. Be sure to write to me immediately. You need only be in London one day.—Mr. T. Millett, Coast Guard Service, Foundless Island, Essex."

The said J. Millett, the husband of Dorcas, died in the year 1793 intestate, and the said Dorcas in 1799 (having first duly made and published her last will, dated March 22, 1798, whereby she devised the premises in question, called Pennick, amongst others, to her son W. Millett, in fee), leaving several sons. William, the devisee, who was a younger son, died in 1801, having first entered and taken possession of the said premises devised to him by the will of Dorcas, his mother; and having first duly made and published his last will, dated the 17th of November 1800, whereby he devised all his lands, tenements and hereditaments to his brother John Millett, in fee. And John Millett, the grandfather of the defendant, having entered and taken possession of the premises devised to him by William, his brother, died in the year 1815 intestate, leaving J. N. B. Millett, the defendant, his heir-at-law; and the possession of the said premises called Pennick has continued in these persons respectively up to the time of the commencement of this action.

The tenements called Collurian and South Legaun, and the field in Marazion were not included in the will of the said T. Constable, but descended upon the said three daughters, Mary, Dorcas, and Elizabeth, as the heirs of the said W. Trevorian. Evidence was given at the trial by the defendant to shew that since the death of the father of the lessor of the plaintiff, he, the lessor, had received from the tenants of Collurian certain portions of the rent, that is to say, on the 29th of January 1814, 1*l.*, on the 22nd of December, 18*l.*, on the 30th of May, 3*l.* The rent was 100 guineas a year.

The Court were to be at liberty to draw any inferences from the above facts which the jury might have drawn.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were: first, is the plaintiff barred by the partition begun in 1759? second, or by the Statute of Limitations? If he was, a non-suit was to be entered; if not, the verdict for the plaintiff was to stand.

Montague Smith, for the plaintiff (May 2).—The possession here was under an agreement for a partition, in which case no presumption of adverse possession arises. Until December 1798, when Thomas Millett died, there could be no adverse possession, and as Elizabeth acquiesced in the agreement for a partition, there could be no adverse possession during her life. Previously to the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, the doctrine of non adverse possession applied—Nepean v. Doe d. Knight (1), and this is clearly a case of non adverse possession within the earlier authorities—Roe v. Ferrars (2), Doe d. Mil- burn v. Edgar (3), Doe d. Smith v. Pike (4). But here the possession of one tenant in common operates as the possession of his co-tenants, unless there is an actual ouster—Fairclain v. Shackleton (5) and Peaceable v. Read (6). This is shewn by the necessity of the special enactment in the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. s. 12. The agreement in the present case rebuts any supposition of actual ouster; the onus of proving which is on the defendant, who must give evidence of some unequivocal act.

(1) 2 Mee. & Wels. 894; s.c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 335.

(2) 2 Bos. & Pul. 542.

Crowder, for the defendant.—There are two points arising here, independently of the effect of the statute. First, the parol agreement for a partition, acted upon by an occupation in severalty, is operative, though no deed was executed. The effect of the recovery was to turn the joint tenancy into a tenancy in common.

[PATTERSON, J.—The recovery was by the husband only, the wife being the tenant in tail.]

The wife might have set aside the partition after coverture; but she did not do so. Secondly, a presumption will be made that there was livery of seisin or a recovery suffered. An act of parliament may be presumed—Eldridge v. Knott (7), Lopes v. Andrew (8), and Earl v. Baxter (9). In Tenny d. Whinnett v. Jones (10) a reconveyance was presumed. Doe d. Fisher v. Prosser (11) is very like this case.

[PATTERSON, J.—We cannot presume both an ouster and livery.]

It is enough if either are presumed. A receipt of rent for seventy years under an agreement amounts to a disseisin, and that may be presumed. Doe d. Smith v. Pike merely shews that long possession is not sufficient.

Montague Smith, in reply.—What is called a partition, but is rather in the nature of an exchange, cannot bind the heir in tail; that effect could only be produced by a recovery. Even if a deed carrying out all that is contended for on the other side had been executed, it could not have affected the entail. If that be so, the only adverse possession is since 1818. Doe d. Fisher v. Prosser is distinguishable. There it is said, that adverse possession is evidence of an ouster, and long unexplained possession is evidence of adverse possession; but here the origin of the possession is shewn, and the presumption of its being adverse is therefore rebutted. If the Court were to presume a recovery, it would be going further than has ever yet been done, and the doctrine of presumption has been lately much narrowed—The Queen v. St. Peter's, Exeter (12).

[Crowder referred to Read v. Brookman (13), where Buller, J. said, a recovery might be presumed.]

That was simply a reference to a MS. case: no such point appears in any reported decision. Besides, a presumption can only be made consistently with the agreement, and no recovery was ever contemplated by it.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Why is the possession not adverse during the mother's life? She is no party to the agreement.]

She adopted and acted upon it, and is bound by it in equity, as she must have known of it: after her husband's death she finds another in possession of the estate, and acquiesces in it.

The judgment of the Court (14) was now (May 13) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This case was tried before the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. was passed; therefore the old doctrine as to adverse possession will apply to it. The case shews that three females being coparceners in tail, two of them suffered recoveries of their shares, but the third did not. The lessor of the plaintiff is the heir in tail of that third female. All married, and their husbands in the year 1759 entered into an agreement to make partition of the lands in coparcenery as well as of other lands, part leasehold, part freehold; the leasehold having been devised by the same will which created the estates tail, and the freehold not being comprised in the will. The agreement provided for a deed of partition, but for nothing more. No deed was proved to have been executed. The lands have been held according to that agreement for partition from the date of it till this action. Those in dispute have been held by the husband of one of the women who suffered a recovery, and those who have taken under him and her, and the lessor of the plaintiff claimed one-third of them, on the ground that the estate tail in that one-third had not been destroyed, and he brought his action within twenty years after the death of the third woman, who did not suffer a recovery. The possession was plainly under the agreement, and not adverse; but we are asked to presume that something has occurred to destroy the estate tail. That something must be either a recovery or a fine. Now, assuming that such a presumption might be made from the mere fact of long possession, if not accounted for by facts actually proved, we do not feel ourselves at liberty to make it, when the possession is so accounted for. The most that we could do would be to presume that everything contemplated by the agreement for partition had been done; but if we make that presumption, the lessor of the plaintiff will not be affected by it, because all that was contemplated was a deed, and that deed, if executed, would not have barred the estate tail.

We cannot, therefore, find any legal principle upon which we can say that this lessor of the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and our judgment must be in his favour.

The defendants purchased in their own names railway scrip for the plaintiff, deliverable on the 29th August, for 148l. 10s., which sum the plaintiff paid the defendants on the 26th August. The plaintiff having repudiated the shares, the defendant declined to take them from the holder, and they were sold at a loss exceeding the 148l. 10s., and the defendants paid such loss to the holder:—Held, that they being liable to the original holder for such loss, and the plaintiff not having supplied funds to meet the call, an action for money had and received could not be maintained by him against the defendants for the 148l. 10s.

Assumpsit for money had and received. Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Cresswell, J., at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1846, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, damages 148*l.* 10*s.*, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

Martin and Cowling shewed cause, and relied on Fletcher v. Marshall (1).

Knowles and Crompton, in support of the rule.—Money had and received will not lie under the circumstances of this case, as the defendants have, according to the usage of trade, made a contract in their own names, by which they are personally bound. A principal, who has sent money to his agent to pay to a third party, may undoubtedly stop it; but that must be subject to this limitation, namely, that the agent has not done anything to render himself personally liable to the third party in consequence of the order of his principal—Sutton v. Tatham (2). The order here was to buy "shares," not "scrip." The agent buys in the shape of "scrip": when the scrip is called in, a transfer cannot be made, unless the call made since the purchase is paid. The shares are now liable to a call. Fletcher v. Marshall proceeded on the ground that the plaintiffs countermanded the purchase before the scrip was delivered.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the Court (3).—This was a rule to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that upon the facts, the action for money had and received could not be sustained. The defendants, who were sharebrokers in partnership at Liverpool, had bought for the plaintiff on the 14th of August, in pursuance of instructions from him, thirty Limerick and Waterford scrip shares to be delivered on the next account day, which was to be on the 29th of August, at the price, including their commission, of 148*l.* 10*s.* This sum the plaintiff transmitted to the defendants on the 26th of August by letter, and requested them to acknowledge the receipt, and at the same time to forward to him the scrip. On the 22nd of August the railway company had called in the scrip for registration, which made a delivery to, or by, the defendants impossible. Upon registration the scrip is turned into shares, and re-issues in the form of sealed certificates, which are transferable only by deed. The registration and re-issuing were not completed till the middle of December, and in the mean time the company had made a call of 5*l.* per share, which was necessarily paid by the party selling to the defendants, and he presented the shares to them, with the additional demand for the call. The plaintiff repudiating the transaction, they declined to accept, and the shares were resold at a loss of 226*l.*, which the defendants paid to the original seller. The action is brought to recover the 148*l.* 10*s.*

From the correspondence put in it appeared that the plaintiff was apprised in due time of the scrip having been called in, and the call made; and also that the call must be repaid to the seller before the certificates would be delivered. From the same correspondence and the evidence, we think it must be taken that the defendants purchased in their own names, and were themselves personally responsible to the sellers. The money, therefore, was transmitted to the defendants to enable them to meet the liability which they had incurred at the request of the plaintiff, and on his account. It was, therefore, not received, in the first instance, to his use. But it was urged, that the defendants by their own misconduct had produced a failure of the consideration for which the money was originally sent; and this misconduct was said to consist in their having of their own wrong given time to the seller for the delivery of the scrip, which by the contract was to be delivered as such on the 29th of August, and all the consequences which followed were owing to circumstances over which neither party had any controul; and there is abundant evidence that the plaintiff was aware of those circumstances and understood the contract made to be subject to them. The reasonable interpretation of the contract is, that it was for delivery of scrip on the 29th of August, if not then called in, otherwise of share certificates as soon as they should be re-issued. Accordingly, if the plaintiff had enabled them to pay for the shares when issued, by supplying funds to meet the call with which they had become saddled in the mean time, the defendants must have applied the money received for that purpose, and if they had neglected, it would have become money in their hands to the plaintiff's use. But he has wrongfully neglected to do so: and they have been compelled to add their own money to his in order to fulfil their contract; for the reselling of the shares on their account by the original seller and their payment of the loss is only another mode of so doing.

Upon these facts, we think the action not maintainable, and that the rule must be absolute.

1848. } THE QUEEN v. HENRY BROOME
May 1, 5. } AND JOHN BROOME.

Error, Writ of — Quashing under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 68. s. 5 — Affidavit.

Under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 68. s. 5. it is not necessary to rule the defendants to assign errors, previous to a motion to quash the writ of error for delay in the prosecution thereof.

The affidavit on which such a motion was made stated, that since the filing of the writ of error "no process or other proceeding has been had or taken by or on behalf of the said defendants to prosecute the same": — Held, a sufficient statement that error had not been assigned.

In this case the defendants had been found guilty of a misdemeanour at the Oxford Spring Assizes, 1847, and in the Easter term following a writ of error was sued out, and they were admitted to bail, under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 68. They had not been ruled to assign errors, and it did not appear that any step had been taken by either side.

On a former day in this term a rule had been obtained calling upon the defendants to shew cause why the writ of error should not be quashed, and why their recognizances should not be forfeited. The affidavit stated that since the issuing and filing of the writ of error "no process or other proceeding has been had or taken by or on behalf of the said defendants to prosecute the same" (1).

Butt (who appeared for John Broome) now (May 1) shewed cause. — The affidavit upon which this rule was granted is insufficient. It does not state who the prosecutor is, or that he makes this motion, or that the writ of error issued out of this Court. Further, it does not state positively that errors have not been assigned, or that the defendants have been ruled to assign errors.

Phillimore, in support of the rule. — Under the 5th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 68, it is sufficient to satisfy the Court that the party has neglected to prosecute his writ of error, and the prosecutor is not bound to urge them forward. There is clearly wilful delay here, for the defendants have not attempted to account for it by any affidavit.

(1) The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 68. s. 5. enacts, "That if the Court in which any such writ of error shall be pending, shall, upon motion in that behalf, decide that the defendant or defendants by whom it shall be brought, has or have wilfully delayed or neglected to prosecute the same with effect, it shall be lawful for such Court to order the writ of error to be quashed, and thereupon the defendant or defendants who brought such writ of error shall be liable to execution upon the judgment."

The following judgment was now (May 5) delivered by—

COLERIDGE, J.—Cause was shewn in this case against a rule for quashing the writ of error of the defendants, and estreating their recognizances, on the ground that they had wilfully delayed to proceed. No affidavits in answer were filed, but objections of a technical nature were relied on, which are hardly worth mentioning, except two; the one that the affidavit does not state that errors had not been assigned, and the other that the defendants ought to have been ruled to assign. I think that although the affidavit is in general terms, it is sufficient to call upon the other side for an answer. The language is, that no process or other proceeding has been taken to prosecute the writ, and I think that is sufficient. Then it is said that the defendants ought to have been ruled to assign errors, as was necessary by the old practice; and the question is, whether it is necessary under this statute. The words of it are so general that I think if the Court are satisfied there has been wilful delay, they may act upon that, and set aside the writ. The words are, "that if the Court in which any such writ of error shall be pending shall, upon motion in that behalf, decide that the defendant or defendants by whom it shall be brought, has or have wilfully delayed or neglected to prosecute the same with effect, it shall be lawful for such Court to order the writ of error to be quashed." It seems to me that those words are large enough to include the present case, and that I ought to take it that there has been wilful delay. The writ of error will, therefore, be quashed, and the recognizances estreated.

HENDERSON v. HENDERSON.

Witness, Commission to examine—Return—Decree of Foreign Court—Pleading—Attorney and Solicitor—Authority to defend Suit—Amended Bill.

A Judge's order directed a commission to issue for the examination of witnesses at Newfoundland. The commission directed the Commissioners to summon the witnesses at a certain place, to be appointed by them for that purpose, in Newfoundland, and then and there examine them apart, viva voce, and directed the commission and depositions to be returned sealed up. It was proved that papers, in the handwriting of the Commissioners, and sealed up, purporting to be a return of the commission, were delivered at the Master's office; but no evidence was given by whom they were brought, or that they were in the same state as when delivered by the Commissioners. The commission returned was identified as that issued. The examinations of the witnesses did not on the face of them purport to be taken apart:—Held, first, that the commission sufficiently provided for the time, place, and manner of examining the witnesses. Secondly, that there was due proof of the return. Thirdly, that it must be presumed that the witnesses were examined apart.

The declaration was in debt on a decree of the Supreme Court of N. The plea alleged that the decree was in respect of an amended bill, and that before filing thereof the defendant was out of the jurisdiction of the said Court, and so continued, and was never served with a copy of the said bill, nor had notice of any process calling on him to answer the said bill, and that the Replication, that at the commencement of the suit the defendant was within the jurisdiction of the said Court, and was duly served with process in respect of the original bill in the said suit, and appeared and appointed H. E. accordingly became and was the attorney of the defendant, and authorized to conduct his defence in the suit, and that while he was such attorney, and so authorized, he had notice of the amended bill. The rejoinder traversed that H. E. had notice of the amended bill, modo et formâ, on which issue was joined :—Held, that the defendant by this traverse admitted that H. E. had such an authority as would render the replication good, viz., that he was authorized to act as attorney as well in respect of the amended as of the original bill.*

Held, also, that such authority given by the defendant about to leave the jurisdiction would support the decree.

Debt upon a decree of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland.

Fifth plea, that the said decree was made in respect of the matters stated in a certain amended bill filed in the said court, and that before and at the time of the filing of the said amended bill the defendant was and thence hitherto hath been and still is out of, and resident out of, the jurisdiction of the said Court, and that he was never served with any copy of the said bill, and never had notice of any process calling upon him to answer the said bill, and that the proceedings in the said court towards, and in, making the said decree were proceedings had and taken in his absence, and ex parte. Verification.

Replication to the fifth plea, that at the time of the commencement of the said suit, wherein the said decree was pronounced and made, to wit, on &c., the defendant was within the jurisdiction of the said Court, and then and whilst he was within the said jurisdiction was duly served with and had notice of process sued forth of the said Court by which the said decree was pronounced and made, calling upon the defendant to answer a certain original bill of complaint in the said suit which had been then filed in the said court, and was the bill which was afterwards amended as in the said plea, and hereinafter alleged, and which said original bill of complaint was the first proceeding in the said suit; that the defendant did afterwards, long before the making of the said decree and while he was within the said jurisdiction, to wit, on &c., appear in the said court, and did then appoint one H. A. Emerson, an attorney of the said court, to be the attorney for him, the defendant, in the said suit, and the said H. A. Emerson then accordingly became and was the attorney of the defendant, and authorized to conduct his defence in the said suit; and the said H. A. Emerson was from thence continually, at and during the several times hereinafter mentioned, and until the making of the said decree, within the jurisdiction of the said Court; that afterwards, and while the said H. A. Emerson continued to be and was such attorney for the defendant, and so authorized as aforesaid the said original bill was amended, and the said amended bill filed by leave of the said Court after hearing counsel on behalf of the defendant; that after the filing of the said amended bill in the said plea mentioned, and a reasonable time before the making and pronouncing the said decree, and while the said H. A. Emerson continued to be and was such attorney, and so authorized, to wit, on &c., the said H. A. Emerson had notice of the said amended bill, and was then served with process sued forth of the said Court in the said cause, calling upon the defendant to answer the said amended bill, and such proceedings were thereupon had that afterwards, to wit, on &c., the said decree was so made in and by the said Supreme Court of Newfoundland, in manner and form as in the declaration in that behalf is alleged. Verification.

Rejoinder, that the said H. A. Emerson had not notice of the said amended bill modo et formâ. Issue thereon.

After issue joined the following order was made by Lord Denman, C.J. :—

"Simms and wife v. Henderson and Henderson v. Henderson.—Upon hearing, &c. and by consent, I do order that a commission in the first-mentioned cause issue, directed to four Commissioners, two thereof to be named by the plaintiffs and two by the defendant, to take evidence by examination of Edward Mortimer, Archibald James Bayley, and others, as witnesses on the plaintiffs' behalf visd voce, at Newfoundland, before such Commissioners or any two or more of them, returnable on or before the last day of Trinity term next, or within such further time as any Judge may order. And I further order that the defendant's attornies or agents shall give to the plaintiffs' agents, within two days, the names and descriptions of two Commissioners residing at St. John's, Newfoundland, on the part of the defendant, to be named in such commission with the Commissioners to be named on the plaintiffs' behalf; and that in default of their so doing, a commission in the said first-mentioned cause shall issue, directed to three Commissioners to be named on the part of the plaintiffs, to be executed by them, or any two of them, returnable as aforesaid. And I further order that the said commission, and the depositions taken thereunder, shall be returned to the office of the Master of this court, to be received in evidence on the trial of the said first-mentioned cause, saving all just exceptions. And I further order that the plaintiffs' attornies or agents shall give a copy of the said commission to the said defendant's attornies two days before it be sent out, with notice by what mail or other conveyance it shall be sent out. And I further order that the commission to be issued in the said first-mentioned cause, and the depositions to be taken thereunder, shall also be received in evidence in the secondly above mentioned cause, wherein Elizabeth Henderson is plaintiff, and the now defendant is defendant, as if the same respectively had been issued and taken in the said last-mentioned cause, subject to the like exceptions as are reserved by this order. And that in the mean time all further proceedings in both the said actions be stayed."

In pursuance of this order the plaintiffs issued the following commission, which (the defendant having neglected to name Commissioners on his part) was directed to the Commissioners nominated by the plaintiffs only:—

"Victoria, &c.—To Hugh W. Hoyles, Esq., Peter W. Carter, Esq., and Robert Prowse, notary public, all of St. John's, in the island of Newfoundland, greeting.—Know ye that we, in confidence of your prudence and fidelity, have appointed you, and by these presents do give unto you, and examined by virtue of this writ; and we give you, two or more of you, full power and authority, jointly or severally, to administer such oath to the rest, or any other of you. Witness, Thomas Lord Denman, at Westminster, the 31st day of December, in the ninth year of our reign."

At the trial, before Lord Denman, C. J., at the sittings in Middlesex, after Michaelmas term, 1847, this commission was offered in evidence by the plaintiffs, but was objected to as not being warranted by the order. This objection was overruled, and the commission received. In order to prove the return to the commission, a clerk from the Master's office was called, who produced a packet of papers, which he stated he had received, sealed up, from a person who had brought them to the office, but whom he had never seen before or since, and did not know. The plaintiff's attorney was also called, who identified the commission produced as that issued under the order; and it was also proved that the persons named as Commissioners resided in Newfoundland, and that the handwriting on the papers, professing to be the return, was their handwriting. It was thereupon objected that no proper return to the commission was shewn, and that evidence should have been given, not only of the identity of the commission, but also that the documents produced were in the same state as when received from the Commissioners. This objection also was overruled. The examinations being then put in evidence, it did not appear on the face of them that the two witnesses, whose depositions were returned, had been examined apart, and it was argued that evidence ought to be given that this had been done, but the learned Judge received the evidence.

It was proved that the defendant left Newfoundland on the 20th of July 1834, and never again returned, having previously appointed Emerson to act as his attorney in the suit then commenced. On the 6th of May 1837 the amended bill was filed, at which time the defendant was resident out of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. A subpoena to answer the amended bill was served upon Emerson on the 5th of May 1837; and on the 10th of May an order of the Supreme Court was made directing the defendant or his solicitor to appear on the 13th of that month, to shew cause why a commission should not issue to certain persons at Bristol to receive the defendant's answer to the amended bill. Emerson, assuming to act as the defendant's solicitor, consented to the commission issuing; on the arrival of which in England the Commissioners gave notice of it to the defendant; but he declined to put in any answer to the amended bill, and the commission was in consequence returned to Newfoundland unexecuted; and a declaration being made of the defendant's refusal, proceedings were instituted in the Supreme Court to take the bill pro confesso, and a final decree was accordingly made. The decree recited in terms that the subpoena to answer the amended bill had been served upon Emerson. It was then objected that these facts did not prove the issue raised on the rejoinder to the fifth plea; and the learned Judge reserved leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit on all the above points. The plaintiffs had a verdict with 10,356*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* damages.

Barstow having obtained a rule nisi for a nonsuit accordingly, or to arrest the judgment, on the ground that the decree appeared on the record to be contrary to natural justice,—

Sir F. Kelly, Hugh Hill and E. Lloyd shewed cause (Jan. 12.)—The first objection is, that the commission was not warranted by the order, as no time or place was named, and the argument is, that additional orders specifying these details were requisite. But it is discretionary with the Judge to insert the time and place in his order. The Judge has directed that the evidence is to be taken sine die, and so the manner of conducting the examination is provided for. The time cannot frequently be pointed out otherwise than by providing for the time of the return.

[LORD DENMAN, C. J.—At present we agree with you on that point.]

Then, assuming the order to warrant some commission, it is said this commission is not warranted by it on account of the clause in it that at a certain day and place to be named by the Commissioners they should examine the witnesses; but those words do not give any greater power than the Commissioners would have had without them. Next, as to examining the witnesses apart: it will be presumed that everything was properly done till the contrary is shewn—The Queen v. Douglas (1). There the return to the commission being certified under the hands and seals of the Commissioners was sufficiently proved; besides, the attorney identified the commission as that set out, and the handwriting of the Commissioners was proved.

Rules of courts of equity will not affect the practice under this statute. As to the suggestion that the papers were not in the same state as when delivered up by the Commissioners, there was no erasure or anything to support such an imputation. Next, as to proof of the issue raised by the rejoinder on the fifth plea: it is merely a denial of Emerson's having notice, leaving out of the question all consideration of his being served with process. The fact that Emerson consented to a commission issuing for the purpose of taking the defendant's answer, is strong evidence of notice by which the plaintiff is entitled to retain his verdict. But it will be contended, on the other side, that Emerson had not authority to receive notice of the amended bill, and that therefore technically there was no notice at all to the defendant: but an amended bill is not a new suit, but merely a proceeding in the course of the original suit—Mitford on

Pleading, p. 26, 3rd edit. The argument will be, that at the time when the act establishing the Court of Newfoundland passed, an amended bill required to be served on the party himself.

[The argument upon the practice of the Court of Chancery is omitted, as the judgment proceeded on a different ground.]

The replication states (and under this traverse it must be taken to be admitted), that Emerson was appointed by the defendant's attorney to conduct the suit in which the decree was made: this it was clearly competent to the defendant to do if he chose; and if so, Emerson had express authority to receive service of the amended bill as well as of the original bill.

Barstow and Bagshawe, in support of the rule.—First, the order for the commission does not mention any place in Newfoundland where it is to be executed; this distinguishes the present case from Greville v. Stuls (3). Time and place must be either expressly fixed by the Judge, or the order must contain a direction to the Commissioners to fix time and place. This being a statutable authority must be strictly pursued. Secondly, there is no sufficient proof that the depositions returned are those taken under the commission. In Chancery the invariable practice is for the Commissioners to deliver the return sealed up to the messenger, who brings it to the court, and makes oath that it is in the same state as when handed to him. The same evidence should have been given here. Next, the return is perfectly silent as to the examination of the witnesses having taken place apart. It cannot therefore be assumed to have been done. Then the issue raised on the fifth plea was not proved by the evidence.

[ERLE, J.—Is not the issue only whether Emerson had notice? How can he be said not to have had notice when he consents to a commission being sent out?]

It does not appear at what time he so consented.

[ERLE, J.—It must be taken, on the whole evidence, that it was after the bill was amended.]

Then Emerson had no authority to receive process or appear to the amended bill. It is quite contrary to the practice in Chancery to treat the solicitor, who has appeared to an original bill, as having authority to accept process under the amended bill. The only answer here has been to the original bill, and the process which then issued will not extend to the amended bill. Roberts v. Worsley is recognized by Smith v. the Hibernian Mining Company (5) and Murray v. Vissart (6).

The judgment of the Court was now (May 9) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—In this case, a rule for a new trial was moved for upon objections to the commission for examining witnesses. But it appears to us, that the place, the time, and the manner of examining witnesses was regularly provided for, as they were to be examined vidé voce at Newfoundland, before the return day of the commission. It is to be presumed that they were examined apart, as the depositions purport to contain separate examinations, and there is no reason for supposing that they were examined together; and the presumption is, that the Commissioners did their duty. There was more than sufficient proof of the due return of the commission. The defendant has further objected, that judgment ought not to be given for the plaintiffs, by reason of the facts appearing on the fifth issue. The declaration alleged a regular decree. The fifth plea alleges, that the decree was made in respect of an amended bill, and that before the filing thereof the defendant was out of the jurisdiction of the court, and has so continued; that he was not served with a copy of the said bill, and had no notice of any process therein, and that the proceedings were taken in his absence and ex parte.

The replication thereto alleges, that at the commencement of the suit the defendant was within the jurisdiction, and was duly served with process in respect of the original bill in the suit, and appeared and appointed H. E. to be the attorney for him, the defendant, in the suit, and H. E. accordingly became the attorney of the defendant, and authorized to conduct his defence in the suit, and that while he was such attorney so authorized he had notice of the amended bill.

The rejoinder traverses this notice, and the issue thereon is found for the plaintiffs.

Upon these pleadings the defendant has contended, that H. E. had no authority to act as the attorney of the defendant in respect of the amended bill; because it was said, that by the rules of practice in the Court of Chancery, an authority to act as attorney in respect of an original bill was no authority so to act in respect of an amended bill. But we take it to be clear, that the plaintiffs intended to allege that H. E. had authority from the defendant to act as attorney for him during the whole suit, and as well in respect of the amended bill as of the original bill, and that the defendant by pleading over to this allegation, and merely traversing the notice to H. E., admits that it is to be taken in the sense which the plaintiffs must have intended, viz. the sense which makes the replication valid. Now, if an authority was given by the defendant about to leave the jurisdiction to an attorney to act for him in respect of the original and all amended bills that might be filed in the suit, such authority would support the present decree; whatever may have been the rules of practice in the Court of Chancery, in respect of an ordinary retainer to an attorney to appear to an original bill.

After the plaintiffs have incurred the expense of a trial upon an issue chosen by the defendant, justice and the rules of law require that we should endeavour so to construe the pleadings as to make the trial effective. The judgment, therefore, is for the plaintiffs.

Costs, Security for—Lord Mayor's Court —Certiorari—Money paid into Court in lieu of Bail.

An action was commenced in the Lord Mayor's Court, and goods attached. The cause was removed into the Court of Queen's Bench, and the defendant paid into court a sum of money in lieu of bail. He then obtained an order for the plaintiff, who lived in Scotland, to give security for costs, with the usual stay of proceedings:—Held, that after a long delay, the defendant was entitled to a rule, calling on the plaintiff to put in the security within a limited time, and, on his default, to have the money paid out of court.

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why he should not within four days give security for costs, or why, on his default, the defendant should not take out of court the sum of 164*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, which he had paid in, in lieu of bail. The action had been commenced in the Lord Mayor's Court, and the attachment issued on the 4th of June 1846, under which goods were attached. It was removed by certiorari into this court; and on the 19th of June 1846, an order was made that the defendant should pay 164*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* into court in lieu of bail. On the 4th of July, in the same year, the defendant obtained an order for the plaintiff, who lived in Scotland, to give security for costs, with a stay of proceedings until given. No security having been given, and no step taken in the cause, the present rule was obtained, against which—

Bosill shewed cause.—This is quite contrary to the usual course. In Kelly v. Brown (1) the Court refused to add a term that judgment as in case of nonsuit might be signed if the security were not given within a specified time. The defendant must abandon his rule, or the proceedings will be stayed in accordance with it.

Meymott, contra.—That is true in ordinary cases; but this case differs, for the money paid into court is in consequence of the attachment of the goods, and the subsequent certiorari. According to the old practice, where the defendant had been arrested and given bail, the bail were discharged if the plaintiff did not declare within a limited time—Sykes v. Bauwens (2). So here, the money ought to be released.

The following judgment was now (May 12) delivered by—

COLERIDGE, J.—[After stating the facts, his Lordship proceeded.]—The plaintiff not having complied with the order, the defendant's money is locked up; he has no means of forcing the plaintiff to obey the order; he therefore now seeks either to compel the plaintiff to give security, or to obtain possession of his money. In ordinary cases the rule no doubt is, that the defendant must abandon his rule for security for costs before he can urge the plaintiff on; but here there is a sum of money paid into court to abide the result, and I think it unfair that it should be locked up, and the plaintiff allowed to hold back. I can find no authority against my making the rule which is asked for by the defendant, and therefore think it should be made absolute.

Sheriff—Extortion—Attachment—Rule.

Where a sheriff's officer has been guilty of extortion, the injured party may, by one and the same rule, call upon the sheriff to shew cause why he should not pay over the excess, and upon the officer to shew cause why an attachment should not issue against him.

This was a rule, calling upon the sheriff of Cheshire to shew cause why he should not refund to the defendant a certain sum, taken, as was alleged, by one of his officers, for fees in an execution, beyond the amount allowed under 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 55; and also calling upon the officer to shew cause why an attachment should not issue against him.

Watson shewed cause.—There is a preliminary objection, that the rule is too large. No doubt, by section 3. of the 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 55, an officer taking excessive fees is punishable as guilty of a contempt; but the defendant has no right to treat the act at the same time as civil and criminal. This he does by seeking to make the sheriff and the officer answerable by the same rule. The application should have been either for an attachment against the officer only, or a rule against the sheriff only.

Cowling, contra.—There is nothing in the statute to alter the old remedy against the sheriff, which has for its object the refunding of money, while the officer is to be punished for the contempt. The new remedy is cumulative, and may be well joined with the old one.

COLERIDGE, J.—As the old form of application against the sheriff alone may still be made, there is no objection to the rule in the present form. On the facts, the matter should be referred to the Master.

Writ of Trial—Teste.

A writ of trial may be tested in vacation.

A rule having been obtained in this case, for setting aside the writ of trial and subsequent proceedings for irregularity,—

T. Atkinson now shewed cause.—There are questions of fact, but the only point of law is, whether writs of trial may be tested in vacation. This is a proceeding within 2 Will. 4. c. 39. s. 11, which enacts, "If any writ of summons, capias, or detainer, shall be delivered or executed on any day, whether in term or vacation, all necessary proceedings to judgment and execution may, except as therein provided, be had therein without delay." The case cited on moving for the rule, of Seaton v. Heap (1) has no application, for a writ of scire facias is not issued under the Uniformity of Process Act. It has been the constant practice to test writs of trial in vacation.

Fitzpatrick, in support of the rule.—This writ is in the nature of a judicial writ, and should be tested in term. A subpoena cannot be tested in vacation—Edgell v. Curling (2). The statute refers to the pleadings and matters connected therewith, but not to writs of trial.

COLERIDGE, J.—Upon this point I have no doubt. The statute authorizes all "necessary proceedings" to be taken in vacation as well as in term time. This is a proceeding in the course of the cause, which in strictness a subpoena is not. This writ, therefore, is well tested in vacation.

Pleading—Covenant, Independent—Patent—Partial Failure of Consideration.

By an indenture, reciting that by a deed of 1842, the plaintiff had granted to the defendant a licence to make and vend a patent, subject to payment of a royalty, with a proviso for keeping the royalty at an average of 16l. 13s. 4d. per month, and also reciting that the defendant had agreed with the plaintiff to purchase one-half of the patent, (subject to the previous deed, but with the benefit to the defendant of one-half of the royalty thereby reserved), the plaintiff, in consideration of 2,200l. for the purchase of one-half the patent and one-half the royalty, assigned to a trustee for the defendant the patent and the matters intended to be assigned as therein mentioned. The plaintiff covenanted in the usual form for the title; and the indenture contained a covenant by the defendant to pay the 2,200l. by certain instalments. In an action on this last covenant, alleging as breaches non-payment of two instalments, the defendant, after setting out the deed of 1842 and the letters patent, pleaded several pleas, merely denying the validity of the patent:—Held, to be no answer to the action: first, because the defendant, under the deed of 1842, would be at all events bound to pay 16l. 13s. 4d. royalty per month; and, secondly, because the defendant's covenant was independent of the covenant for title by the plaintiff.

pay the money at specified periods, and assigned a breach by non-payment of two of the instalments.

The defendant cravedoyer of the deed, which recited the grant of letters patent to the plaintiff, in 1841, for an invention entitled "Improvements in the Construction of the Tubular Flues of Steam Boilers." It also recited a deed dated the 23rd of July 1842, by which the plaintiff granted to the defendant the sole and exclusive liberty and licence to make and vend the patent invention, subject to the payment to the plaintiff of a royalty of 2*l.* 6*s.* for every ton of the tubular flues made under that licence, with a proviso for keeping the royalty at an average of 16*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* per month. The deed of the 11th of October then went on to recite that the defendant had agreed with the plaintiff for the absolute purchase from him of one-half part of the letters patent (subject to the indenture of the 23rd of July), but with the benefit to the defendant of one-half of the royalty thereby reserved, and then stated that in consideration of 2,200*l.* for the purchase of one-half the patent and one-half the royalty, the plaintiff did, by that indenture of the 11th of October, assign and transfer to a trustee for the defendant the letters patent, and the matters intended and agreed to be assigned, as mentioned in the deed; and then followed (after certain other provisions) (9), the covenant declared upon for the payment of the 2,200*l.* by instalments. The letters patent, which were in the usual form, were also set out in the pleas after the deed declared upon.

The defendant pleaded in several pleas that the plaintiff was not the first inventor of the improvements; that the supposed invention was not an invention of improvements as represented by the plaintiff; that the supposed invention was not new; and that the invention was not properly specified, and the patent void. To these pleas the plaintiff replied estoppels by the recitals (10)

(9) Among them was a covenant by the plaintiff with the defendant, for title and quiet enjoyment of the patent in the usual form.

(10) These recitals were, that the plaintiff had invented improvements in the construction of tubular flues of steam boilers; that letters patent had been made granting to the plaintiff the sole privilege of in the indenture of the 23rd of July 1842, which are set out in the replications, to which the defendant has demurred generally. Upon the argument, it was contended, on the part of the defendant, that though, since the case of Bowman v. Taylor, he might be considered estopped by recitals of specific facts in the deed declared upon, he was not in this action estopped by recitals in the deed of the 23rd of July, and that the only effect of reciting that deed in the indenture declared upon was, that he was estopped from denying that such an indenture was made, and that he was at liberty to dispute any specific fact stated in that deed only, and not in the indenture declared upon. It was also contended, that even if estopped from denying that there was any specification, he was not estopped from shewing that the specification did not support the patent. Many cases were cited upon the question of the estoppel, and much learning and ingenuity were displayed on both sides; but we think it unnecessary to give any opinion upon that question, as an objection was taken to the pleas of the defendant, which, we think, must prevail, and which, consequently, renders any question as to the validity of the replications immaterial.

The defence proposed to be set up by the pleas is, failure of consideration, and that the patent is invalid; and that the defendant is not bound by his covenant to pay the money, which appears by the deed to be the purchase-money for a patent which it is said turns out to be worthless. But it appears to us that there are two decisive objections to this defence. The first is, that there not having been any eviction the consideration does not wholly fail, for the defendant is, at all events, bound by the indenture of the 23rd of July to pay 16*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* a month for royalty to the plaintiff, whether the patent were valid or not, as he would be estopped in an action upon that deed from denying the validity of the patent, and by the deed upon which the action is brought he becomes entitled to half that royalty: and, in the next place, the proposed defence could only be available in case the covenant upon which the action is making and vending his said new invention; and that he had duly inrolled the specification according to the condition in the patent.

brought was a dependent covenant, to be performed only if some condition is observed by the other party; but in this case the covenant of the plaintiff relating to the patent, and that of the defendant for payment of the purchase-money, are wholly independent of each other, and each party may recover against the other for a breach of their respective covenants. There is no plea of fraud or eviction; and it appears to us that upon this deed and these pleadings, the invalidity of the patent as stated in the pleas affords no ground of defence at law to an action upon the covenant in question, which may be considered, in effect, as a mere covenant in gross for the payment of money. Our judgment, therefore, is for the plaintiff.

A local act (54 Geo. 3. c. cxiii, relating to St. Mary, Newington) empowers "the governors and guardians to call a vestry meeting of the inhabitants of the said parish on the Easter Tuesday in every year; at which said vestry meeting all the vacancies in the list of governors and guardians shall be filled up by poll or ballot, or in such way of election as shall be deemed most proper and convenient:"—Held, first, that although the meeting so assembled must determine the method of election, as by poll, ballot, or other similar method, yet they must adopt some method which secures the expression of the will of the inhabitants in vestry assembled, as to each candidate; secondly, that on a poll being properly demanded, the vestry may be adjourned for the purpose of enabling all, who are entitled, to give their votes, and that the election is not confined to those then present.

The statute, after providing for the appointment of governors and guardians, and for the filling up of vacancies by the remaining governors and guardians, enacts, that after the first year, "the inhabitants of the parish in vestry assembled," are to nominate and choose twelve persons, &c. :—Held, upon motion for a mandamus, that the meeting was to be called by, and therefore the writ directed to the governors and guardians.

This was a rule, calling upon the churchwardens of the poor of the parish of St. Mary, Newington, in the county of Surrey, and the governors and guardians of the poor of the said parish, to shew cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, directed to them to call a vestry meeting of the inhabitants of the said parish, to fill up the vacancies in the lists of governors and guardians of the poor of the said parish for the present year, and to nominate and choose a sufficient number of persons to complete the said list pursuant to the provisions of the stat. 54 Geo. 3. c. cxiii. (local act).

That statute, after appointing certain persons governors and guardians of the poor, enacts, by section 3, "That it shall be lawful for the said governors and guardians to call a vestry meeting of the inhabitants of the said parish, on the Easter Tuesday in every year; at which said vestry meeting all the vacancies in the list of governors and guardians shall be filled up by poll or ballot, or in such way of election as shall be deemed most proper and convenient." There is then a proviso, that after the expiration of one year, "the inhabitants of the parish, in vestry assembled," shall nominate and choose twelve persons in lieu of those retiring each year.

On Easter Tuesday, in the present year, at a meeting of the vestry, held for the purpose of electing certain new governors and guardians of the poor, in place of those who had gone out by rotation or from other causes, an election of the requisite number took place in the following manner:—Two candidates were proposed for the first vacancy, and a shew of hands being had, the one in whose favour the majority was declared to be was elected to fill that vacancy, and then another pair of candidates were put up for the next vacancy, and the same course pursued in respect of each vacancy separately. This had been always the course pursued since the passing of the local act, 54 Geo. 3. c. cxiii. On the present occasion several candidates were so elected, without objection; but at length, on one being rejected, a poll of the parish was demanded, and refused by the chairman; and the vacancies were then filled up in the manner before described.

Upon these facts the above rule had been obtained, against which—

Telford, Serj., on behalf of the churchwardens and overseers, shewed cause (May 11).—After Campbell v. Maund (1), the particular mode of election cannot be supported; but the question which the parties wish to have decided is, whether the election is to be confined to those present at the meeting. He then commented upon the words of the section, and the words used in the 57th section as to appointing overseers by the inhabitants “then present.”

Collier, on behalf of the governors and guardians, submitted that the act intended the vestry to be assembled in the ordinary way, and that the writ should, therefore, not be directed to them. He referred to 58 Geo. 3. c. 69, Dawe v. Williams (2), 1 & 2 Vict. c. 45, and the different sections of the local act.

Lush, in support of the rule.—It is clear that it is not a valid mode of election, and no reason can be given why all the electors should not have the opportunity to record their votes. He also referred to the various clauses of the local act on both points.

On a subsequent day (May 27) judgment was delivered by—

COLERIDGE, J.—This was a rule for a mandamus to be directed to the governors and guardians of the poor, and to the churchwardens and overseers of the poor, of the parish of St. Mary, Newington, calling on them to hold a vestry meeting of the same parish, for the purpose of electing certain new governors and guardians in the place of those who had gone out by rotation, or for other cause, at or before Easter week. The requisite members had been, in fact, elected, but by a mode which, it was admitted, could not in itself be sustained; and the questions raised were, whether that mode had been effectually questioned on the last election; what was the right mode of election to be pursued for the future; and, as regards the governors and guardians, whether the writ could properly be directed to them.

The parish, as to the regulation of the poor, is under a local act, 54 Geo. 3. c. cxiii, by the 3rd section of which it is provided, that at a vestry meeting to be held on Easter Tuesday in every year, “all the vacancies in the list of governors and guardians shall be filled up by poll or ballot, or in such way of election as shall be deemed most proper and convenient.” Since the passing of the act the mode of election pursued, in case of any contest, has been to propose two candidates for each vacancy, separately, however many places there might be to be filled up. On a shew of hands being taken, the one in whose favour it appeared to be has been declared elected, and the other rejected; and then two other candidates have been proposed for the next vacancy. In this way, on the present occasion, several candidates were elected without objection; but at length, on the rejection of a candidate, he demanded a poll of the inhabitants of the parish, and this was refused by the chairman, who proceeded to complete the elections according to the mode hitherto in use. It is clear that mode cannot be sustained, for it does not ascertain the sense of the meeting with regard to all the candidates. The individual rejected for the first vacancy may have had a greater number of hands held up for him than the successful candidates for the second or any subsequent vacancy, and yet is rejected from all. So, again, the individual elected to fill the first vacancy who has only been opposed to one competitor, might have been rejected had he been opposed to all, or some of the succeeding competitors; and even if it could be considered that on the present occasion the meeting had decided this to be "the most proper and convenient way of election," which it would be difficult to hold on the facts stated in these affidavits, yet, I think, such decision would not have legalized it. Those general words in the act must receive a reasonable limitation so as not to defeat the very object, which is to secure filling up the vacancies by a real election made by the inhabitants in vestry assembled; and the right to determine the mode of election is limited to a choice among such modes as may secure that end, as the two specified modes of poll and ballot do. For the same reason, it appears to me that where many vacancies are to be filled, a shew of hands is always an objectionable mode of election: if the candidates are proposed separately, it is morally impossible to preserve accurately in the mind the comparative number of hands raised for each; if they are proposed in lists, the electors have not the opportunity of discriminating between the individuals of the several lists, but must vote for or against the whole of each list, though they might wish to make a selection from all. What shall be a proper mode of election the statute leaves open to question only on one or two points. It must be by poll, ballot, or such mode as shall be deemed most proper or convenient, the judgment as to this being limited in the manner I have already pointed out. The party to pronounce that judgment must be the meeting at large, for it is not of common right inherent in the chairman, nor is it given to him by this or any other statute, and he cannot have acquired it by custom.

But whatever the mode of election be, whether poll or ballot, or some other mode determined on by the meeting, the second and remaining question is, who are to be the electors? in other words, must the election be made by those only of the inhabitants present at the commencement of the poll, or, at all events, arriving during its continuance on that day? or is the poll to continue by reasonable adjournments, so that the inhabitants generally may poll in the election? It was admitted to be now clearly settled that the latter was the proper course in general; but the words of the 3rd section of the local act were relied on in support of the former. A vestry meeting is to be called on Easter Tuesday in every year, "at which said vestry meeting" the vacancies are to be filled up. "The inhabitants in vestry assembled in such manner and at such time as aforesaid are to nominate and choose." This language does not appear to me strong enough to controul the general rule of law which is founded on reason, and by which alone in large parishes it is possible for elections to be made by the majority of those entitled to have a voice in them. The vestry meeting remains the same, however many times it may be adjourned in consequence of the number of electors. In the general act for the regulation of parish vestries, 58 Geo. 3. c. 69, both in the 2nd and 3rd sections are words that in a strict and literal sense might seem to restrain the right of interference to those vestrymen who are present when the vestry is first constituted; but they have never been so construed. I think, therefore, not only was the mode pursued wrong, but that it was properly questioned by the objector who demanded a poll of the inhabitants generally.

The remaining question as to the parties to whom the writ is to be directed, depends on the interpretation to be given to the 3rd section. By the 2nd section certain persons ex officio, and certain others named, are appointed governors and guardians; by the 3rd, provision is made for the temporary supply of vacancies occurring between Easter and Easter: this is to be done by the remaining or continuing governors and guardians, and these are at Easter to call a vestry meeting of the inhabitants of the parish on Easter Tuesday, at which the elections are to be made. Then follows this proviso:—"Provided always, that after the expiration of one year from Easter Tuesday next after passing this act it shall and may be lawful for the inhabitants of the said parish in vestry assembled, in such manner and at such time as aforesaid, also to nominate and choose twelve persons," &c. It was contended that the words "in vestry assembled" were to be separated from those which immediately follow; that the vestry was, therefore, to be called in the ordinary way; and that the governors and guardians had nothing to do with the calling it. It seems to me a more reasonable way of reading the sentence to connect the words "in such manner and at such time as aforesaid" with the words "in vestry assembled;" and then "assembled in such manner" will mean, among other things, "assembled in virtue of a summons from the governors and guardians." I see no reason for supposing that the legislature intended to make any distinction between the vestry which was to supply vacancies at the first election and that which was to perform the same functions at the succeeding Easter. The vestry meeting is a special one, assembled for the special purpose of this election under the local act, the provisions of which generally the governors and guardians must be supposed to be better acquainted with than the ordinary parish officers; and it is more especially their duty to see that all necessary steps are taken for securing the proper elections into their own body. The rule, therefore, will be absolute, and the writ be directed to the governors and guardians, limited, of course, to the filling vacancies where the elections were made after the objection taken.

Borough Fund—Indictment, Costs of—Place where Offence committed—Trial—Judge's Order—Mandamus.

Three persons were indicted at the assizes for the county of S. for forging the will of C. D. It appeared that C. D. died in the borough of O, and that one of the prisoners took away the deeds, &c. of the deceased to his own house, which was in the county of S, but not in the borough of O; that the forged signatures of the testatrix and of one of the witnesses were written in the borough of O, and that the offence was completed in the county of D, where the forged signature of the second witness was written. The borough of O. did not contribute to the county rate, but had a borough fund of its own:—Held, that the order for payment of all costs and expenses of the prosecution was properly made on the treasurer of the borough of O.

Secondly, that a mandamus would lie to the treasurer to compel payment.

This was a rule calling upon George Cooper, the treasurer of the stock of the borough of Oswestry, in the county of Salop, to shew cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, directed to him, commanding him to obey an order made by the Justices of assize at Shrewsbury in the said county, dated the 25th day of March, A.D. 1846; and, in pursuance of such order, to pay unto the prosecutor, Joseph Bassett, for his expenses, loss of time, and trouble in the prosecution of John Hayward, David Jones, and John Jones for felony, the sum of 73*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, and the further sum of 10*l.* 3*s.*, for the expenses of attending before the examining magistrate, as ascertained by his certificate, and to the several witnesses, that is to say, A, B, C, D, &c., the several sums stated in the rule.

It appeared that, at the Spring Assizes, 1846, an indictment was preferred, before the grand jury of the county of Salop, against the three persons named in the rule, for forging a document, purporting to be the will of Sarah Jones. It appeared that Sarah Jones resided in Oswestry, and that Hayward resided with her at the time of her death. As soon as she died he carried off the papers which were in her possession, to his own house, which was not in the borough of Oswestry, but was in the county of Salop. The signatures of the name of the testatrix and of one of the attesting witnesses were put to the will by the prisoners, in the borough of Oswestry; but the will was not complete so as to be uttered and pass as such until the signature of the second witness was put to it. This was done at Wrexham in Denbighshire. The prisoner Hayward, who uttered the will after it was forged, was apprehended in the county, and not in the borough. The warrant and information charged the offence to have been committed at Leominster, in the county of Salop. In the indictment the venue was laid in that county. It was also sworn that Oswestry was a borough not contributing to the county rate; but that in lieu thereof a rate, in the nature of a county rate, was raised within the borough.

James Wilde shewed cause.—The order of the Judge who tried the cause (the Lord Chief Baron) was made under a misapprehension. The borough fund is not liable to the costs. The offence, if not committed in the county, was at least supposed to be so; and it is treated throughout as a county prosecution. The offence was not complete, and it may be said, indeed, that there was no forgery until the will had the signature of the attesting witness.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Is there any case deciding that there is no crime till the will is complete (1)?]

It cannot be called a will till it is attested. The statute 7 Geo. 4. c. 64. does not provide for cases where the offence has been committed partly in a county and partly in a borough, though the 12th section provides that if any felony or misdemeanour shall be begun in one county and completed in another "it may be inquired of and tried in any of the said counties in the same manner as if it had been actually and wholly completed therein" (2). The offence here

(1) In Wall's case, 2 East, P.C. 953, the prisoner "was convicted upon an indictment for forging and knowingly uttering a will of land of J. S. deceased. The will was attested by two witnesses, and it did not appear in evidence what estate the supposed testator had in the land so devised, or of what nature it was; wherefore it might be presumed to be freehold, and therefore the will void and of none effect by the express enactment of the Statute of Frauds for want of the attestation of three witnesses; the Judges, on conference, in Easter term, 1800, held the conviction wrong; for as it was not shewn to be a chattel interest, it was to be presumed to be freehold."

(2) Statute 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 66. s. 3. makes the forging a will felony. Section 24. provides, that the offence may be dealt with, indicted, tried, and punished, and laid and charged to have been committed in any county or place in which the person who forged shall be apprehended or in custody, as if his offence had been actually committed in that county or place. Statute 7 Geo. 4. c. 64. s. 22. provides that the Court, before which any person shall be tried for any felony, may order the payment of expenses of the prosecutor and witnesses on the trial, &c. as well as those incurred in attending before the magistrate, &c. Section 24, that except as after mentioned, such order is to be made on the treasurer of the county, &c., where the offence shall have been committed, or supposed to have been committed. By section 25, expenses, in respect of felonies committed in liberties, &c. not contributing to the county rate are to be paid out of the borough fund or rate, and the order is to be directed to the treasurer, &c.

was properly tried in the county; and there being no power of apportionment the whole costs ought to be paid out of the county rate.

[PATTESON, J.—There is nothing to shew that any part of the offence was committed in any part of the county of Salop, but the borough of Oswestry.]

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Is there any precedent for a mandamus in such a case?]

Tomlinson, contra.—The Court will enforce the order, rather than leave the parties to an indictment, when a single Judge would have to dispose of a difficult question of law. In The Queen v. Clark (3) a mandamus was refused, but that was on the merits of the particular application.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I think the order was properly made on the borough of Oswestry. It is a case which appears to me to be within the exception in the statute 7 Geo. 4. c. 64. s. 25. I also agree that we should not canvas these matters. The treasurer should obey the Judge's order.

PATTESON, J.—I am of the same opinion. The offence was committed partly in the county of Salop and partly in the county of Denbighshire; but in no part of Salop, except Oswestry.

COLERIDGE, J. and ERLE, J. concurred.

Copyright—Piracy—5 & 6 Vict. c. 45.
 —Musical Composition—Place of Dramatic Entertainment—3 Will. 4. c. 15.

The plaintiff was the original composer of the music of a song of a narrative character, which he sang publicly for profit, and accompanied it by gesture and expression. The defendant announced by handbills the performance of, and subsequently performed, the plaintiff's song at Crosby Hall, a place licensed for music and dancing under 25 Geo. 2. c. 36.

In an action for penalties under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45,—Held, first, that the plaintiff's song was a musical composition within the 20th section of that act. Secondly, that Crosby Hall was a place of dramatic entertainment within 3 Will. 4. c. 15. Thirdly, that the allegation in the declaration in the terms of the statute, that the plaintiff had the "sole liberty of representing a certain musical composition," was a sufficient statement of the plaintiff's right. Fourthly, that it was not necessary that the plaintiff, who was the assignee of the copyright of the words, should be registered under section 14. before bringing the action.

Debt for penalties under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. The declaration stated, that after the passing and coming into operation of the 3 Will. 4. c. 15, 'For amending the laws relating to dramatic literary property,' and after the passing and coming into operation of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, 'For amending the law of copyright,' and before and at the time of the wrongful misrepresentation and performance, as hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiff had and still hath the sole liberty of representing and performing a certain musical composition called, to wit, 'The Ship on Fire,' yet that after the passing and coming into operation of the said acts of parliament, and whilst the plaintiff had such sole liberty of representing and performing the said musical composition as aforesaid, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the 22nd of December, A.D. 1845, and within twelve calendar months now last past the defendant did, contrary to the true intent and meaning, and against the provisions in that behalf of the said acts of parliament, and without the consent in writing of the plaintiff first had and obtained, to wit, at a place of dramatic entertainment, called, to wit, Crosby Hall, in the parish, &c., wrongfully and injuriously represent and perform the said musical composition contrary to the form, true intent and meaning, and against the provisions in that behalf of the statutes in such case made and provided, whereby and by reason of the premises, and according to the provisions of the said statutes, he, the defendant, forfeited and hath become and still is liable to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 40s. for the said offence, whereby, &c.

Plea—Nil debet.

At the trial, before Erle, J., at the Sittings in London, after Easter term, 1847, it appeared that the plaintiff was the original composer of the music of a song called 'The Ship on Fire,' which he sung and represented at public concerts; and that the defendant, after previous public announcement, sang the song at a place called Crosby Hall, in the city of London, for his own benefit. The following is a copy of the programme or advertisement of the performance, produced at the trial:—

"Crosby Hall, Bishopsgate Street.—Mr. Henry Smith (from America) begs respectfully to announce that his third vocal entertainment (interspersed with anecdotes) this season, will take place on Monday evening, December 22nd, 1845. Tickets 1s. each, reserved seats 2s., to be had of Messrs. Keith, Prowse & Co., Cheapside; Purday, St. Paul's Churchyard; Turner, Poultry; Peachey & Pearson, Bishopsgate Street; Folkiens, King William Street; at Crosby Hall; and of Mr. H. Smith, 4, Wilmot Street, Russell Square. To commence at eight o'clock precisely.

"Programme. Part 1, Descriptive Ballad, —'Land, ho!' words by G. P. Morris of New York. [Here a verse of the poetry is introduced.] This song is intended to describe the joy of passengers after a long and tedious voyage across the Atlantic. Descriptive scena,—'The Dream of the Reveller,' (a temperance song; words by Charles Mackay). Ballad,—'Woodman, spare that Tree:' words by G. P. Morris. Descriptive scena,—'The Shipwreck,' third time: words by Alexander Johnson, Esq. Descriptive cantata,—‘The Maniac:’ words by Monk Lewis. Song,—‘The Boatmen of the Ohio,’ (a national American negro melody). Part 2. Descriptive scena,—‘The Gambler’s Wife.’ Descriptive song,—‘The Newfoundland Dog:’ words by F. W. N. Bayley, (founded upon an incident that occurred on board an East Indiaman, on her homeward voyage, in the year 1841). Song, ‘I’m afloat, I’m afloat!’ ‘The Rover’s Song:’ words by Eliza Cook. Descriptive scena,—‘The Ship on Fire:’ words by Charles Mackay, Esq. (This scene is founded upon the loss of the Kent, East Indiaman, which was totally destroyed by fire in the Bay of Biscay.) Finale, ‘Come along, my Darling,’ (a national American negro melody).”

In consequence of the above advertisement a numerous audience was collected, money being taken at the door for admission. Crosby Hall is a place licensed by the Justices at sessions, under the 25 Geo. 2. c. 36, for dancing, music, &c. It appeared that the defendant performed the song, accompanying himself at the piano, using gesture and expression, but without scenic dress, or scenic representation by other performers. There was a raised platform, on which he was placed in view of the audience. The plaintiff’s witnesses spoke of the song as an original dramatic song; and no witnesses were called for the defendant. It was objected, on the part of the defendant, first, that the song in question was not a musical composition within the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. s. 20. Secondly, that Crosby Hall was not a place of dramatic entertainment within the 3 Will. 4. c. 15. s. 2. (1) The learned Judge directed the jury, that, in his opinion, the song was a dramatic composition, and Crosby Hall, in this instance, a place of dramatic entertainment. It was further objected that the plaintiff, who was the assignee of the copyright of the words of the song, should have been registered under the 24th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. The jury, under the learned Judge’s direction, retrary to the intent of this act, or the right of the author, &c. represent, or cause to be represented, without the consent of the author or other proprietor first had and obtained, at any place of dramatic entertainment within the limits aforesaid, any such production as aforesaid, or any part thereof, every such offender shall be liable for each and every such representation to the payment of an amount of not less than 40s., or to the full amount of the benefit or advantage arising from such representation, or the injury or loss sustained by the plaintiff therefrom, whichever shall be the greater damages, to the author or other proprietor of such production so represented contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, to be recovered, together with double costs of suit, by such author or other proprietor, in any court having jurisdiction in such cases in that part of the United Kingdom, &c. where such offence shall be committed; and in every such proceeding where the sole liberty of such author or his assignee as aforesaid shall be subject to such right or authority as aforesaid, it shall be sufficient for the plaintiff to state that he has such sole liberty, without stating the same to be subject to such right or authority, or otherwise mentioning the same.

The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. s. 20, after reciting the last-mentioned statute, and that it was expedient to extend to musical compositions the benefits of that act, enacts that the provision of the said act, 3 Will. 4. c. 15, shall apply to musical compositions, and that the sole liberty of representing, &c. or causing, &c. any dramatic piece or musical composition, shall endure and be the property of the author thereof, and his assigns, for the terms in this act provided for the duration of the copyright in books, and provides for the registering, &c., and that the first representation or performance of any dramatic piece shall be deemed equivalent in the construction of the act to the first publication of any book.

Section 24. enacts that no proprietor of copyright in any book shall maintain any action, &c. in respect of any infringement of such copyright, unless he shall before commencing such action, &c. have caused an entry to be made in the book of registry of the Stationers Company of such book pursuant to the act. Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall prejudice the remedies which the proprietor of the sole liberty of representing any dramatic piece shall have by virtue of 3 Will. 4. c. 15.

Section 2. provides, (amongst other things) that the words “dramatic piece” shall be construed to include and mean every tragedy, comedy, play, opera, farce, or other scenic, musical, or dramatic entertainment.

(1) See Russell v. Smith, 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Ch. 340.

The statute 3 Will. 4. c. 15, after reciting the 54 Geo. 3. c. 156, and that it was expedient to extend the provisions of that act, provides, that after the passing, &c. the author of any tragedy, comedy, play, opera, farce, or any other dramatic piece or entertainment, composed, and not printed or published by the author thereof or his assignee, or which hereafter shall be composed, &c. shall have as his own property the sole liberty of representing, or causing to be represented, at any place or places of dramatic entertainment whatsoever, in any part of Great Britain, &c. any such production as aforesaid.

And by section 2, if any person shall, during the continuance of such sole liberty as aforesaid, con-turned a verdict for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit on the objections made at the trial.

Watson, in Trinity term, having obtained a rule nisi accordingly; and also for arresting the judgment, on the ground that the "sole liberty" of representation was a claim of a more extensive right than was conferred by the act of parliament,—

Talfourd, Serj., Locke, and Wise shewed cause (3).—It cannot be said that a song such as this is not within the letter of the act. No one will deny that a song is a "musical composition;" but it is said that the act was meant to apply only to musical compositions of a dramatic character, i. e. to musical dramas or operas. It is to be remembered that a performance is not the less dramatic because it is musical, or that it is less a dramatic performance because it comprehends but one act. The statute does not define or limit the nature of musical composition. The Greek dramas were musical in their character, and the mono-dramatic performance of the late Mr. Mathews would of course have been within the protection of the statute. Secondly, Crosby Hall was clearly a place of dramatic entertainment. The statute is not confined to theatres—Gallini v. Laborie (4). If this question had been merely one of fact, the defendant should have required that it should be left to the jury. As a question of law the Court will look at the various clauses of the act of parliament. According to the Interpretation clause "dramatic" includes "musical." Crosby Hall by the representation of this piece, became a place of "musical" (and therefore of "dramatic") entertainment. As to the motion in arrest of judgment, it is said that the plaintiff should not have claimed the sole liberty of representing, &c., but should have limited it to "places of dramatic entertainment in England," &c.; but it is enough to have followed the very words of the act—Lee v. Simpson (5), Macmurdo v. Smith (6). As to the registration, the right of representation is quite distinct from copyright, and the words of the 24th section plainly point to books only.

Watson and J. Brown, contra.—First, according to the argument on the other side, the statute must extend to every song; but it never could be the intention of the legislature to subject every man or woman singing, it may be in a private room, to the penalty of the act. The intention was to protect musical compositions of a dramatic character, and in order to bring them within the penal provisions of the statute they must be performed at a place of dramatic entertainment. Would a piece of sacred music performed at a chapel or church render the performance liable to the penalty? That would be so by arguing in a circle: the plaintiff would make out that the place of performance becomes a place of dramatic entertainment by reason of the performance itself, and that the thing performed or represented becomes dramatic by reason of its being performed at a place of dramatic entertainment.

[LORD DENMAN, C. J.—You invite the public.]

But it is not enough that the public are allowed to enter. A benefit concert given at a private residence would not be considered within the act. The performance should have a dramatic character independently of the music, e.g. 'The Beggars' Opera.' This was a narrative song. There was no acting, as the defendant was the only performer, and he played the piano whilst he was singing. Secondly, Crosby Hall is not a place of dramatic entertainment. It is a library where singing occasionally takes place. If it is a place of dramatic entertainment Exeter Hall is so also.

[ERLE, J.—Why should the composer of an oratorio have less protection than the composer of 'The Beggars' Opera' ?]

The King v. Handy (9). If this is a place of dramatic entertainment it will be necessary for the proprietor to have a licence from the Lord Chamberlain, under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 68 (10), and persons frequenting it are at present liable to be taken into custody under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 (11). Lastly, the judgment ought to be arrested. Macmurdo v. Smith is not in point; the plaintiff here states a right which the law does not give him. The "sole right of representation" must mean a right to represent the piece everywhere, and the breach does not cure it, as it is stated that the defendant performed the piece, to wit, at a place of dramatic entertainment. As the declaration stands the defendant would have been equally liable if he had sung the song in a private room. Lastly, unless this is clearly a dramatic piece the plaintiff should have been registered under section 24. before he could maintain the action. This was a musical composition to which the provision as to registry would apply.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. subsequently (May 30th) delivered the judgment of the Court. —This action was brought for performing a musical composition, of which the plaintiff was the composer, at Crosby Hall. At the trial the Judge was taken to have directed,

(9) 6 Term Rep. 286.

(10) Which provides (sect. 2), that it shall not be lawful for any person to have or keep any house or other place of public resort in Great Britain for the public performance of stage plays, without authority, by virtue of letters patent from Her Majesty, or without licence from the Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty's household, under a penalty of 20*l.* for each day of performance.

By the interpretation clause (sect. 23), the words "stage play" are to be taken to include every tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, or other entertainment of the stage, or any part thereof. Provided, that the act is not to apply to any theatrical representation in any booth or show allowed by Justices of the Peace at a lawful fair.

(11) By 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47. s. 36. power is given to the Commissioners of the Metropolitan Police to authorize, in writing, any superintendent of the police, and with such constables as he may think necessary, to enter into any house or room kept or used for stage plays or dramatic entertainments, into which admission is obtained by payment of money, and which is not a licensed theatre, at any time when it is open for the reception of persons resorting thereto, and to take into custody all persons found therein without lawful excuse.

and the jury to have found such matters, as were requisite for maintaining the plaintiff's case, liberty being reserved to the defendant to move to reverse that decision; and the defendant has since contended before us, first, that the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, by enacting that the provisions of 4 Will. 4. c. 15. shall apply to musical compositions, extends only to the performance of musical compositions in places of dramatic entertainment, and that Crosby Hall was not such a place. And, secondly, that the musical compositions to be protected were those composed for performance with dramatic pieces, the composition in question not being in that class. It is not necessary for us to decide whether the statute is to be so restricted in respect of the compositions and places of performance comprised within it, because we are of opinion both that 'The Ship on Fire' was a dramatic piece, and that Crosby Hall became upon the occasion of this performance a place of dramatic entertainment within the meaning of these statutes. It was proved that bills had been issued by the defendant announcing a vocal entertainment, with the price of tickets of admission, and giving a programme of the two parts of the performance. Of the particulars in the first part: 'The Dream of the Reveller' and 'The Shipwreck' are named descriptive scenes, and 'The Maniac' a descriptive cantata. Of the five particulars in the second part, 'The Gambler's Wife' and 'The Ship on Fire' are named descriptive scenes. The Hall was prepared with seats for the audience, and a stage for the performer, and the defendant, without scenes or appropriate dresses, accompanied his singing with a piano, and gave considerable expression to the matters described. The song in question is stated in the bill to be founded on the loss of the Kent, by fire, in the Bay of Biscay. It represents a storm at sea, the burning of the ship, and an escape by the boat to another ship, and so a safe return to land. It moves terror and pity and sympathy by presenting danger and despair, and joy and maternal and conjugal affection. A witness of great experience in publishing music deposed that this was considered a dramatic song, and published with the title of a dramatic and descriptive song, and there was no evidence that any one considered it not dramatic. Thus, the nature of the production places it rather in the representative than the narrative class of poetry, according to Lord Bacon's division of dramatic from epic; and the evidence states it to be known as dramatic among those who are conversant with such things. If the interpretation clause of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. be referred to, the second section declares that "dramatic piece" within that act, includes tragedy, comedy, play, opera, farce, or any other scenic, musical, or dramatic entertainment. These words comprehend any piece which could be called dramatic in its widest sense; any piece which on being presented by any performer to an audience, would produce the emotions which are the purpose of the regular drama, and which constitute the entertainment of the audience. They comprehend, therefore, the production in question, the nature of which in this respect was above pointed out. On holding this production to be a dramatic piece, we give effect to the intention of the legislature, as we collect it from the series of statutes relating to literary property, namely, to give authors the profits arising from the publication of their works. After the decision of Murray v. Elliston (12), it seems to have been considered, that publication to an audience was not within the provisions of the act relating to copyright; consequently the 3 Will. 4. c. 15. was passed, and in respect of dramatic literary property, gave to authors the profits arising from publication by representing the piece on the stage. As there appears no reasons for favouring one kind of literary property more than another, it is probable that this protection was intended for all productions adapted to this mode of publication. Now, the use of the production in question, both by the plaintiff and the defendant, shews that it is so adapted and is supposed to be profitable to those who publish it. The absence of scenes and appropriate dresses and a regular theatre has been urged for the defendant; but we should take away a part of the protection conferred on authors if we held that there could be no public representation without these accompaniments.

Upon the whole, therefore, we are of opinion, that 'The Ship on Fire' was a dramatic piece within the meaning of the statute.

(12) 5 B. & Ald. 657.

It follows, that as Crosby Hall was used for the public representation for profit of a dramatic piece, it became a place of dramatic entertainment for the time, within the statutes now in question.

The use for the time in question, and not for a former time, is the essential fact. As a regular theatre may be a lecture room, ball room, and concert room on successive days, a room used ordinarily for either of these purposes would become so for the time being. A theatre is used for the representation of a regular stage play. In this sense, as 'The Ship on Fire' was a dramatic piece, in our view Crosby Hall when used for the public representation and performance of it, for profit, became a place of dramatic entertainment. In thus deciding, we do not declare that the defendant's performances at Crosby Hall were unlawful without a theatrical licence, within the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68; and as to this we would remark, that the generic term in this statute is "stage play," whereas in the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, it is "dramatic piece," and there is some difference in the interpretation given of these terms in the respective statutes; and also that the purview of the last statute is the maintenance of good order by the police, and that of the first is compensation to composers, by securing literary property.

It was further contended that the action would not lie, because the plaintiff's right was not registered, and the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. s. 24. was relied on, which enacts, "that no proprietor of the copyright in any book should sue for infringement, unless he shall be registered, and provides that this shall not extend to the proprietor of the sole representing of a dramatic piece. The answer is, first, that the prohibition relates only to copyright of books, and does not comprise the sole liberty of performing a musical composition. Secondly, if it did, the proviso would except it, for the proviso excepts the sole liberty of representing a dramatic piece; and section 20. applies to musical compositions the provisions of the 4 Will. 4. c. 15. and of this act. An exception, therefore, in favour of the sole representation of a dramatic piece is extended to the performance of a musical composition. Thirdly, the enactment in section 20. does not assist the defendant, for by that the provisions thereinbefore enacted "in respect of the property of copyright and registering the same, are applied to the representation of dramatic pieces and musical compositions ;" but this of course does not comprise the provisions thereafter enacted, viz. by section 24.

With respect to the motion in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the plaintiff has claimed too large a right in his declaration, we are of opinion, that as he has followed the words of the 20th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, which gives the right, the declaration is sufficient. Whatever the act means by the words used in that section, the plaintiff means the same by his declaration, as was said by the Court, in delivering the judgment in the case of Lee v. Simpson. The rule of the defendant is, therefore, discharged.

          { FOSTER AND ANOTHER v. TEM-

County Court — Practice — Summons — Second Summons to save Statute of Limitations.

The plaintiffs described the defendant in a summons out of the county court as executor of A. B, and on the defendant's appearance opened the case against him as executor of C. D. The cause of action having accrued in 1842, the Judge directed a fresh summons to be issued, describing the defendant as executor of C. D, and bearing the same date as the first summons, in order to save the Statute of Limitations :—Held, that it was not a case in which this Court ought to interfere with what the Judge had done.

This was a rule obtained in Easter term last calling on "D. C. Moylan, Esq., Judge of the county court of the district of Westminster, and the plaintiffs in a certain plaint or action in the county court for the district of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, between Edward Foster and Edward Foster the younger, plaintiffs, and Henry Temple, executor, &c., defendant, to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to prohibit the said Court, the said Judge, high bailiff and other officers of the said court from further proceeding in the plaint or action in the said court."

It appeared from the affidavits on which the rule was obtained, that on the 3rd of April 1848 the defendant was served with a summons issued out of the above court, and which summons, numbered (a) 3967, was dated the 30th of March 1848, in which he was summoned as one of the executors of W. Thompson, to appear on the 14th of April 1848, to answer the above-named plaintiffs in an action for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the testator in his lifetime, and for money paid, &c. to the testator. In the particulars annexed to the summons, the goods were alleged to have been sold and delivered on the 9th of April 1842; and that the sum sought to be recovered of the defendant as executor as aforesaid, on account of the goods, &c. was 7*l.* 15*s.*, together with the expense of the summons, &c.

The defendant attended the court by counsel, in pursuance of the summons, on the said 14th of April; and on the hearing the solicitor for the plaintiffs opened the case against the defendant as executor of Frederick Welham Taylor, and not as executor of W. Thompson as the summons mentioned; whereupon the defendant's counsel objected to any evidence being given against the defendant, except as executor of W. Thompson as mentioned in the summons. The Judge held the objection fatal to the summons. Application was then made, on the part of the plaintiffs, to the Judge, to direct another summons to be issued bearing the same date and number as the first summons, for the purpose of saving the Statute of Limitations. This was objected to by the defendant's counsel, who requested the Judge to dismiss the summons, or declare the plaintiffs nonsuited. This the Judge refused to do; but directed another summons to be issued out in compliance with the plaintiffs' application. This was done accordingly, and the defendant was on the 24th of April served with a summons, numbered (a) 3967, dated the 30th of March 1848, and summoning him as one of the executors of F. W. Taylor, and to this second summons particulars were annexed exactly corresponding with the particulars annexed to the first summons. In the affidavit of the attorney for the plaintiffs, it was stated that on the 30th of March he made application in writing to the clerk of the Westminster County Court of Middlesex, and requested him to enter a plaint, wherein E. Foster and E. Foster the younger were plaintiffs, and H. Temple, one of the executors of the last will, &c. of F. W. Taylor, was defendant; and that the clerk of the court furnished him with a copy of the entry in the book of plaints, and interlocutory proceedings in the Westminster County Court of Middlesex. He further stated in his affidavit, that the Judge of the court held that the summons not having been issued in accordance with the 59th section of the stat. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95 (1), it amounted to a nullity; and on his urging that the plaintiffs would be barred by the Statute of Limitations, if the Judge ordered a nonsuit to be entered, the Judge referred to the 12th Rule of Practice of the Court, and after examining the book of plaints, and finding the plaint correctly entered pursuant to the before-mentioned application of the plaintiffs, which application the Judge also examined, he directed the said second summons to be issued. He also stated in his affidavit that there was no such court as the county court of the district of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex; and that the title of the court set out in No. 2. of the Order of Council made by virtue of the said statute is the "Westminster County Court of Middlesex."

Sir John Jervis (Attorney General), shewed cause on the part of the Judge of the court.—The plaint was right, and the plaintiffs therefore had commenced the action correctly. The summons or warning was wrong. In this court, if the writ were right and the declaration wrong it might be amended.

Udall, on behalf of the plaintiffs in the action.—The affidavits on which the rule was obtained are defective: first, for not setting-out the particulars of the plaintiffs' demand correctly: if that had been done, it would clearly have appeared that the defendant had full notice that he was sued in respect of goods supplied by Taylor; secondly, for misdescribing the court itself. There is no such court as the county court of the district of Westminster. There is a court styled the Westminster County Court of Middlesex.

Horry, contra.—The Judge decided that the objection was fatal, and the only question was, whether he could then issue a fresh summons. The 10th and 11th rules of the court only direct the mode of service of a summons, and do not apply. As the defendant had no notice of the nature of the demand until the summons was issued, no evidence could be given on the first summons; but it had been served, and therefore, rule 12. does not apply. He appears as executor of W. Thompson; and for anything that is now shewn to the contrary, he may be so. The mistake was occasioned by no act of the defendant, who ought not to be deprived of the power of pleading the Statute of Limitations—Roberts v. Bate (2).

(1) 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 59. enacts, "That on the application of any person desirous to bring a suit under this act, the clerk of the court shall enter in a book to be kept for this purpose in his office a plaint in writing, stating the names and the last known places of abode of the parties, and the substance of the action intended to be brought, every one of which plaints shall be numbered in every year according to the order in which it shall be entered; and thereupon a summons, stating the substance of the action, and bearing the number of the plaint on the margin thereof, shall be issued under the seal of the court according to such form, and be served on the defendant so many days before the day on which the court shall be holden at which the cause is to be tried, as shall be directed by the rules made for regulating the practice of the court, as hereinafter provided; and delivery of such summons to the defendant, or in such other manner as shall be specified in the rules of practice, shall be deemed good service; and no misnomer or inaccurate description of any person or place in any such plaint or summons shall vitiate the same, so that the person or place be therein described so as to be commonly known."

Section 75. enacts, "That no evidence shall be given by the plaintiff on the trial of any such cause as aforesaid of any demand or cause of action, except such as shall be stated in the summons hereby directed to be issued."

By the rules of practice for the county courts it is provided:—

Rule 1. Every plaint must be entered upon application at the office of the clerk, pursuant to the form in the plaint-book in the schedule to the rules.

Rule 12. Where any summons has not been served as hereinbefore directed, the Judge may in his discretion, in order to save the Statute of Limitations, direct another summons or successive summonses to be issued bearing the same date and number as the first summons.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. — The putting Thompson for Taylor was simply the mistake of the officer of the court. I think we cannot interfere with what the Judge has done.

A rule nisi had been obtained, calling upon an attorney to pay over a sum of money to his client, Mr. Randall, under the following circumstances:—Mr. Randall's goods having been seized by the sheriff of Middlesex, he instructed the attorney against whom this application was made to commence an action for the seizure. This was done, and the action was afterwards compromised, by payment of 69*l.* and costs to the attorney for Mr. Randall. Plea, that H, the former owner of the plaintiffs' coal mine, brought an action on the case against the defendant for breaking and entering the mine, in possession of S, and making excavations, and carrying away coal therefrom, and thereby injuring his reversionary estate, and that several sums were on that occasion awarded and paid to H, and to S, and to the plaintiffs, in respect of the injuries sustained by them respectively by the matters in the declaration in that cause alleged, and that the breaking and entering in the present action was part and parcel of the grievances in the declaration in the said action of H. mentioned, and in respect of which such damages were awarded, and that the same were so awarded and paid in respect of such damages and all consequential damages to arise or happen in consequence thereof.

At the trial it was proved that the coal mine was demised to the plaintiffs by S, in 1839, and that at that time H. was mortgagee, S. being mortgagor in possession, and that before the demise to the plaintiffs the defendant broke and entered and took away the boundary coal; that in 1840 the plaintiffs worked the mine till they came to the place where the excavations were made by such breaking and entering, and the water came in and had continued to flow in ever since; that according to the custom of mining the defendant, whose mine was on the rise, had a right to work to the extremity of his mine without leaving any barrier. It further appeared that, in 1841, H, the mortgagee, brought an action against the defendant for the breaking and entering above mentioned, and that the cause was referred to an arbitrator, with liberty to the now plaintiffs and S. to become parties to the reference; that substantial damages were awarded to H. and the now plaintiffs, and nominal damages to S:—Held, that, on the above facts, the defendant was entitled to a verdict on not guilty, and on the issue raised on the plea to the new assignment.

Case. The declaration stated that the defendant at the time of the committing, &c. was possessed of and entitled to a certain coal mine, lying and being under certain land in the county of Lancaster, and contiguous and next adjoining to a certain coal mine in the said county, formerly in the possession and occupation of one James Starky, but at the time of the committing, &c., and now, in the possession and occupation of the plaintiffs under a demise heretofore to them thereof made by the said James Starky; and that while the said last-mentioned coal mine was in the possession and occupation of the said James Starky, to wit, on the 31st day of December, A.D. 1838, the defendant broke and entered the said last-mentioned coal mine, and dug out of the same divers large quantities of coal, to wit, &c., and took and carried away the same, and thereby then made and caused a large, wide and extensive aperture and excavation into the said last-mentioned coal mine from the said coal mine of the defendant, and although the defendant after the said plaintiffs became possessed of the said coal mine under a demise to them thereof made by the said James Starky, to wit, on the 1st of August, A.D. 1841, was requested by the plaintiffs to fill and stop up the said aperture and excavation so made by the defendant as aforesaid; yet the defendant, well knowing the premises, but contriving, &c., to wit, on the 8th of August, A.D. 1841, and on divers other days &c., and while the said coal mine was in the possession and occupation of the plaintiffs as aforesaid, wrongfully and injuriously kept and continued and caused to be kept and continued for a long and unreasonable time, to wit, thence hitherto, the said aperture and excavation open and unfilled up, and during all the time aforesaid, neglected and refused and still neglects and refuses to fill and close up the same; whereby and by reason of the continuing and keeping by the defendant the said aperture and excavation so open and unfilled up as aforesaid, divers large quantities of water, which had gathered and collected, and were then standing in the said coal mine of the defendant next immediately adjoining to the said coal mine in the possession and occupation of the plaintiffs afterwards, and after the plaintiffs became possessed of the said last-mentioned coal mine, to wit, on &c., burst through and then ran and flowed from and out of the said coal mine of the defendant, through the said aperture and excavation in, upon, into and over the said coal mine then in the possession and occupation of the plaintiffs, and inundated and greatly damaged and injured the same, and the said large quantities of water have thence hitherto run and flowed, and still continue to run and flow from and out of the said coal mine of the defendant through the said aperture and excavation in, upon, into and over the said coal mine in the possession and occupation of the plaintiffs as aforesaid; whereby and by reason of the said large quantities of water inundating the said coal mine of the plaintiffs, and still continuing to run and flow in, upon and over the same, the plaintiffs and their servants and labourers have been hindered and prevented from working their said mine with profit and advantage, and from getting, cutting and digging the said coal from and out of the Fifth, that heretofore, to wit, on the 16th of February, A.D. 1841, one Hugh Hornby (clerk) impleaded the defendant in the Court of Exchequer in an action of trespass on the case, and therein declared that before and at the time of the committing of the grievance hereinafter mentioned, one James Starky held and enjoyed a certain close or piece of land called the Holmes, in the county of Lancaster, with the appurtenances, and a certain other close or piece of land, parcel of the bed of the river Roach, and covered with water of the said river, in the county aforesaid, as tenant to the said Hugh Hornby, the reversion thereof in his demesne as of fee expectant on the determination of the tenancy of the said James Starky, then belonging to and vesting in the said Hugh Hornby, and that the defendant did, whilst the said James Starky held and enjoyed the said closes as tenant thereof as aforesaid, and whilst the said reversion thereof belonged to and was vested in the said Hugh Hornby, to wit, on the 1st day of January, A.D. 1840, and on divers other days, &c., wrongfully and unjustly, and without the leave and licence of, and against the will of the said Hugh Hornby, break and enter into the said closes or pieces of land, and then made divers, to wit, 100 holes and 100 excavations in the strata and mines by and in the said closes under the surface thereof, and then dug and excavated divers, to wit, 1,000 tons of coal and 1,000 cart-loads of earth and soil from and out of the said closes in, under and below the surface thereof, and then carried away the same, and thereby caused divers, to wit, two acres of the roofs, and earth and soil, and coal and land of the said two closes immediately above, about and around the said holes and excavations to fall in, upon, about and in the said closes, and then and thereby choked up, damaged and spoiled divers, to wit, 5,000,000 tons of coal, and 50,000,000 tons of earth and soil of and in the said closes, &c., and thereby caused divers drains and watercourses and quantities of water to empty themselves, run, escape and flow unto and into the said two closes under and below the surface, flooding and injuring and spoiling the coal strata, earth and soil of the said two closes in, under and beneath the surface thereof, and thereby also then injured the said closes, and greatly thereby also then weakened and undermined and rendered insecure the surface of the said closes, and permanently injured the reversionary estate and interest of the said Hugh Hornby of and in the said two closes, and the mines, coal, strata, and soil thereof, by reason of which premises the reversionary estate of the said Hugh Hornby was greatly and permanently lessened in value; whereupon the said defendant afterwards, to wit, on &c., pleaded that he, the said defendant, was not guilty of the said grievances, or any or either of them, and divers other pleas in this behalf, and issues were thereupon joined upon the said pleas between the said Hugh Hornby (clerk) and the said defendant, and such proceedings were thereupon had, that afterwards, to wit, on &c., at the assizes holden at Liverpool, before &c., the said issues came on to be tried in due course of law by a jury of the county of Lancaster, duly summoned &c., between the said Hugh Hornby (clerk) and the said defendant, and thereupon by a rule or order then and there made at the assizes so holden as aforesaid, with the consent of the said Hugh Hornby, and the said defendant, their counsel and attorneys, and of the said James Starky, who thereby consented to become a party to the said rule or order, it was ordered by the Court at the said assizes, that the said jury should find a verdict for the said Hugh Hornby, damages 10,000*l.*, costs 40*s.*, subject to be reduced or vacated, and instead thereof a verdict for the defendant, or a nonsuit to be entered according to the award thereafter mentioned; and that the said cause and also all matters in difference between the said Hugh Hornby and the said defendant, and between the said James Starky and the said defendant, should be referred to the award, order, arbitration, final end and determination of one W. A. H., barrister-at-law; and it was also ordered by and with such consent as aforesaid, that the persons composing a joint partnership or mining company called the Heywood Colliery Company, or the Captain Fold Colliery, might if they should think fit, and should notify their desire and intention by writing under their hands, or under the hand of the attorney, to the said arbitrator, before he entered upon the hearing of the matters hereby referred to him, become parties to the said rule or order as to any alleged injury to them, or any of them, by any of the matters in the declaration in the said cause alleged; and that the said persons composing the said joint partnership or mining company, called the Heywood Colliery Company, or Captain Fold Company, who are the now plaintiffs in this suit, did, before the said arbitrator entered upon the hearing of the matters referred to him as aforesaid, to wit, on &c., certify their desire and intention, by writing, under the hand of their attorney, to become parties to the said rule or order, as to any alleged injury to them, or any of them, by any of the matters in the declaration in the said cause alleged, and that the said W. A. H. did, by virtue of the said order or rule of reference, take upon himself the burthen of the said arbitration, and did, on &c., duly make and publish his award, in writing, under his hand, of and concerning the matters so to him referred as aforesaid, and did thereby award, order, and determine that the said verdict for the said Hugh Hornby should stand, but that the damages should be reduced to the sum of 436*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*; and the said W. A. H. did further award, order, and adjudge that the said James Starky had sustained damages by the matters in the said declaration alleged, and did assess such damages at the amount of 1*s.*; and the said W. A. H. did further award, order, and determine that the said persons composing the said joint partnership or mining company, called the Heywood Colliery Company, and which said persons are the plaintiffs in this suit, had suffered damages in respect of certain injuries to them by the matters in the said declaration in the said cause alleged, and did assess such damage to the amount of 244*l.* 8*s.* ; and the said W. A. H. did further award that the last-mentioned sum of 244*l.* 8*s.*, and the said sum of 1*s.*, should be paid by the said defendant to the said James Starky and the said persons composing the said joint partnership, and who are the plaintiffs in this suit, or their attorneys respectively in that behalf, on or before the 7th day of March then next ensuing, at the office of, &c. Averment, that the defendant did duly pay the said respective sums of 436*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* and 1*s.*, and 244*l.* 8*s.* to the said Hugh Hornby, James Starky, and the said persons composing the said joint partnership or mining company, called the Heywood Colliery Company and now plaintiffs in this suit respectively, who then respectively accepted and received the respective sums of money so paid after the making of the said award, to wit, on the 7th day of March next ensuing the said award, that is to say, A.D. 1842, and that the said James Starky, in the declaration of the now plaintiffs named and mentioned, and the said James Starky, in the said declaration in the said action of the said Hugh Hornby, and also in the said rule or order of reference and the said award named or mentioned, and to whom the said sum of 1*s.* was so paid as aforesaid, are and were one and the same person, and not other or different persons, and that the said persons composing the said joint partnership or mining company, called the Heywood Colliery Company, were and are the plaintiffs in this suit, and not other or different persons, and that the said coal mine in the said declaration of the now plaintiffs was and is part and parcel of the said two closes or pieces of land in the said declaration in the said action of the said Hugh Hornby above mentioned, and of the coal, strata, earth, and soil of the said two closes so flooded, injured, and spoiled, as therein mentioned, and that the said breaking and entering the said coal mine in the said declaration and digging out of the same the said quantities of coal therein mentioned, and taking and carrying away the same, and making and causing the said aperture and excavation into the said last-mentioned coal mine, from the said coal mine of the defendant, were and are part and parcel of the grievances in the said declaration in the said action of the said Hugh Hornby and in the said award of the said W. A. H. mentioned, and in respect whereof such damages were awarded as aforesaid to the said Hugh Hornby, James Starky, and the said persons composing the said company and the now plaintiffs respectively, and were so awarded and paid as aforesaid, in respect of such damages as aforesaid, and all consequential damages to arise or happen in consequence thereof to the said Hugh Hornby, James Starky, and the said company and now plaintiffs respectively, or any persons thereafter claiming any interest under them, or any of them respectively. Verification.

Replication to the third plea, that the said causes of action, &c. did accrue to the said plaintiffs within six years, &c. modo et formá.

New assignment to the fifth plea, that the plaintiffs commenced their said action, and declared as aforesaid, not for the grievances in that plea attempted to be justified, but for that the defendant, after the commencement of the said action at the suit of the said Hugh Hornby, and after the making of the said award, to wit, on &c., and from the making of the said award thence hitherto kept and continued the said aperture and excavation so made by the defendant into the said coal mine of the plaintiffs, below the surface of the earth, open and unfilled up and unclosed, and after the making of the said award, and thence hitherto wrongfully suffered and permitted the said large quantities of water, which had gathered and collected, and were then standing in the said coal mine of the defendant, as in the declaration mentioned, to run and flow through the said aperture and excavation so made by the defendant as aforesaid, in, upon, into, and over the said coal mine of the plaintiffs, and to flood and inundate the same, and which, but for the making of the said aperture and excavation by the defendant as aforesaid, and digging out and carrying away the said quantities of coal therefrom, and keeping and continuing the same by the defendant, thence hitherto, open, unfilled up, and unclosed, would not have so run and flowed as aforesaid, and flooded and inundated the said coal mine of the plaintiffs, and that by reason of the said premises, and of the defendant neglecting to divert or otherwise drain off and dispose of the said large quantities of water which had so collected and accumulated in his said coal mine as aforesaid, so as to prevent the same from flowing through the said aperture and excavation so made by the defendant as aforesaid, and thus flooding and inundating the said coal mine of the plaintiffs, the said large quantities of water from the time of the making of the said award in the said last plea mentioned, and thence hitherto continued to run and flow, and at the time of the commencement of this suit still ran and flowed, and still do run and flow from and out of the said coal mine of the defendant in, upon, into, and over the said coal mine in the possession and occupation of the plaintiffs as aforesaid, in the manner and form as in the declaration alleged, being other and different grievances than those in the said last plea of the defendant mentioned, &c.

To the new assignment the defendant pleaded—First, not guilty. Secondly, that the said Hugh Hornby impleaded the defendant in such action as in the said last plea of the defendant to the said declaration mentioned, and that such several proceedings were had therein as in that plea mentioned, and that the said cause, and all matters in difference between the said H. Hornby and the said defendant, and between the said J. Starky and the said defendant, were so referred as in that plea mentioned by such rule or order as in that plea mentioned, and that such persons became parties to the said rule or order, and that such award was made, and that such damages were thereby awarded, and the damages so awarded were respectively paid by the defendant to the said respective parties, to whom the same were respectively so awarded as aforesaid, as in that plea mentioned, and the said persons, to whom the same were respectively paid, were respectively such persons as in that plea in that behalf alleged, and that the said damages were so awarded and so paid as aforesaid for and in respect of the matters in the declaration in the said action at the suit of the said H. Hornby alleged, and the injuries to the said persons in the said award mentioned by the matters in the said declaration in the said action at the suit of the said H. Hornby alleged, and for and in respect of all consequential damages thereafter to arise or happen, by reason of any of the matters or injuries in the said declaration in that cause alleged, to any of the said parties to the said reference, other than the said defendant, and all persons thereafter claiming any interest under them, or any of them respectively, and that though true it is that the grievances above newly assigned were grievances arising or happening after the commencement of the said action, at the suit of the said H. Hornby, and after the making of the said award, yet that the said grievances so newly assigned, and each and every of them, are merely and only consequential damages arising or happening to the plaintiffs by reason of the matters or injuries in the said declaration in the said cause at the suit of the said H. Hornby alleged, and the matters in difference and injuries so referred as aforesaid, and in respect of which such damages were so awarded and paid as aforesaid. Verification.

Replication, that the said award in the said last plea mentioned and referred to, was and is in the words following, that is to say, &c.—[the replication here set out the award verbatim, which was the same in substance as set out in the fifth plea,]—without this, that the said grievances so above newly assigned were merely and only consequential damages arising or happening to the plaintiffs by reason of the matters or injuries in the said declaration in the said cause, at the suit of the said H. Hornby, alleged, and the matters in difference and injuries so referred as aforesaid, or any or either of them, or any part, or in respect of which such damages were so awarded and paid as aforesaid, in manner and form, &c.

At the trial, before Wightman, J., at the Spring Assizes for Liverpool, 1845, the jury found the following special verdict.—That the plaintiffs were so owners of the colliery called Captain Fold Colliery, from 1830 to the time of the commencement of this suit; that by indenture made the 1st day of January 1839, between James Starky of the one part, and the plaintiffs of the other part, the said J. Starky granted, demised, leased, and set out to the plaintiffs all and every the mines, veins, and beds of coal and cannel, lying within or under all the tenement and estate and the demised lands of the said J. Starky, called the Heywood Hall estate in the township of Heap, in the parish of Bury, and in the county of Lancaster, for ninety-nine years; that the Heywood Hall estate comprised the lands from the west end or termination of a tunnel at Captain Fold, north-west to the defendant's colliery, comprising, amongst other things, the water-level from the said tunnel; that before the making of the said lease to the plaintiffs by J. Starky, the defendant had, by his servants, trespassed into that part of the Heywood Hall estate leased to the plaintiffs, which adjoined the defendant's mine, and got the coal out of the Heywood Hall estate, and, in getting that coal, had made an aperture and excavation into the coal of the Heywood Hall estate, at the north-westerly end of the water-level, which was so leased by the said J. Starky to the plaintiffs; that, afterwards and before the year 1839, the roof of the said excavation made by the defendant into the Heywood Hall coal, fell in by reason of his having got the coal and removed the pillars there, and the interstice became filled with water; that afterwards, in 1840, the plaintiffs drove a level from the said tunnel in and along the Heywood Hall estate coal, in a direction towards the defendant's mine, and until they came to a point at a distance, at from six to ten yards short of, and within their own boundary, when the waters which had collected in the defendant's mine flowed through the excavation and aperture at this point which had been made in the Heywood Hall estate as aforesaid; and that the defendant has not hitherto stopped or filled up the aperture, or done anything to prevent the flowing of the water from his mine through and into the said aperture and excavation made by him in the Heywood Hall estate; that neither the plaintiffs, nor the said J. Starky, nor the said H. Hornby (clerk), had any knowledge of the trespass, so as aforesaid committed by the said defendant, or of the aperture and excavation so made as aforesaid, or of the said roof having so fallen in, and the interstice having so become filled with water, until the plaintiffs, in driving their said level, met the excavated workings of the defendant at the above-mentioned point; that the defendant had not pumped any water out of his mine adjoining the Heywood Hall estate since 1840, and has ceased to work his own mine since 1842; that the plaintiffs' and the defendant's mines are on the same bed of coal, the defendant's on the rise, and the plaintiffs' on the dip, and that it is the custom in working coal mines, for the owner of the mine or bed on the rise to work up to the boundary of his coal on the dip, and for the owner of the mine or bed on the dip to protect his own mine from the influx of matter from the mine or bed on the rise, by leaving a sufficient barrier of coal on his own side of the boundary on the rise, and that the said distance of from six to ten yards left by the plaintiffs, beyond the end of their water-level aforesaid, would have been a sufficient barrier for the purpose aforesaid, if the defendant had not, by his said servants, made the aperture and excavation aforesaid; that the water, after the plaintiffs so drove the said water-level, continued to flow from the defendant's colliery into the said water-level, at the point above mentioned, through the said aperture and excavation, and thence run along the water-level to the said tunnel, and flooded the coal at Captain Fold Colliery, which said continued flowing of the water through the said aperture and excavation so made by the defendants are the grievances complained of in this action; that, in consequence thereof, the plaintiffs, in order to win and get the said coal of the Heywood Hall estate have ever since, up to the time of the commencement of this action, been obliged to pump out and discharge, and have pumped out and discharged, the said water so flooding the coal at Captain Fold Colliery along the said tunnel, and thereby have incurred considerable expenses in pumping the water out of the said last-mentioned colliery beyond what they heretofore had incurred, and which said expenses are sought to be recovered in this action; that, on the 16th day of February, A. D. 1841, the said H. Hornby (clerk), in the said pleadings named, brought his action set forth in the fifth plea of the defendant, and declared therein, and the defendant pleaded thereto, and such proceedings were had thereupon as in the fifth plea to the within declaration is mentioned; that before and at the time of the committing &c., the said H. Hornby was so seized of the closes in that declaration mentioned, and the same J. Starky was such tenant thereof, the said H. Hornby being mortgagee, and the said J. Starky his mortgagor in possession thereof; that the said closes respectively formed part and parcel of the said estate, called Heywood Hall estate, and that the plaintiffs' coal mine, mentioned in the within declaration, is underneath the surface of the closes mentioned in the declaration in the action mentioned by the said H. Hornby, and parcel of the same, and of the coal strata, and that such rule or order of reference as in the said fifth plea mentioned, was made as therein mentioned, and that such persons became parties to the said rule or order of reference, and that such award was made as in the pleadings in this suit mentioned, and that the damages given by such award were so paid by the defendant in pursuance of the said award to the said respective parties to whom the same were awarded, as in the fifth plea mentioned; that the coal in the declaration secondly-mentioned was, at the times of the committing, &c., to wit, from the 8th day of August, A.D. 1841, until the commencement of this suit, in the possession and occupation of the plaintiffs as within alleged by them; and that whether or not upon the whole matter aforesaid, by the jurors aforesaid, the defendant is guilty of the said grievances above laid to his charge as in the declaration and new assignment in this cause specified, and whether or not, upon the whole matter aforesaid, the said causes of action in the declaration in this suit mentioned or any of them accrued to the plaintiffs within six years next before the commencement of this suit, the said jurors are ignorant; and whether the said grievances, so newly assigned, were or were not merely and only consequential damages arising or happening to the plaintiffs by reason of the matters or injuries in the said declaration, at the suit of the said H. Hornby, and the matters in difference, and injury so referred as aforesaid, or in respect of which such damages were so awarded and paid as aforesaid, the jurors, &c. say that they are ignorant; and therefore they pray the advice, &c. And if upon the whole matter it should seem to the Court that the said defendant was guilty of the said grievances, or any part thereof, then the jurors aforesaid say that the defendant was guilty of the several grievances aforesaid; and if it should seem to the said Court that the said grievances or any of them did accrue to the plaintiffs within six years next before the commencement of this suit, then they, the jurors, &c., say that they did so accrue within six years; and if upon the whole matter it should seem to the said Court that the said grievances so newly assigned were not merely and only consequential damages, then the jurors, &c. say that they were not merely and only consequential damages in the several cases aforesaid; that the jury assess the damages of the plaintiffs, by reason of the grievances newly assigned as aforesaid, at 820*l.* above their costs and charges in this suit, and for those costs and charges at 40*s.* (1)

(1) The plaintiffs' points were: that the grievances were not merely and only consequential damages happening to the plaintiffs by reason of the grievances complained of by H. Hornby, and the matters so referred to Mr. Hulton, but were continuing grievances for which the arbitrator had not the power, and has made to them no compensation. Because the cause in Hornby and Dearden, and all matters in difference between Hornby the mortgagee and Starky the mortgagor were referred to and satisfied by the arbitrator's award, but only any injury to the plaintiffs (the lessees of the mines), by any of the matters alleged in the declaration in Hornby's suit were referred to Mr. Hulton, and by his award their injury, up to the time of the commencement of Hornby's suit, was only satisfied and paid to them, and that the further injury sustained by them to the extent of 820*l.* since the commencement of Hornby's suit is a continuation of the said grievances sustained by them, by the continuing flows of water from the defendant's mine through the excavations made by the defendant in the Heywood Hall estate, and so on through the aperture, spreading over the coal bed of the plaintiffs, has not been considered or compensated by the arbitrator, and that the plaintiffs, for the entire injury sustained by them, have been paid for part, up to the commencement of Hornby's suit, by Hulton's award, and now claim payment of the residue, 820*l.* in the present suit.

The defendant's points were: that the grievance stated in the declaration is a mere nuisance, viz. the not filling up an aperture and excavation formerly made by the defendant from his coal mine into a coal mine, then J. Starky's, now the plaintiffs'. That there was no legal duty on him to fill up such aperture and excavation. That the custom of mining, as found by the jury, shows the defendant's right to work his mine to the extremity of his own

This case was argued (April 28,) by—

Hoggins, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to recover either on not guilty or on the new assignment. They could not foresee the damages which have boundary, and therefore that he was under no legal obligation to erect a barrier on his own side of the boundary line between his mine and the mine now of the plaintiffs. That the accidental trespass by the defendant's servants in the coal strata of the adjoining Heywood Hall estate, afterwards leased to and now in the possession of the plaintiffs, did not create a legal obligation on the defendant's part to construct a barrier in the coal mine of the Heywood Hall estate (now the plaintiffs'), against the influx of water from the defendant's mine; but that the only consequence of that trespass was to give rights of action as well to the then occupier as to the reversionary owners of that estate respectively for such trespass and its consequences, in which actions full damages might be recovered for the diminished value of such estate, present and reversionary, comprehending the flooding of the coal, and the consequent future expense of working it. That the right of action for such trespasses, or any damage to be thereafter sustained from it, could not be assigned or transferred to the plaintiffs, who acquired their title after the trespass was completed. That the special verdict distinctly shews that the grievances complained of are the mere consequences of the original trespass, no wrongful act having been committed by the defendant or his servants since the plaintiffs acquired title and possession. That if in any case a duty on the part of a party trespassing specifically to reinstate property injured by the trespass could be implied, the jury should have found, as a fact, that such reinstatement was in this case practicable. That, on the contrary, it is obvious that such reinstatement was impossible, after the falling in of the roof, which occurred before the trespass was discovered, and before the plaintiffs acquired any title or interest. That any such duty, if existing, would be conditional upon the plaintiffs giving a licence to enter the plaintiffs' mine in order to perform it, and that such licence is not found as fact, nor any request from which it could be implied, though a request is alleged and traversed. That the former recovery by Hornby, the reversionary owner of the mine and coal strata (now the plaintiffs'), and Starky his tenant, of damages for the defendant's trespass, and payment of such damages as stated in the fifth plea to the declaration, and the further pleadings thereon, upon action brought, with reference to arbitration, after full discovery of the trespass, and of its irreparable nature, and of the consequent permanent injury to and diminished value of the coal strata (now the plaintiffs'), in the Heywood Hall estate (specifically complained of in Hornby's declaration) is a bar to the present action of the plaintiffs, who only derive title from Starky and Hornby, or one of them. That, at all events, the plaintiffs are barred by the recovery and payment of damages to themselves, as parties to that reference, which specifically comprehended any alleged injury to them from any arisen in consequence of the wrongful act which was the ground of the former action, and they could not have been estimated by the jury—Gillon v. Boddington (2), Roberts v. Read (3), Rosewell v. Prior (4), Firmstone v. Wheeley (5). Besides, the leaving the aperture open is a continuing grievance—Holmes v. Wilson (6), Hudson v. Nicholson (7). The defendant was bound to prevent the continuance of the injury—Thompson v. Gibson (8). The former recovery in case, by the reversioner, was for a present injury. He could not have sued in trespass—the mine being in the possession of his tenant; but the continuance is a positive grievance to the present owners (the plaintiffs), and the case falls directly within the principle of Rosewell v. Prior, Westbourne v. Mordant (9), Roll's Abr. 'Nuisance,' K, 2.

Martin (Tomlinson was with him), for the defendant.—First, no action will lie upon the facts as found by the verdict. Secondly, the plaintiffs' cause of action has been disposed of and satisfied by what took place under the reference to the arbitrator mentioned in the pleadings. First, the keeping of the matters alleged in Hornby's declaration, in which declaration the flooding of and permanent injury to, and permanently diminishing value of the coal strata (now the plaintiffs') were matters specifically alleged as damages consequent upon the defendant's trespass. That as the present plaintiffs could not have sued for the trespass itself, they could only be parties to the reference, for the purpose of receiving their proportion as leasees of the perpetual compensation to be made thereunder for the irreparable mischief and perpetual flooding of and consequent perpetually diminished value of the coal strata in question. That it is stated in the second plea to the new assignment, that the damages were awarded and paid to the plaintiffs in respect of all consequential damages thereafter to arise to the plaintiffs from the defendant's trespass; and this allegation is not traversed, but admitted by the replication, which only tenders the issue, that the grievances complained of are merely consequential damages from such trespass, whereas the special verdict distinctly shews that they are the mere consequences of such original trespass.

and continuing is, at all events, an ambiguous act, and the verdict finds that the defendant had a right to work up to the boundary of the plaintiffs' land. If there was any cause of action or grievance at all arising from an act of the defendant, it was this, that he did not go upon the plaintiffs' land and stop up the aperture which had been previously made; but such an action is unprecedented. The defendant was not bound to commit a trespass, by going on the plaintiffs' land, to restore the portion where the excavation is, to its original state, damages having been already awarded for its being in that state. Gillon v. Boddington, which is relied on by the plaintiffs, does not support the right to bring two actions, one for the original grievance and the other for the consequential damage. In that case the same state of facts appears to have existed as in Roberts v. Read, and there the action was entirely for the consequential damage, the defendant never having entered on the plaintiffs' premises at all. In Howell v. Young (10), Holroyd, J. draws the distinction between a cause of action and a measure of damages, referring to Fetter v. Beale (11). In that case the declaration stated that the defendant beat the plaintiff's head against the ground, and that the plaintiff brought an action for the battery, and recovered; and that since such recovery, by reason of the same battery, a piece of his skull came out. The defendant pleaded in bar the recovery mentioned in the declaration, and the plaintiff demurred, and contended that the subsequent damage was a new matter, which could not be given in evidence in the first action, because it was not known, and compared it to the case of a nuisance where every new dropping is a new act; but Holt, C.J. said, "Every new dropping is a new nuisance; but here is not a new battery, and in trespass the grievousness or consequence of the battery is not the ground of the action, but the measure of the damages, which the jury must be supposed to have considered at the trial." That principle applies to the present case. In Hodson v. Stallebrass (12), Littledale, J. observes, "A fresh action could not be brought unless there were both a new unlawful act and fresh damage." Holmes v. Wilson is distinguishable; for there the ground of action was the continuing buttresses formerly erected by the defendants, and as they might have removed them it was a continuous act. Hudson v. Nicholson is also distinguishable for the same reason—1 Roll. Abr. 176, F, pl. 1, 2, Hambleton v. Veere, 2 Wms. Saund. 169. The principle on which actions on the case for consequential damages are brought does not apply to land.

[PATTESON, J.—You would put it as if an action having been brought for breaking the plaintiff's window, a fresh action was afterwards brought because the rain came in.]

That illustration will well apply; and so an action will lie for erecting a wall on the plaintiff's land, but there can be no new action for not going on his land to remove the wall. In Holmes v. Wilson, Littledale, J. says, "If the defendant throws a heap of stones on the plaintiff's close, and there leaves them, will the trespass lie from day to day till they are removed?" The defendant, by entering the plaintiff's land to endeavour to prevent future mischief, would be a trespasser—Taylor v. Stendall (13).

The declaration also states, that the defendant was requested to enter the plaintiff's land, and stop the aperture. That allegation is expressly traversed; and it was not proved at the trial, nor is any request found by the verdict.

Hoggins, in reply.—The plaintiffs complain of a new and distinct grievance since the award of the damages, viz., the collecting by the defendant of a quantity of water, and allowing it to flow and come on the plaintiffs' land through the aperture, the making of which was the ground of the former action.

[PATTESON, J.—How does that appear?]

By the new assignment.

[PATTESON, J.—Your new assignment cannot be taken to enlarge or go beyond the cause of action stated in the declaration.]

If the new assignment states a grievance not comprehended in the declaration, the defendant should have demurred; but he cannot object to the form of the new assignment in this stage. Lastly, the request alleged to go on the land is immaterial.

[ERLE, J.—But it has been traversed, as it would seem, for the express purpose of preventing the plaintiffs from relying on its being admitted.]

It is admitted in the plea of "not guilty," and that raises the principal question in the cause.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—If you admit the plaintiff has got all the damages he was entitled to on account of the aperture being made, he is in the same situation as a plaintiff who has recovered damages for a hedge being pulled down. Could such a person recover in an action for consequential damages on every occasion that cattle strayed into his field, by reason of its being pulled down? Suppose the plaintiffs had themselves laid out money in stopping up the aperture and in taking precautions against future mischief, could they or could Hornby have recovered the sums so laid out as damages in the former action?]

LORD DENMAN, C.J. subsequently (June 7) delivered the judgment of the Court.—This was an action on the case for wrongfully keeping and continuing open an aperture made by the defendant from a mine belonging to him, into a mine which, at the time of making the aperture, belonged to James Starky, but which he afterwards demised to the plaintiffs, who were in the occupation of the mine before and at the time of the bringing of the action, by means whereof quantities of water continued to flow from the defendant's mine into the plaintiffs'. The defendant pleaded not guilty and other pleas; one of which was a special plea, stating in substance the bringing of a former action on the case by Hugh Hornby the owner of the plaintiffs' mine, James Starky being in possession as his tenant, against the defendant, for injury to his reversion, by breaking and entering his mine, and making the aperture in question, and thereby causing the water to flood the coal strata, and that the cause and all matters in difference between the said Hugh Hornby and the defendant, and between Starky and the defendant, were referred to an arbitrator, with liberty for the present plaintiffs to be parties to the reference as to any injury to them by reason of any of the matters alleged in that suit, and that the plaintiffs did become parties to that reference; and that the arbitrator awarded separate sums to Hugh Hornby, James Starky, and the plaintiffs for the damage they had sustained; that those sums were paid, and that they were awarded and paid in respect of all consequential damages arising from the matters complained of in the action by Hugh Hornby.

To the special plea the plaintiffs new assigned that they brought their action for keeping and continuing the aperture open after the award. To this new assignment the defendant pleaded, admitting that the grievances complained of in the new assignment happened after the award, that they were only consequential damages arising from the matters alleged in Hugh Hornby's action, and in respect of which damages were awarded and paid as before stated. To this plea the plaintiffs replied, setting out the award, and traversing that the grievances newly assigned were merely consequential damages as alleged in the plea.

Upon the trial the jury found a special verdict, by which it appeared that before and in 1839 James Starky was mortgagor in possession, and Hugh Hornby mortgagee of that part of the plaintiffs' mine into which the aperture was made; that in that year Starky demised to the plaintiffs the premises in question; that before that demise, and whilst Starky was mortgagor in possession, the defendant trespassed upon the mine in Starky's possession, by breaking into it from his adjoining mine, and taking the boundary coal in Starky's mine to the extent of several yards; that in 1840 the plaintiffs proceeded to work the mine, under the demise from Starky, and when they got to within from six to ten yards of the boundary between their mine and the defendant's, they came to the excavation made by the defendant, and the water from his mine came in upon them, and continued to flow in upon them to the time of the plaintiffs bringing their action. It also appeared that the plaintiffs' and defendant's mines were on the same bed of coal, but that the defendant's workings were on the rise, and the plaintiffs' on the dip, and that it is the custom for the miners on the rise to work to their boundary, and for the miners on the dip to leave a barrier of from six to ten yards in their mine to protect them against the water from the mine upon the rise.

The facts of the case are fully stated upon the special verdict; but this short reference to them and to the pleadings is sufficient for the purpose of our judgment. The question is, whether upon the pleadings and the facts found by the jury, the verdict upon not guilty, and the replication to the plea to the new assignment, should be found for the plaintiffs or for the defendant, it being agreed that the issues upon the second and third pleas should be entered for the plaintiffs, and the issue upon the fourth plea for the defendant. We are of opinion, that the defendant is entitled to have the verdict entered for him upon not guilty, and upon the issue upon the replication to the plea to the new assignment.

The gist of the action as stated in the declaration is, "the keeping open and unfilled up an aperture and excavation made by the defendant into the plaintiffs' mine." By the custom the defendant was entitled to excavate up to the boundary of his mine without leaving any barrier, and the cause of action, therefore, is the not filling up the excavation made by him on the plaintiffs' side of the boundary, and within their mine. It is not, as in the case of Holmes v. Wilson, a continuing of something wrongfully placed by the defendant upon the premises of the plaintiffs. Nor is it a continuing of something placed upon the land of a third person to the nuisance of the plaintiffs, as in the case of Thompson v. Gibson. There is a legal obligation to discontinue a trespass or remove a nuisance; but no such obligation upon a trespasser to replace what he has pulled down or destroyed upon the land of another, though he is liable in an action of trespass to compensate in damages for the loss sustained. The defendant having made an excavation and aperture in the plaintiffs' land was liable to an action of trespass; but no cause of action arises from his omitting to re-enter the plaintiffs' land to fill up the excavation. Such an omission is neither a continuation of a trespass nor of a nuisance; nor is it the breach of any legal duty. It was, however, contended, on the part of the plaintiffs, that, admitting this to be so, there nevertheless was a legal obligation or duty upon the defendant to take means to prevent the water from flowing from his mine into that of the plaintiffs, through the aperture he had made, and the case of Firmstone v. Wheeley, in the Exchequer, in Trinity term, 1844, reported in the 13th volume of the Law Journal Reports, was cited. The Court, however, in that case did not determine that there was any such duty or obligation; and if it had, that case would not be an authority applicable to the present, as the plaintiffs have not alleged any such duty or obligation in their declaration, nor is their action founded upon a breach of any such duty, if it exists, but upon the omissions to fill up the aperture made by them in the plaintiffs' mine. It appears to us that the defendant, upon the facts found by the jury, is entitled to have the verdict entered for him upon the plea of not guilty. The question that arises upon the new assignment is not very different from that which arises upon the plea of not guilty. The plaintiffs have already recovered damages against the defendant for making the aperture, and the omitting to enter the mine and fill up that aperture, in consequence of which the water continued to flow from the defendant's mine into the plaintiffs', affords no distinct ground of action, as for the continuance of a trespass or a nuisance. The flowing of the water and the damage thereby to the plaintiffs is merely consequential to the making the aperture, and for that the plaintiffs have already received compensation. The defendant, therefore, in our opinion is entitled to have the verdict entered for him upon the issue taken upon the replication to the plea to the new assignment.

Warrant of Imprisonment—Gaol—Date.

A party was committed under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, by an order under the hand of a Judge of an inferior court, (being a barrister-at-law,) for the term of forty days, to the common gaol, where debtors under judgment and in execution of the superior courts of justice may be confined within the county of Middlesex, in which he was then residing :—Held, that it was not necessary that the gaol in which he was imprisoned should be locally situate within the county of Middlesex, if it is the common gaol in which debtors resident within that county are confined.

Held, also, that the forty days would be calculated from the time when the party was taken into custody, and not from the date of the order.

Held, also, that the warrant need not be under seal.

Held, also, that the committal being in the absence of the party did not vitiate it.

A writ of habeas corpus having issued to bring up the body of N. Bowdler, who was confined in Whitecross Street Prison, a return was made by the gaoler, stating that he received him on June 6, 1848, and detained him under the following warrant :

"In the court of Her Majesty's Palace at Westminster, an inferior court of record for the recovery of debts.

"At a court held the 2nd day of June, A.D. 1848, at the Court House, Westminster, within the jurisdiction of the Court.

"Whereas N. Bowdler at the time of the granting of the summons hereafter mentioned was and now is indebted to W. Y. Fell, in the sum of 8*l.* 9*s.* and no more, besides costs of suit, amounting to 5*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*, by virtue of a judgment obtained in this court, for a cause of action within the jurisdiction thereof, on the 12th day of April, A.D. 1848, as appears to the Court here, by the record of the said judgment. And whereas the said W. Y. Fell did, on the 20th day of May in this present year, obtain a summons from this court in the form prescribed by an act for the better securing the payment of small debts, passed in the session of parliament held in the 8th and 9th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, and upon an application by him in writing, according to the form given by the said act; and the said N. Bowdler at the time of granting such summons, resided and was, and now resides and is, within the jurisdiction of this Court; by which summons the said N. Bowdler was required to appear before this Court at the court house aforesaid, this day. And whereas the said N. Bowdler hath been duly served with the said summons within the jurisdiction of this Court, but he hath not attended as required by the said summons, and hath not alleged a sufficient excuse for not attending: Now I do therefore order that the said N. Bowdler shall be committed for the term of forty days to the common gaol wherein debtors under judgment and in execution of the superior courts of justice may be confined within the county of Middlesex, in which the said N. Bowdler is now residing. And I declare that I was a barrister-at-law and a Judge of this court at the time the said summons was applied for and from thence to the present time.

"William Brent Brent.

"To Henry Herrick, an officer of the said court, and to the keeper of the Debtors Prison (above mentioned) for the county of Middlesex."

The following indorsements were on the warrant :—

"Defendant is entitled to his discharge on payment of 1*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*, and all subsequent costs.

"Taken in custody June 6, 1848, and lodged in the Debtors Prison for the county of Middlesex, the same day. Defendant a publican residing at Poplar.

"H. Herrick."

Pashley now moved that the prisoner should be discharged on the above return.—The place of imprisonment is wrong. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127. s. 1. only authorizes a committal to a gaol within the county, which this is not, being locally situate in London, though it is to be used as a debtors prison for both London and Middlesex. There is nothing in the 52 Geo. 3. c. 209. establishing Whitecross Street Prison, by which it is to be taken to be in the county of Middlesex, as is the case in some instances—e. g. of York Castle, which is deemed to be situate in each of the three ridings. This is evidently a casus omissus in the act; but the Court cannot go beyond the express provisions of the statute, especially where a wider construction would abridge the liberty of the subject—Brandling v. Barrington (1), The Queen v. Savage (2), and

(1) 6 B. & C. 46; s. c. 5 Law J. Rep. K.B. 181.

(2) 3 Irish Law Rep. 480.

— v. — (3). The Queen v. Ellis (4) was a similar kind of omission. Secondly, the commitment is bad for not appearing to be made in the presence of Bowdler. The power of imprisonment given by this statute can be exercised only in case of some delinquency, not of mere poverty. In Ex parte Kinning (5), Patteson, J. dissents from the opinion expressed by Alderson, B., in Ex parte Foulkes (6), that this is a limited ca. sa.

[PATTESON, J.—I think the power is a restitution of the old arrest in execution.]

The provision that the party shall only be discharged on payment, by leave of the Judge, shews that this is to be a punishment, not a mere means of enforcing payment of the debt.

[PATTESON, J.—The Judge can have no discretion in keeping him a prisoner after he has paid the debt and costs.]

It is submitted that he has under this act—Evans v. Rees (7). Thirdly, the order should state the time from which the period of imprisonment is to be calculated. In re Fletcher (8) is an authority that this omission will vitiate the warrant. Patteson, J. there says, "The gaoler ought to be able to ascertain from the warrant how long he is to detain the prisoner; and how can he ascertain that, when the warrant has no date?" Ex parte M'Gee (9) is to the same effect; and The King v. Eriswell (10) shews that this Court must have power to bring a party before it. This was thought necessary in a case of In re Collett (11), before Parke, B.

Lastly, this warrant should be under seal. It must be made by a person filling a two-fold character, viz. a Judge of the inferior court and a barrister of a certain standing. The King v. Austrey (12), 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 557, Paley on Convictions, 230, and In re Clark (13), were referred to.

Corrie, contra, was not called upon to support the return.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—None of these objections ought to prevail. As far as relates to the necessity of the warrant being under seal, it is enough to say, there is nothing in the statute which requires this. As to the prison to which the committal is made, it is the debtors prison for London and Middlesex; and I think Whitecross Street Prison is such a prison. Then, as to the date not appearing in the commitment, that did not appear in the case of In re Fletcher, and my Brother Patteson seemed to think it bad on that ground. He is now, however, of a different opinion, and that case must be considered as so far overruled. If the party could be taken up immediately, it might be an argument for inserting the date of the commitment, but that very often is impossible. It is a matter of evidence at what time he is taken into custody, and the period of imprisonment must be calculated from that time. Here there is a note or memorandum giving the time when he was taken into custody. It is said he may not know that, but he may and most probably does know it. In The Canadian Prisoners' case there were many facts which it might have been said the prisoners did not know.

PATTESON, J.—The statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127. s. 1. is followed by this warrant. Here there was a judgment in the Palace Court, and the debtor did not attend or allege a sufficient excuse, and therefore the Judge had power to order his committal. I do not take the words of that act to mean that the building must be within the county, but that it is to be the prison in which debtors were usually confined who were resident in that county. Here the debtor was resident within the county of Middlesex, and the gaol is not merely for London, but for London and Middlesex, and persons resident in Middlesex may be committed there. Therefore this is a proper place of custody. Then it is said it should be under seal, but nothing in the act requires that, but only that the Judge may order the committal, and such an order is returned. The party is committed for forty days; and according to Fletcher's case, I thought the warrant bad for not specifying at what time the warrant was dated; but in that case, the warrant had been kept in the pocket of the party beyond the time within which it ought to have expired. I should think the forty days must be meant to be calculated from the time when he was in prison. I do not mean within the walls, but arrested. He must know the time when he was actually taken by the gaoler. Then it is said the party ought to be before the Court before he can be committed. Cases were cited of Justices issuing distress warrants; I do not know what the practice there is, whether the Justice may not immediately issue his warrant if he is satisfied there are no effects. This act seems to me to authorize, if the party does not come or allege an excuse, that he may be at once committed. That is not, properly speaking, a contempt, but a delinquency, as my Brother Maule says, in In re Kinning, and it is the same thing as if he had appeared and had alleged no excuse. Accordingly the order goes on to commit him for forty days. That imprisonment is no discharge of the debt; but he is at liberty to pay the debt, and may be discharged by leave of the Court. I cannot think this would authorize the Commissioner or Court, if there is a payment and it is indorsed on the order, not to discharge the prisoner. However, this order is indorsed that the party is to be discharged if he pays. Then I do not see what is wrong in the case. In Ex parte Kinning, looking at the order, certainly it ran in language forty days from the time of his being arrested. That may be better so, but in sense and reason this must mean from the time of his being taken.

ERLE, J.—I am also of the same opinion that the prisoner must be remanded, and that the objections have not been sustained. The prisoner is committed by order of a Judge under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127. s. 1, which provides [his Lordship read the section]. Now the order in question is an order of a Judge in court; and the first objection is, that it ought to have been under seal. At the time of moving for the rule The Queen v. Clarke was referred to, and looking at that case, and the authorities there cited, there is no ground for saying that the order of a Court committing a person to prison ought to be under seal. There are several authorities that ordinary warrants must be so, and there are some statutes which expressly require them to be under the hands and seals of the Justices making them; but independently of such requirements, there does not appear to be any general principle requiring a seal. Then an objection was made that it did not appear from what period the forty days was to be counted; whether from the date of the order or from the time when the party was first taken under it. It is clear the intention was, that the party should lose his liberty for forty days, and if the officer was a long time in finding him, he was not to be benefited by that. If it be alleged that it would be more clear to state that the forty days are to run from the time when he was taken, it may be answered, that it would in many cases be equally impossible for the gaoler to know the precise time when he was arrested. With respect to the allegation that the commitment is void, because he ought to be committed to the gaol for debtors of the county of Middlesex, and that Whitecross Street Prison is within the ambit of the city of London, I think the meaning is, that the party should be committed to the gaol in which debtors resident within the county are confined, for the words are, "the common gaol wherein the debtors under judgment and in execution of the superior courts of justice may be confined within the county, &c., in which such debtor shall be resident, or to any other gaol or debtor's prison within the same county." No doubt a gaol within the county would be the strict meaning of these words, but I think it was not the meaning of the act; but that it is the gaol in which debtors are confined, in respect of debts within that county. This man was resident in Middlesex, and it was the duty of the Judge to commit him to that gaol. If it were necessary to say whether this prison is within Middlesex or not, looking at the act, particularly section 54, I think by relation it adopts all the incidents attaching to Middlesex prisoners in Newgate, and that it would be taken to be a Middlesex county gaol for the purposes of that act. The last point is as to the committal being in the absence of the party. It is quite clear that a debtor who, shortly before the statute, would have been liable to be arrested is, under this act, to be summoned to attend before a Judge or Commissioner, and in default of appearance to be committed. I cannot help thinking the meaning of this is to let the creditor have a power to imprison his debtor, and so to get paid his debt; and this is confirmed by the provision as to the leave of the Judge being obtained before he is discharged, on paying the debt and costs.

The defendants, who were share-brokers at Liverpool, on the 30th of August 1845, bought for the plaintiff, who was also a share-broker, thirty-eight T. and D. railway shares, at the price, according to the advice note, of 2l. 8s. 6d. per share. The scrip had not then issued, and the 2l. 8s. 6d. was therefore premium. The deposit of 1l. 7s. 6d. per share first appeared in the printed share lists (which were sent daily to the plaintiff) on the 2nd of September, and the amount of such deposits (41l. 5s.) was paid by the defendants to the persons from whom they bought the shares. In an account sent by the defendants to the plaintiff on the 19th of September, they omitted to charge the sum paid for the deposits, and the plaintiff, who purchased for other persons, as broker, (though he dealt with the defendants as a principal,) only charged 2l. 8s. 6d. per share, and had settled accounts with such other persons on that footing before any claim was made for the deposits.

The defendants, also, on the 18th of September, bought for the plaintiff eighty S. S. railway shares, at the price, according to the advice notes, of 4l. 10s. per share. The 4l. 10s. did not include the deposit of 2l. 10s. per share, which first appeared in the share lists about the 26th of September; and in settling with the vendors the defendants paid them the deposits, amounting to 200l. in addition to the 4l. 10s. per share. But on the 26th of September the shares were sold by the defendants for the plaintiff at 7l. per share, which sum included the deposits, and the plaintiff was credited with the full amount. In an account furnished to the plaintiff by the defendants on the 2nd of October, and also in subsequent accounts, the plaintiff was only debited with the 4l. 10s. per share, and he only debited his principals with that amount, and settled with them on that footing.

On the 19th of November, the defendants, having received a letter from the plaintiff demanding a balance of 605l. 14s. 10d., examined their books, and discovered the mistake with regard to the deposits, and immediately acquainted the plaintiff with it:—Held, that they were entitled to set off the 200l., and also the 41l. 5s.

and claiming a balance in the plaintiff's favour, after allowing various matters of set-off, of 605l. 14s. 10d.

The particulars of set-off contained, amongst other items, the following:—

The defendants paid deposits on the eighty South Staffords, purchased by them for the plaintiff on the 19th of September, amounting to 200*l.*; and the defendants also paid a deposit on the thirty Tean and Doves bought by them on the 30th of August, but never charged the plaintiff with the deposits so paid by them of 1*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* per share, amounting to 41*l.*-5*s.*

The plaintiff was a share-broker at Goole, in Yorkshire; the defendants were share-brokers at Liverpool.

Various dealings in railway shares had taken place between the plaintiff and the defendants; and though acting as brokers, they were responsible to each other as principals, for the due performance of the contract entered into.

First, with respect to the Tean and Dove shares. On the 29th of August the plaintiff instructed the defendants to buy for him, on the following day, at the least price they could, thirty Tean and Dove shares. The defendants bought thirty shares on the following day of Messrs. Schroeder & Ashlin, at 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* per share, and sent the advice note to the plaintiff, as follows:—

Bought for Mr. J. Dails, Goole.

For account day, 15th September.

The following is a copy of the sold note from Messrs. Schroeder & Ashlin to the defendant:—

To Messrs. Lloyd & Price.

August 30th, 1845.

We have this day sold to you thirty shares in the Tean and Dove Railway Company, at 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* per share premium.

Schroeder & Ashlin.

On the 30th of August the scrip in the Tean and Dove Valley Railway had not issued. The price, 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, which the defendants contracted to pay Messrs. Schroeder & Ashlin did not include the deposit, the course of business being when the scrip had not issued and consequently the deposit was not paid, to buy and sell at a price per share without including the deposit; and if the scrip issued, and the deposit was paid previous to the account day, the deposit was added to the price. The Liverpool printed share lists would shew whether the price at any time included the deposit. The deposit (1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share) was first entered in the share lists on the 2nd of September, the deposit having been paid on the 1st.

On the 19th of September the defendants rendered an account to the plaintiff, in which the latter was debited (August 30th) thirty Tean and Doves, 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*—72*l.* 15*s.*, and the balance as appeared by that account was 231*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.* This account was accompanied by a letter from the defendants requesting a remittance.

In addition to the price of 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* the defendants paid Messrs. Schroeder & Ashlin the deposit, 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share. This deposit has never been charged in account to the plaintiff at all. In the other transactions in Tean and Doves, which appeared by the account to have taken place, and which were after the issuing of the scrip, the price included the deposit. The plaintiff, in purchasing the Tean and Doves, acted as broker for other persons, and he rendered them advice notes of the purchases made by the defendants for him, and he charged them the same price as was mentioned in the advice note of the defendants, and as was charged by the defendants to him; and the plaintiff did not charge his principals for the shares anything beyond the 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* per share and his commission, and on the footing of that price settled by payment with his principals before the defendants made any claim on him for the deposit. The Liverpool share lists were daily sent by the defendants to the plaintiff during the period over which the account extended. The above balance of 231*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.* was carried forward into the subsequent accounts.

As to the South Staffords. On the 18th of September the plaintiff gave the defendants by letter the following order:—

Please buy as low as you can fifty South Staffords for me, and if not exceeding 5*l.* you can buy eighty.

The defendants acting on this order bought eighty shares, and sent the following advice note:—

Bought for Mr. John Dails, Goole, Eighty South Stafford Railway
 Shares at 4*l.* ..... £360 0 0
 Commission, ditto 1*s.* 6*d.* .... 6 0 0
 £366 0 0

For account day, Sept. 30th, E. E.
 Liverpool, Sept. 19th.

Of these eighty shares the defendants bought fifty of Messrs. Forsyth & Hamilton, and thirty of Messrs. Neile, and the following are copies of the sold notes of the respective vendors:—

To Messrs. Lloyd & Price.

Sirs,—We have this day sold to you fifty shares in the South Staffordshire Railway at 4*l.* 10*s.* per share nett premium. Paid £ nil. Premium £4 10*s.*

Yours, &c.

Forsyth & Hamilton.

To Messrs. Lloyd & Price.

We have this day sold to you thirty shares in the South Staffordshire Railway at 4½ per share, namely, £ paid. Premium £4 10*s.* Yours, &c.

F. & J. Neile.

The scrip in the South Staffordshire shares began to be issued on the 18th of September 1845, at Walsall. During the first three days the issue was to the allottees at Walsall and the neighbourhood. The original deposit was 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share, but in compliance with the standing orders of the House of Lords the deposit was, by a resolution of the provisional committee, passed on the 22nd of September 1845, increased to 2*l.* 10*s.*, the shares being 25*l.* shares. The first deposit of 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share on the letters of allotment of the South Stafford shares, purchased by the defendants for the plaintiff, had been paid on the 14th of August 1845; and the second deposit on the 18th and 19th of September in that year. The price, 4*l.* 10*s.*, at which the defendants contracted to buy, did not include the deposit or any part thereof. The prices quoted in the Liverpool share list of the 19th of September were 4*l.* 10*s.* and 4*l.* 15*s.* In settling with the vendors for the shares, after the scrip had issued, the defendants paid them 2*l.* 10*s.* in addition to the above sum of 4*l.* 10*s.* per share. On the 26th of September the defendants received instructions from the plaintiff to sell eighty South Staffords; and they sold them on that day, at 7*l.* per share, and sent the following advice note:—

Liverpool, September 26, 1845.

On the 2nd of October the defendants forwarded to the plaintiff an account of transactions between them up to the 30th of September. [This account was set out in the case, and in it the plaintiff was debited with the 360*l.* for the purchase of the South Staffords, and it shewed a balance of 141*l.* 2*s.* in the defendants' favour. That account contained the purchase only and not the sale of the eighty South Staffords (the sale being for a subsequent account) and the price charged was 4*l.* 10*s.* per share.] On the 13th of October the defendants forwarded to the plaintiff an account of transactions between them up to that date. [That account was also set out in the case. It commenced with debiting the plaintiff with the 141*l.* 2*s.*, the balance of the former account, and it credited him with the 560*l.*, in respect of the sale of the eighty South Staffords, and left a balance of 941*l.* in the plaintiff's favour. In that account the selling price (7*l.*) charged for the South Staffords included the deposit of 2*l.* 10*s.*] On the 31st of October the defendants forwarded the plaintiff the following account of transactions between them up to that date:—

The plaintiff had not been charged in account at all with anything beyond the
NEW SERIES, XVII.—Q.B.

4*l.* 10*s.* per share for the South Staffordshire shares. The plaintiff, in buying and selling the South Staffordshire shares, acted as broker for other parties; and he rendered advice notes to them, and settled by payment with them, upon the footing of the advice notes sent to him by the defendants, treating the purchase price charged in these notes as the full price of the shares. The settlement by payment was before the defendants made any claim upon the plaintiff in respect of the deposit upon the shares. The Liverpool share lists contained no entry in the column for money paid on account of South Staffordshires until the 26th of September, when the 2*l*. 10*s*. per share was entered for the first time as paid. The omission by the defendants to make any reference in the accounts before mentioned to the deposit paid by them on the Tean and Dove shares and on the South Staffordshires, in addition to the price, was occasioned by mistake. On the 18th of November the plaintiff addressed a letter to the defendants, stating the balance on the account current to be 605*l*. 14*s*. 10*d*., and requesting payment. On receipt of this letter, the defendants examined their books, and then first discovered their mistake with regard to the deposits; and, on the 19th, they addressed to the plaintiff the following letter:—
2 K

Liverpool, Nov. 19, 1845.

Mr. John Dails, Gools.

Dear Sir,—We are in the receipt of yours of yesterday, annexing a statement of your account, which is not complete: according to your statement we stand debtors for 605*l*. 14*s*. 10*d*.; but on September 19th we paid deposit on eighty South Staffordshires, amounting to 200*l*.; and in August 30th we purchased for you thirty Tean and Doves, at 2*l*. 8*s*. 6*d*. premium, but never charged you with the deposit of 1*l*. 3*s*. 8*d*. per share, amounting to 41*l*. 5*s*., making 241*l*. 5*s*.: which leaves a balance of 364*l*. 9*s*. 10*d*., according to our statement, which is correct. We inclose sundries, as at foot, for 364*l*. 9*s*. 10*d*., to square this account, &c. Yours, &c.

[The rest of the letter contained nothing material.]

On the 20th of November the plaintiff wrote to the defendants:—

Dear Sirs,—I have yours of yesterday's date, accompanying cash, &c., value together

364*l*. 9*s*., which amount is passed to your credit. The claim you make for South Staffords and Tean and Doves shall be laid before the parties concerned, two of whom are from home at present; but I really cannot allow you thus summarily to make the deductions from our present settlement for other transactions. I do therefore hope that you will see the justice of immediately remitting the balance of 241*l*. 5*s*. still remaining due to me, and waiting which, I am, &c. John Dails.

This was followed by a letter from the defendants to the plaintiff of the 21st of November, stating that the deposit paid was only what was paid when the shares were taken up; the purchase having been made by them prior to the scrip being issued, and the deposit consequently not being in the lists, and adding, "this your client will see on reference to the list, and will not hesitate to settle with you."

This was followed by a letter from the plaintiff, giving the names of the purchasers of the South Staffords and Tean and Doves, and making a demand of payment of the 241*l*. 5*s*.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the defendants could avail themselves in this action in any form of the deposits on the Tean and Dove and South Staffordshire shares, amounting together to the sum of 241*l*., paid by them to the persons from whom they bought those shares, in addition to the price charged by them in their advice notes, and in the accounts sent to the plaintiff. If they could avail themselves of that sum, then the plaintiff had been fully paid his demand; and a verdict would be entered for the defendants on the second and third issues: if they could not avail themselves, then the verdict would be entered for the plaintiff on all the issues, for the sum of 241*l*. 5*s*.

This case was argued (May 2) by—

Baines, for the plaintiff.—A loss has been occasioned by the negligence of the defendants, and it would be most unfair that they should throw this loss on the plaintiff. No fraud is imputed to either party; but the plaintiff has settled with his principals on the footing of accounts rendered to him by the defendants: and if the defendants have made payments in their own wrong, they must bear the loss—Skyring v. Greenwood (1), Marriott v. Hampton (2), Bramston v. Robins (3), Shaw v. Dartnall (4). The plaintiff has been misled by the accounts as well as the letters of the defendants, and he cannot be placed in the same position as at first—Thomas v. Hawkes (5), Cox v. Prentice (6), Heane v. Rogers (7), Pickard v. Sears (8), Gregg v. Wells (9).

Cooling, contra.—The facts are not very fully stated, but if they are to be understood as brokers would understand them, and as the parties, no doubt, therefore, understood them, the defendants are entitled to set off the 241*l.* 5*s.* First, with respect to the Tean and Doves. The price charged did not include the deposit. The use of the word "premium" does not strengthen the case against the defendants, as the parties dealt according to the custom and mode of dealing at Liverpool; and price which does not include deposit is premium; and delivery on the account day would be a delivery within a reasonable time—Fletcher v. Marshall (10). The plaintiff got the shares for less than the defendants paid for them, and the mistake being discovered the amount should be refunded—Sutton v. Tatham (11), Bayliffe v. Butterworth (12). It might have been better, no doubt, to have inserted the word "premium" in the advice note as well as in the sold note; but the plaintiff, who was a broker, is not to be supposed to have been misled. If he was misled in fact, it should have been stated in the case. Suppose the defendants had sued the plaintiff for this sum, the plaintiff would have had to admit the debt, and shew by special plea matter to discharge himself—Willoughby v. Backhouse (13). The case of Marriott v. Hampton, and the class of cases in which it has been held that money paid by a party with full knowledge of all the circumstances, cannot be recovered back, do not apply, as this was a payment properly made, as is not disputed, but which the defendants omitted to charge: they are not conclusively bound by the accounts first sent in, if they set the mistake right as soon as it is discovered.

Baines, in reply.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. subsequently (June 7) delivered the judgment of the Court.—The only question in this case was, whether the defendants were entitled to set off a sum of 200*l.* paid by them for deposits on eighty shares in the South Stafford Railway, purchased by them for the plaintiff, and a further sum of 41*l.* 5*s.* paid by the defendants for deposits on thirty shares in the Tean and Dove Railway, purchased by them for the plaintiff.

Upon looking at the accounts between the parties, as stated in the case, it seems to us to be clear, that the defendants are entitled to set off the 200*l.* paid by them for deposits upon the eighty shares in the South Staffordshire Railway, as the plaintiff has actually had the full benefit of that payment allowed to him in account, though the defendants have, by mistake, omitted to charge him with it on the debit side of the account.

In the account sent by the defendants to the plaintiff, of the 2nd of October 1845, they charge him with 360*l.* as the purchase-money for the eighty South Stafford shares, at 4*l.* 10*s.* a share, omitting to charge him with 2*l.* 10*s.* per share more, which they had paid for deposit; but in the subsequent account of the 13th of October 1845, they give him credit for 560*l.*, as the produce of the same shares which they sold for the plaintiff at 7*l.* a share, which included the 2*l.* 10*s.* per share paid by them for deposit, beyond the premium of 4*l.* 10*s.* per share. There is, therefore, no reasonable ground for contending that the defendants are not entitled to set off that 200*l.*

The right to set off the 41*l.* 5*s.* on account of the Tean and Dove shares is not quite so clear. Those shares were purchased by the defendants for the plaintiff, on the 30th of August 1845, at 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* per share; and the bought note was sent to the plaintiff with that sum as the price. The 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* was only the premium per share, no deposit being then paid, as the scrip was not issued. The shares were bought for the plaintiff for the account day, which was the 15th of September, and by the custom of share-brokers, if the deposit was paid before the account day, it was added to the price. The plaintiff was a share-broker, but dealt with the defendants as a principal, and the fact of his being himself a broker is no otherwise important than as shewing he would be cognizant of the course of dealing in the share market, with respect to the payment of deposits upon shares. As the scrip of the Tean and Dove shares had not come out on the 30th of August, when the purchase was made, it must have been clear to the plaintiff that the deposit had not been paid at that time, and consequently was not included in the price of 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* per share. In the ordinary course of business the payment made by the defendants on account of the deposits would not appear as a charge against the plaintiff until the 19th of September, when the first account was rendered: it is not, however, charged to the plaintiff in that account, nor in any other, owing to a mistake; and the question is, whether the defendants are concluded by that omission from charging the plaintiff with the payment of the deposits, as an item of set-off, because he has himself sold to other persons at the price paid for premium only, and has at that rate been paid and settled with by these persons.

The precise nature of the dealing between the plaintiff and his principals does not appear upon the case, nor is it stated that the scrip was ever transferred by the plaintiff—for all that appears it may have been a mere time bargain, and the scrip may still be in the hands of the plaintiff. If the scrip was actually transferred by the plaintiff, he must have known, or ought to have known, that the price he paid was premium merely, and could not have included any sum paid for deposit. In either view of the case, we think that the defendants are entitled to set off the amount, which by the course of business they were bound to pay, in order to procure the scrip, beyond the premium, and that the omission to debit the plaintiff with such payment in their account does not take away their right. They dealt with the plaintiff as the principal in the transaction, and are not concluded by having by mistake omitted to charge him with a payment of which he has had the benefit by the actual possession of the scrip, which could only have been obtained by the payment in question. The case of Sutton v. Tatham, as well as the other cases cited in the argument, are consistent with the views we take of the case; and our judgment, therefore, is in favour of the defendants.

1848. { THE QUEEN v. THE ARCH-
Jan. 25, 26; BISHOP OF CANTERBURY,
Feb. 1. in the matter of DR.
HAMPDEN.*

Ecclesiastical Law—Bishop, Confirmation of—25 Hen. 8. c. 20.

Under the 25 Hen. 8. c. 20. s. 5, after an election of a bishop by the dean and chapter of a cathedral church by virtue of a congé d'élire and letters missive, the person so elected is to be reputed and taken by the name of the lord elected of the see, and the King is thereupon to issue letters patent to the archbishop commanding him to confirm the said election, and to invest and consecrate him, and if he fail to do so for twenty days he is to incur the penalties of a præmunire:—Held, by Lord Denman, C.J. and Erle, J., that the archbishop acting merely ministerially is bound to confirm the bishop elect, and that he has no authority to hear any opposition advanced against the person so elected; per Patteson, J. and Coleridge, J., that confirmation is a judicial act, which the archbishop is to conduct according to the principles of the canon law, and that parties opposing are entitled to appear in his court and enter their objections.

Held also, per Patteson, J. and Coleridge,

* Decided in Hilary term.

1., that the opposers not having been allowed to appear and be heard, there was a declining of jurisdiction by the archbishop, for which a mandamus would lie.

Sir F. Kelly had obtained a rule calling upon the Archbishop of Canterbury, and his vicar-general, to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding them or one of them at a court to be therefore duly holden in the cause or business or matter of the confirmation of the election of the Rev. Renn Dickson Hampden, D.D., to the bishoprick of Hereford, to permit and admit to appear in due form of law the Rev. Richard Webster Huntley, clerk, M.A. in the University of Oxford, vicar of Albury, in the county of Salop and diocese of Hereford, the Rev. John Jebb, clerk, M.A. of Trinity College, Dublin, rector of Peterstow, in the county and diocese of Hereford aforesaid, and the Rev. W. F. Powell, clerk, M.A. of the University of Cambridge, perpetual curate of Cirencester, in the county of Gloucester, to oppose the confirmation of the said election of the said Dr. R. D. Hampden, and to hear and determine upon such opposition, and upon the articles, matters, and process thereof.

The rule was obtained on the affidavits of the Rev. W. F. Powell, and of R. E. A. Townsend, one of the proctors entitled to practise in the ecclesiastical courts, by which it appeared that Dr. Hampden was, on the 28th of December 1847, elected by the Dean and Chapter of the cathedral church of Hereford, to the office or dignity of Bishop of the said diocese of Hereford, the same being thenbefore vacant, and thereupon Her Majesty issued her royal letters patent, bearing date the 5th of January 1848, directed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, as follows:—

“Victoria, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, &c. To the most reverend father in God, our right trusty and right entirely beloved councillor, William, by divine providence Archbishop of Canterbury, &c., and to all other bishops herein concerned, greeting. Whereas the episcopal see of Hereford being lately vacant by the translation of the right reverend father in God, Doctor Thomas Musgrave, late bishop thereof, to the archiepiscopal see of York, upon the humble petition of the Dean and Chapter of our cathedral church of Hereford, we did, by our letters patent, grant them our leave and licence to choose to themselves another bishop and pastor of the said see, and the said Dean and Chapter, by virtue of our said licence and leave, have chosen for themselves and the said church our trusty and well-beloved Renn Dickson Hampden, doctor in divinity, to be their bishop and pastor, as by their letters, sealed with their common seal directed to us thereupon, does more fully appear. We, accepting of such election, have given our royal assent thereto, and this we signify unto you by these presents, requiring and strictly commanding you, by the faith and allegiance by which you stand bound to us, to confirm the said election, and to consecrate the said Renn Dickson Hampden, so as aforesaid chosen to be bishop of the said see, and to do, perform, and execute with diligence, favour, and effect, all the singular other things which belong to your pastoral office, according to the laws and statutes of England in this behalf made and provided. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent. Witness ourself at Westminster, this 6th day of January, in the eleventh year of our reign. By writ of Privy Seal.”

That the said W. F. Powell and the Rev. R. W. Huntley, and the said Rev. J. Jebb, being of opinion and verily believing that good and valid objections existed to the confirmation of the said election, resolved to oppose the said confirmation, and accordingly instructed and gave their several proxies in due form of law to the said R. E. A. Townsend and his partner, to appear on their behalf, and oppose the said confirmation; that in obedience to the said letters patent, and according to the usual course of proceeding in such cases, the said archbishop, by his vicar-general, assisted by the Right Hon. Stephen Lushington, L.L.D. and Sir J. Dodson, L.L.D. &c., as assessors for the purpose of proceeding with the matter of the said confirmation, proceeded in the said matter, as after mentioned, on the 11th of January 1848. The diocese of Hereford is within the province of Canterbury, and the Court of the vicar-general for the confirmation of bishops elected within that province has immemorially been held at the church of St. Mary-le-Bow, in the city of London. A citation or mandate against all and singular opposers, calling upon them to appear and render their objections at the said court on the 11th of January 1848, had been published in the said church on the 8th of January 1848, and a copy affixed to the door of the said church, according to the law and practice of the said court. The vicar-general and the assessors being assembled at Doctors' Commons, the proctor for the Dean and Chapter of Hereford exhibited a proxy under the hands and seals of the said Dean and Chapter, and presented to the said Dr. R. D. Hampden a certificate of his being howsoever elected bishop and pastor of the said cathedral church of Hereford, and prayed him to give his consent to the said election; and therefore Dr. Hampden read the schedule of consent and signed the same, and the vicar-general then adjourned the business to the church of St. Mary-le-Bow.

After prayers had been read in the church, the business of the confirmation of the election of Dr. Hampden was commenced by the presentation to the vicar-general of the letters patent, which were read: whereupon R. U, the chapter clerk of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford, prayed the vicar-general to take upon himself the duty of the said confirmation, and to decree that the same be proceeded in according to the form of the said letters patent and exigency of the law; and the vicar-general having assented thereto, Dr. Hampden was presented to the vicar-general by the said R. U, who declared that he judicially produced Dr. Hampden as Bishop-elect of Hereford, and stated that as proctor for the Dean and Chapter he exhibited an original mandate, together with the certificate thereupon indorsed touching the execution of the said mandate, against all and singular opposers; and prayed that such opposers might be publicly called. The vicar-general thereupon directed the apparitor-general of the said court to make proclamation as usual in such cases, which he did in open court in the words following: "Oyez, oyez, oyez, all manner of persons who shall or will object to the confirmation of the Rev. Renn Dickson Hampden, Doctor of Divinity, to be bishop and pastor of the cathedral church of Hereford, let them come forward and make their objections in due form of law, and they shall be heard."

Immediately after such proclamation was made, and before any other proceedings were taken, the deponent, R. E. A. Townsend, addressed the vicar-general, and stated that he appeared as proctor for the Rev. R. W. Huntley, &c., the Rev. J. Jebb, &c., and the Rev. W. F. Powell, &c., and exhibited proxies under their hands and seals, and declared that he opposed the confirmation of the election of the said Dr. Hampden to the office or dignity of Bishop of Hereford. The vicar-general then inquired of Mr. Townsend what were his objections; and while Mr. Townsend was in the act of producing his objections, which were in writing, in the form of a libel or plea, and duly signed by advocates as is usual in such cases, the vicar-general said to him, "We are acting here under a mandate from the Crown issued pursuant to the provisions of the statute of 25 Hen. 8. c. 20, and we conceive ourselves bound to confirm without suffering any opposition." Mr. Townsend then said, "Right Worshipful, I bring in a libel," whereupon the said Dr. Lushington, one of the assessors, said, "No, you will not; you were not permitted to appear, and you know perfectly well, as an ecclesiastical practitioner, that you are not able to bring in a libel until you are permitted to appear;" and the vicar-general then wholly refused to permit Mr. Townsend to appear as proctor for the said opposing parties or any of them, or to exhibit his proxies, or to present or bring in any libel or plea or objections against the confirmation of the said election, or to do any act whatever in opposition to the confirmation, although the proxies and libel were in due form of law, according to the usage and practice of the said court, and although he then duly and at the proper time, according to law, offered and proposed to appear as proctor for the said opposing parties in the matter of the said opposition, and to exhibit his said libel.

Certain advocates, who had been instructed to appear on behalf of the said opposing parties, then appeared accordingly and required to be heard, whereupon the vicar-general inquired of one of them (Dr. Addams) whether he wished to be heard upon the question whether counsel had a right to be heard or not, and Dr. Addams having replied that he did, the vicar-general said, "We confine you to that;" and Dr. Lushington also said, "Distinctly understand to what you are confined, namely, the question whether, considering the statute of Henry the 8th, which has been referred to, you have a right notwithstanding that statute to be heard at all." The advocates were then heard upon the question, whether they were entitled to appear and be heard, and when they had concluded, the counsel on behalf of Dr. Hampden and of the Dean and Chapter rose to reply; but the Court stopped him, and decided that they could not bear any objections to the confirmation of the said election, and that they were precluded by the said statute from allowing any such objections to be entertained, the vicar-general delivering his judgment to the effect following, "that he was of opinion that the Court was bound to proceed to the confirmation of the election of Dr. Hampden to the bishoprick of Hereford under the provisions of the statute 25 Hen. 8, which clearly extended to the present case, and by which, if he should commit or suffer any let or hindrance to such confirmation, he should become liable to the penalties of præmunire; that the act itself prescribed no mode of proceeding in the performance of the duty enjoined, nor referred to any, and that the said Court was bound by the statute law of the realm, which afforded it no alternative but that of confirming the election, which was certified to have been made by the Dean and Chapter of Hereford, or subject themselves to the penalties of præmunire. The assessors also delivered their opinions that the opposers, their proctor or counsel, could not be allowed to appear or be heard by reason of the statute 25 Hen. 8.

After this judgment had been given, the vicar-general directed the confirmation to be proceeded with, according to the usual forms; whereupon the proctor of the dean and chapter openly said in the Court: "I accuse the contumacy of all and singular persons cited, intimated, publicly called, and not appearing, and on pain of such their contumacy pray that they and every of them be precluded from the means of further opposing against the said election, the manner thereof, or the person elected in that behalf, and also that it may be decreed to be proceeded to further acts in this business of confirmation, the absence or contumacy of the persons so cited, intimated, publicly called, and not appearing in anywise notwithstanding, and I porrect a schedule which I pray to be read."

The proctor then handed a paper to the vicar-general, who then read and signed it. The proctor then said, "In pain of the contumacy of all and singular persons cited, intimated, publicly called, and not appearing, I give this summary petition in writing which I pray to be admitted, and that it be decreed to be proceeded summarily and plainly, and that a term be assigned to me to prove the same immediately." The vicar-general replied: "We do admit this your summary petition, so far as the same may be by law admitted, and do decree that it may be proceeded summarily and plainly, and we do assign you a term to prove this your summary petition immediately;" whereupon the proctor said, "In pain of the contumacy of all and singular persons cited, intimated, and publicly called and not appearing, and in support of proof of the matters contained in my said summary petition, I exhibit a certificate touching and concerning the election of the aforesaid Rev. R. D. Hampden, D.D. to be bishop and pastor of the said cathedral church of Hereford, made by the said dean and chapter of the said church, and issued under their common seal. I likewise exhibit a public instrument of the consent of the said Dr. R. D. Hampden to the said election, and Her Majesty's letters patent before read. And I allege that all and singular the matters set forth in the said exhibits respectively were and are true, and so had and done as therein contained; and I pray all of them to be admitted, and that a term may be assigned me to hear sentence instantly."

The vicar-general then said, "In pain of the contumacy of all and singular the persons so as aforesaid cited, intimated, publicly called and not appearing, we do admit these public instruments, and do assign to hear sentence instantly." The proctor then said, "I pray all and singular the said opposers to be again publicly called." The vicar-general then said, "Let the opposers be again publicly called," and the apparitor-general then made proclamation (in the same terms as before). After this proclamation the proctor said, "I accuse the contumacy of all and singular the persons so as aforesaid cited, intimated, publicly called, and not appearing, and I pray them to be pronounced contumacious, and in pain of such contumacy that it be decreed to be proceeded to the pronouncing your definitive sentence, and I porrect a schedule which I pray to be read."

The proceedings then terminated by Dr. Hampden taking the oaths usual and required in such cases, and the vicar-general signed, promulgated, and gave the following sentence in writing:—"In the name of God. Amen.—We, S. B. Burnaby, Doctor of Laws, vicar-general and official principal lawfully constituted of the most Reverend Father in God, William, by divine Providence Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, &c., being hereunto sufficiently and lawfully authorized, and having heard, seen, understood, and discussed the merits and circumstances of a certain business of confirmation of an election made and celebrated of the Rev. R. D. Hampden, D.D., elected bishop and pastor of the cathedral church of Hereford, which is controverted, and remains undetermined before us in judgment, and having considered the whole process had and done in the business of such confirmation, and having observed all and singular the matters and things that by law in this behalf ought to be observed, we have thought fit, and do thus think fit, to proceed to the giving our definitive sentence or final decree in this business, in manner following:—Whereas, by the acts enacted, deduced, alleged, propounded, exhibited, and proved before us, relating to such confirmation, we have amply found, and do find, that the said election was rightly and lawfully made and celebrated by the Dean and Chapter of the said cathedral church of Hereford, of the said reverend the bishop elect, a man both prudent and discreet, deservedly laudable for his life and conversation, of a free condition, born in lawful wedlock, of due age, and an ordained priest, and that there neither was nor is anything in the ecclesiastical laws that ought to obstruct or hinder his being confirmed by our authority bishop of the said see: therefore we, S. B. Burnaby, L.L.D., the Judge aforesaid, having weighed and considered the premises, and with the assistance of the learned in the law, do, by the authority wherewith we are invested, confirm the aforesaid election made and celebrated of the person of the said Rev. R. D. Hampden, D.D. to the bishoprick of Hereford. And we do, so far as in our power and by law we may, supply all defects in the said election, if any there happen to be. And we do commit unto the said bishop elected and confirmed the care, government, and administration of the spirituals of the said bishoprick of Hereford, and we do pronounce, decree, and order, by this our definitive sentence or final decree, which we make and publish in these presents, that the said bishop so elected or confirmed, or his lawful proctor for him, shall be inducted into the real, actual, and corporal possession of the said bishoprick, and of all its rights, dignities, honours, privileges, and appurtenances whatsoever, and be installed and enthroned by the Archdeacon of Canterbury or his deputy, according to the laudable and approved manner and custom of the said cathedral church, not being contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm." The vicar-general then decreed that a public instrument and letters testimonial be made out concerning the premises.

The affidavits further stated, that the opposition intended to be made to the confirmation of Dr. Hampden was founded on two books published by him, the avowed object of the first of which was to illustrate the injurious effects of dogmatism in theology: and that in both books, in illustration of the effect of dogmatism in theology, it was known, or justly suspected, that he had spoken in derogation of many things in the Book of Common Prayer, and had maintained doctrines repugnant to the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, especially those concerning faith and doctrine. That expressly by reason of these two books, Dr. Hampden (then Regius Professor of Divinity in Oxford,) in 1836 incurred the censure of the University, which censure (he not having explained or retracted those parts of his teaching), was affirmed in 1842. That articles alleging such unsoundness of doctrine of Dr. Hampden had been prepared and signed by civilians, ready to be given in had the parties been permitted to appear, and which the deponents were advised and believed, contained sufficient grounds of opposition to the confirmation of Dr. Hampden.

Sir J. Jervis (Attorney General), Sir D. Dundas (Solicitor General), M. D. Hill, Dr. Bayford, and Waddington shewed cause against the rule.—They argued that confirmation was a ministerial and not a judicial act, and that the archbishop was bound to confirm the bishop elected by the dean and chapter under the congé d'élire and letters missive issued by the Crown; that the express object of the 25 Hen. 8. c. 20. was to vest in the Sovereign the absolute power of nominating the bishops; and that it expressly subjected the archbishop to a præmunire if he neglected to confirm within twenty days; that no instance had occurred since the statute in which opposers had been held entitled to be heard against the confirmation of a bishop elect; that the 1 Edw. 6. c. 2. declaring these proceedings to be mere forms, is an exposition of the meaning of the 25 Hen. 8. c. 20; that if there is no confirmation the election is still to stand good to all intents and purposes. But that, even admitting this to be a judicial act, the proper remedy was by an appeal from the archbishop's court, and not by mandamus; that the vicar-general had no contentious jurisdiction, and therefore could not enter into this question.

Sir F. Kelly, Dr. Addams, A. J. Stephens, Peacock and Badeley argued in support of the rule.—They contended, that, under the common law, prior to the 25 Hen. 8. c. 20, parties had a right to come in and oppose the confirmation of a bishop, and that this right was not taken away by that statute; that the Crown never claimed more than the temporal right of appointing, not the spiritual power of making a bishop; that this act was a judicial act, appertaining to the archbishop as a spiritual Judge, and not merely ministerial; that consecration and confirmation were, by the statute, placed on the same footing; that consecration was clearly a high judicial act, investing the Bishop with the functions of a spiritual Judge; that the 25 Hen. 8. c. 20. only subjects the archbishop to a præmunire, in case he refuses to confirm, without some valid reason; that if the Archbishop refused to confirm and consecrate, no power is given to the Crown to perform those acts. As to the right to issue a mandamus, they argued that it lay to compel an inferior Court to enter upon an inquiry, though it would not prescribe the particular judgment to be given by a Court of peculiar jurisdiction; that in this case there could be no appeal, as there might have been if the appearance of the opposers had been allowed, and the articles propounded by them rejected; that it was no answer that the vicar-general had no contentious jurisdiction, for immediately the matter became contentious, it would go to the court of audience, and be decided by the archbishop there (1).

The Attorney General claimed a right to be heard in reply, stating that he appeared on behalf of the Crown, for the purpose of defending the prerogative.—He contended

Sir F. Kelly having been heard against the right claimed,—

The COURT declined to admit the absolute right of the Attorney General to a reply, considering that they had a general controul over the proceedings, and a power to prescribe the course they would follow in each particular case; but they also decided that from the importance of the present argument it would be convenient to allow the Attorney General to reply, which he accordingly did.

At the sittings, after the same term, the learned Judges, being divided in opinion, delivered their judgments seriatim.

ERLE, J.—This was an application for a mandamus from this Court, to be directed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, or his vicar-general, commanding them or one of them, at a court to be therefore duly holden in the business of the confirmation of the election of Dr. Hampden, as Bishop of Hereford, to permit and admit certain parties to appear in due form of law to oppose the confirmation of the said election, and to hear and determine upon such opposition, and upon the articles, matters and proofs thereof.

The ground of opposition is stated to be the unsoundness of certain theological opinions entertained by the bishop elect. In support of this application, it is stated that the archbishop, when confirming the election in obedience to the statute, is bound to try judicially the validity of the election, and that persons have a right to come forward and object, and that the archbishop is to deliver his judgment thereon. They contend, further, that this right may be enforced by the writ of mandamus. To this it is answered, that the statute of Henry the Eighth is in contradiction of the right claimed. The question then depends upon the construction of that statute, 25 Hen. 8. c. 20, which is intituled, 'An act for the non-payment of the First-fruits to the Bishop of Rome.' Under this act, it appears that the power of nominating bishops is given to the king, and that the archbishop has no authority to judge whether the king has properly exercised that power. On the contrary, the archbishop is made liable to the penalties of præmunire if he shall not, within twenty days, confirm, invest, and consecrate the bishop, whose election or nomination has been signified to him by the king's letters patent. In the argument on this case it was not contended that the archbishop was empowered to sit and judge of the king's nomination. When the bishop has been elected by the dean and chapter, the king is to signify that election by his letters patent, and to require the archbishop to confirm it. This brings us to the question, whether or not the word "confirm" is to be taken as meaning that the archbishop is to try the qualification of the person elected. According to the general rule, the words of the statute are to be construed in the ordinary sense in all its parts. From this it follows, that the command to confirm does not involve any authority to judge of the fitness of the person elected. It is provided by the 5th section, that the election by the dean and chapter "shall be good and effectual to all intents;" and the command to confirm follows immediately upon this, and is in harmony with it. But an election cannot be good and effectual to all intents, if it is to be voidable by the archbishop. It then says that, upon being elected by the dean and chapter, the person so elected "shall be reputed and taken by the name of the lord elected of the said dignity and office," which is incompatible with his being liable to be declared disqualified by the archbishop. He is then to take the oath of fealty to the king, who is thereupon to issue his letters patent to the archbishop, "commanding him to confirm the said election, and to invest and consecrate him," within twenty days. This is inconsistent with its being the duty of the archbishop to invite and receive objections, and to decide whether or not they are well founded. I am of opinion that the statute does not impose the duty or give the right alleged to the archbishop. It is said, that the word "confirm," in reference to bishops, has a technical sense in the canon law, and includes an examination into the qualifications of the persons elected; that this power was exercised throughout the whole christian world down to the time of Henry the Eighth, and that the legislature intended the word to be taken in that sense. In support of this view, various passages were cited from the canon law, and the form of citing opposers at confirmations, and the advantage of giving this power to the archbishop and people, were much relied on. But these grounds are untenable. In the first place, the reception of evidence of extrinsic facts, with a view to alter the received meaning of known words, is not to be permitted; it would be doing violence to the statute, if not illegal. But, in the next place, it does not appear to me that the alleged practice has been proved. The preamble of the 25 Hen. 8. begins with a recital of the 23 Hen. 8, from which it appears that nominations and presentations of bishops by the king to the pope were often delayed, and that bishops, in case of such delay, were in future to be consecrated and invested by any two bishops whom the king should appoint for that purpose, "in like manner as divers archbishops and bishops have been heretofore in ancient time, by sundry the king's most royal progenitors, made, consecrated, and invested within this realm." This preamble speaks of the consecration and investment, but not of the confirmation of bishops. It asserts the former practice of the kings of England, agreeably with the opinion that bishopricks were donative under the Saxon and some of the Norman kings; afterwards, by the charter of King John, the election was in the dean and chapter, subject to the approbation of the Crown, but the archbishop confirmed the election, which power was usurped by the Pope, and continued, except when the see of Rome was powerless, down to the statute of Henry the Eighth. It is also necessary to ask, what foundation in fact is there for the assertion, that the legislature referred to that part of the canon law which has been cited? That law was pertinent to contested elections, by large numbers, but not to a nomination by the king. Besides, the foreign canon law has no binding effect in England; and there is a statute of Henry the Eighth which recites that a commission of thirty-two persons had been appointed to revise the canon law, and it enacted that, until they should have completed their task, such canons only should be in force as were not contrariant to the laws and customs of the realm. It is impossible, then, that the parliament, which so regarded the canon law, should use the word "confirm" in this statute, not in its common sense, but in a sense limited by the canon law. The proclamation made at the time of the confirmation was next pressed upon us as favourable to the suggested construction. But this proceeding can be of no avail against the statute. By the statute, the election of a bishop is rendered a mere form, and so is the confirmation; for it declares every such election to be good and effectual to all intents. We here see, indeed, the form and vestiges of rights which have ceased, forms which have been preserved but with a view to colour the changes which have been introduced. If these had not been preserved as mere forms, the right of opposing would have been asserted in some instance since the date of the statute. But no such instance has been produced. There has been no examination of opposers. An attempt was made in the case of Bishop Montague, which was evaded without any decision. If the evidence of the existence of the practice fails, so does the opinion of writers of authority that the right existed. The opinions of all the text writers, from Lord Coke downwards, are of positive force against it. The importance of this right was urged upon us, as tending to confirm the stability of the Established Church. But if there are advantages on the one side, so there are evils also, and a practised mind will be able to balance the weight of the arguments. This question, however, is unsuitable to the office of a Judge, whose duty is only to declare what the law is. Another point urged was, that the sole purpose of the legislature was to put an end to the interference of the see of Rome with the English church. But I think the intention of the statute, as expressed, was to prohibit the interference of the see of Rome, and at the same time to lay down the manner of consecrating the bishops of the church so separated from the see of Rome. Effect must be given to every part of the statute, and I think the statute not only destroys the Pope's usurpation, but declares the rights of the king, and was intended to put an end to all contests between the Crown and the ecclesiastical authorities. I am of opinion that the supposed right does not exist; and, therefore, that the rule must be discharged.

COLERIDGE, J.—I regret that I am called upon to deliver my opinion on this rule at so short an interval, after an argument of such great learning and ability, and the more so, as I am compelled to differ from my Lord and my Brother Erle. The question, narrow as it may be simply propounded, has been argued upon grounds at once so large, various, and wide, and mounting up to such remote antiquity, that it is scarcely possible to have any strong confidence in deciding upon them. It is, however, consolatory to me to know that any error in my judgment will not be fatal. I am not insensible to the fact, that some public inconvenience may be attached to the agitation of a question such as the one now before us, though I believe it has been somewhat exaggerated. But the inconvenience is not all on one side, and I am unwilling to take any course which might do a final injustice. Regarding the question merely as one of law, I rest my judgment on this narrow ground, that the applicants have laid such grounds before the Court as entitle them to a mandamus, in order that it may be demurred to, or met by a return. My opinion is, that this was an inferior court with a question before it for decision, with parties lawfully summoned to appear, and having sufficient interest in the matter to entitle them to be heard. If this be true, it is within the province of this Court to compel the inferior court to allow those parties to appear, and to hear their allegations. It is no answer to say, that the court is an ecclesiastical court; for the ecclesiastical courts are not withdrawn from the controul of writs of mandamus or prohibition. We cannot, indeed, divert the course of their proceeding, nor review their decisions by way of appeal. But we compel them to address themselves to the discharge of their duty, and restrain them when they shew that they are about to exceed their jurisdiction. This stands upon the plainest principle. The case of The King v. St. Peter's, Thetford (3), is often cited on the other side; but the Court there said, that the question of church-rates was a matter of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and there was no ground laid for the interference of this Court; but here the objection is, that the Court has heard one side, and refused to hear the other. I found my opinion on that expressed by Holroyd, J., in the case of The King v. the Justices of Carnarvonshire (4), though without that authority I should have felt no difficulty upon this point, for this case is to be decided by principle rather than by precedent. It was said, that the party might appeal from the decision of the Court below, but there can be no appeal, for there has been no decision; the parties have not been heard. Now, though this Court will not interfere with the rules of the court below, it will interfere so far as to enable the parties to state their case. It was said that the parties had not sufficient interest to entitle them to be heard. But I think they have. They are all involved in the main question. If the confirmation was all a shadow, no one could have any interest; but, on the other supposition, two of them, as incumbents in the diocese, have a deep interest in the faith and doctrines of their bishop. We have determined that the mere interest which a man has, as an inhabitant of a borough, is sufficient to enable him to become a relator in a quo warranto on the election of a mayor or member of a town council. I come now to the statute of Henry the Eighth; and here our object is to ascertain, not what Henry the Eighth intended, but what was intended by the legislature. It is not quid voluit Rex, but quid dixit Parliamentum, into which lawyers are to inquire. The 5th section of the statute enacts, that the King shall signify the election of the bishop elect to the archbishop of the province, and require him to confirm the election; and the question is, what is the import of the word "confirm"? It is said, on one side, that the duty and function of the archbishop was merely ministerial. On the other hand, it is contended that confirmation was a solemn judicial act, and that the archbishop was to perform that act according to the accustomed forms. It is obvious, that those who take this view take upon themselves a large burthen of proof. It is necessary for the applicants to examine the whole of the statute, and into what was, in point of fact, done at the time of and since its passing. But it must be borne in mind that usage cannot contradict it, nor can disuse render it obsolete. The examination of the statute may be ranged under four heads of inquiry, three of which relate to matters of fact, and the fourth to the construction of the statute. Without entering into them at length, my opinion is, that upon each and all such a case is made out that we ought to let this writ go, and by the practice of this court we do not require, before granting this writ, absolute certainty either in fact or law; but if the matter of fact be made probable, we leave it to a jury to decide the fact, and we allow the matters of law to remain on the record, in order that our decision may be reviewed by a higher tribunal. If it were a question of title which was to go to a jury, we should not require absolute certainty, especially when that title was to be traced down, as here, from remote ages, through contested claims and foreign usurpation. If we refuse the rule, we prevent inquiry; we say there is nothing to inquire into, or that the matter is unimportant. Whereas, if we grant it, all we do is to say that enough has been done to shew that it is a case which deserves further inquiry.

Now, the case on the part of the applicants is, that there were four great general councils held, whose authority is recognised in matters of doctrine by the statute of Elizabeth; and that of these four councils, two, viz., those of Nice and Chalcedon, say that no bishop can be confirmed præter voluntatem metropolitani. Both of these councils were called by imperial authority, and after the temporal rulers had asserted their power in the church; and yet it was by them declared that the confirmation by the metropolitan was necessary to complete the election. This fact is established by a large body of evidence prior to the rise of the canon law. It is not contended that confirmation by the archbishop was not required by the canon law; but it is contended that this law was not admitted into England. The canon law obtained its binding authority in this country by custom, and was subject to the statute law. But, as a general rule, our ecclesiastical courts governed themselves by the canon law, which was the law of that catholic church of which this country was a part. In Lyndwode and John de Athon we have the expositors of our national canon law. The provision in the 19 Hen. 8, towards the end, refers to the preamble of the act, which does not speak of the canon law, but of the provincial constitutions which had been made in this country, among which are the constitutions of Othobon, referred to in Gibson. It is clear that what had been decreed by councils had been adopted by the canon law, and it is necessary to shew that that law had not been adopted in this country. By that law confirmation was a judicial proceeding, in which the process of the election and the person of the elected, his life, morals, and learning, &c. were examined, and the result was not unfrequently unfavourable to the person elected. I do not remember an instance which goes to shew that the persona electi meant merely the identity of the party. The practice of provisions and the appellate jurisdiction of Rome interfered with the power of the metropolitan; but after making all deductions on this account, it is proved, I think, that the power of confirmation was in the metropolitan. In Warton's Anglia Sacra, which is not a modern work, but a collection of ancient and contemporary writings, there are numerous instances of the exercise of this power from the year 1277, in the reign of Edward I. down to the year 1416, the third of Henry V.—[Here the learned Judge referred to several cases of the kind which had been cited by Mr. Badeley, in the argument.]—We come now to the statute of Henry the Eighth, and we have to see how it has dealt with confirmation. One object of the statute was to put on a clear foundation the right of the Crown to the appointment of bishops, the exercise of that right having been interfered with by provisions. That right was founded on the right of patronage; bishopricks were donative because the King had founded them. The second object was to prevent all interference of Rome in the making and confirmation of bishops. For the first object it was not thought necessary to alter the original mode of election, but that chain was preserved which bound our church with the great christian communion. But it was preserved in form only, for the power of election was virtually taken away by the letters missive. If the dean and chapter proceeded according to the letters missive, there would be nothing new, and confirmation would go on as usual. There is not a word in the statute to derogate from the power of the metropolitan, but it was rather increased by the removal of the interference of the Pope. Here, then, are two parties, the dean and chapter and the archbishop. If the former refuse to elect, a provision is made by which the king may nominate a bishop; but if the archbishop refuse to confirm, there is no provision in the statute by which the confirmation may be performed by any other.—[The learned Judge here read and commented upon the third and fourth sections of the statute.]—The silence of the act on the subject of qualification arises from the fact that it was passed alio intuitu. When a bishop is nominated by the Crown, the archbishop is required, by the fifth section, with all speed and celerity to invest and consecrate the patentee, and to give and use to him pall and all other benedictions, ceremonies, and things necessary for the same. And when the bishop has been elected by the dean and chapter, and that election has been signified to the archbishop, he is required to confirm the said election, and to invest and consecrate the person so elected; but it is not said that he is to do so "with all speed and celerity." Great reliance has been placed on the words that the election of the bishop by the dean and chapter shall "stand good and effectual to all intents," and that the bishop so elected "shall be reputed and taken by the name of lord elected of the said dignity." These expressions have, no doubt, great weight; but the question turns on the meaning of the word "confirm." The archbishop is to confirm and consecrate, but no direction is given him as to how he is to confirm. When the statute was passed, the functions of the archbishop as to confirmation were the same as before the act. If his duties were ministerial before, so are they now. If before the statute he was bound to examine at confirmation, so is he now, for it would require very strong words to deprive him of that right. If the construction which has been contended for against the rule be correct, the archbishop would be bound to confirm any one who might be elected, whether he were a heretic, infidel, bad liver, and disqualified by age or want of orders. I think it was said, in the course of the argument, that if consecration could not be separated from confirmation great difficulty would be felt. But I think they cannot be separated. Reading the office for consecration, either as it stands now, or as it stood in the time of Henry the Eighth, it is impossible to suppose that the archbishop acts merely ministerially. The 7th section of the statute 25 Hen. 8. contains penal clauses, and provides for three classes of offences. The first is, where the electors refuse to elect; the second, where the archbishop refuses to confirm, invest, and consecrate; and the third, where any persons admit, maintain, or allow anything contrary to the due execution of the act. In the first two cases a time is fixed. Confirmation may in general be expected to be finished within twenty days, and twenty days would be sufficient to ascertain whether the confirmation was wilfully delayed. But if the statute enjoined the archbishop to do a judicial act, and he prosecuted it without delay, that would be an answer to an indictment. The statute, though severe in the measure of its penalties, is not so in reference to the scale of punishments in the age in which it passed; for the same penalties, even in the last century, were awarded to those who were mixed up with the frauds connected with the South Sea bubbles. But I cannot believe that a statute which, though with a rough hand, freed us from the vexatious interference of Rome, at the same time intended that we should wear a yoke upon our necks, and that our archbishops should be liable to these penalties if in the discharge of a most solemn duty they refused to confirm the election of a bishop who might be disqualified for that sacred office. It has been said, that in Ireland and the colonies the Crown exercises this power of nomination without confirmation; but it is obvious that the revival in Ireland of the statute of Edward the Sixth, which had rendered confirmation unnecessary, and its non-revival in this country, shew that we have the same forms as existed before the Reformation and from early ages. The archbishop is not the only person concerned, for the bishop elect has also an interest, of which the canon law takes notice, otherwise he could not have appealed to the Court of Rome. The forms established by usage become binding, and all lawyers know that it is by forms that rights become substantially protected. For more than three hundred years these forms have taken a judicial shape in open court; and, according to that course of proceeding, the archbishop is bound now to proceed. It has been urged that there has been a total absence of the exercise of this right since the Reformation; but that has not been made out in a satisfactory manner. Considering all the circumstances which are to be taken into account, it seems to me that this rule ought to be made absolute.

PATTERSON, J.—I do not propose to enter into an explanation of the canon law, or the general canons of the christian church on the subject of confirmation. They, however, establish satisfactorily that in all christian countries, in England and wherever bishops were elected, whether by the people, the clergy and people, by the clergy, by chapters, or by convents, such election required to be confirmed, in order to be perfect; and that confirmation was an act of ecclesiastical supremacy, and was a judicial and not a ministerial act, that it required examination into the process of the election, and the qualification of the person elected, and cannot properly be said to be a part of the election. Confirmation was obviously necessary in popular elections; and when elections were confined to smaller bodies, there was still danger that improper persons might be introduced into the office of bishops. All christian people were therefore interested, and therefore all persons were cited generally, and in some cases specially, to come and state their objections against the persons elected. Such citation was practised in this country before the passing of the statute of Henry the Eighth, and has continued in use up to this time. Whether it was introduced from the canon law, and whether the canon law was adopted, in whole or in part, I will not now inquire. It is sufficient for the construction of the statute of Henry the Eighth, that before and at the time of the passing of that act the election of bishops required to be confirmed by a superior, whether pope or metropolitan; and that all persons were cited to come forward and make their objections. Several instances of archbishops refusing to confirm were cited from Warton's Anglia Sacra, in which the objections were made not to the identity, but to the qualifications of the party elected, and in which the elections were annulled. They were all previous to the statute of Henry the Eighth. The elections were real and free elections, upon the receipt of the congé d'élire from the Crown, which did not state who was to be elected. It is said that the Crown recommended, but there was no power in the Crown to compel the election of any particular person; nor was there any legislative enactment on the subject, so that the power of confirmation did not trench upon the authority of the Crown. The authorities from the Year Books cited in Evans v. Ascuthe shew that confirmation was a necessary act, and that confirmation might be refused and the election made void. It is established by the authorities, that when the 25 Hen. 8. was passed, confirmation was a judicial act: what then are the provisions of that statute? The 23 Hen. 8. provided, that if any person elected to any see should be delayed or should be denied confirmation by the Bishop of Rome, any such person was to be consecrated in England by the archbishop of the province. But nothing is there said of the manner and form of carrying the confirmation into effect, nor of the election of bishops. Then follows the 25 Hen. 8. c. 20, which, in the 3rd section enacts [the learned Judge read this section]. Then the 4th section enacts, "that the king may grant his licence, under the Great Seal, to the dean and chapter to proceed to the election of a bishop, with a letter missive containing the name of the person, whom they shall elect and choose; and that the dean and chapter shall choose the person so named, and none other." Here is an entirely new matter, for though there was a letter missive before by recommendation, it was a mere request, and the chapter could not be compelled to obey." The effect of the words "and none other" is to destroy the freedom of election altogether. The repealed statute of Edward the Sixth describes these elections to be "in very deed no elections, but only by a writ of congé d'élire have colours, shadows, pretences of elections, serving nevertheless upon this subject, and the delay which may be interposed, but that is not a sufficient reason for refusing the writ. I have not alluded to the nature of the objections to be urged; for, in my opinion, the mistake has been in refusing to admit the parties to appear and state their objections, whatever they might be. Upon these objections, the archbishop or his vicar-general is to determine, and this Court will not interfere with his decision. Upon the whole, I think this rule should be made absolute.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This is an application for a mandamus to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to hear certain parties in opposition to the confirmation of the bishop elect of the diocese of Hereford; and their affidavits state, in substance, that a citation had been issued, requiring opponents of the confirmation of the bishop elect to appear with any objections they might have to urge; that they had accordingly appeared with their objections in due form, and that their counsel had not been permitted to do more than to argue in favour of their right to be heard. The affidavit then states that the vicar-general then proceeded with the confirmation, and declared that no opponents had appeared, and that opponents were contumacious for not appearing. It is also further stated, that the objections tendered were founded on doctrines contained in certain books written by the bishop elect, which, it is alleged, are repugnant to the articles of religion; and the applicants contend that the confirmation which followed was, by reason of that refusal, null and void. Various arguments have been used to shew that a writ of mandamus will not lie in the present case. I have no doubt that in this case the mandamus sought for ought not to issue; and even if I were at all in doubt on the subject, I should think it better not to issue the writ than to run the risk of abridging the clear and established prerogative of the Crown, in a matter of such vital importance to the best interests of the people more than to those of the Crown itself. There certainly has been established a prima facie case of wrong, where, after citation issued for persons to appear in opposition, and after proclamation to the same effect, persons so appearing were prohibited from stating the grounds of their opposition. This proceeding is an absurdity, only exceeded by the further process of declaring those very persons contumacious for non-appearance, who having actually appeared, and, claiming to be heard, were not heard. That these are anomalies there can be no doubt; but they do not constitute a case for setting aside a clear and established rule, founded on a distinct act of parliament, and settled by invariable practice. These parties, against whom this rule is directed, conversant as they must be with the law and custom in this matter, did not rely upon the abstract justice or propriety of the particular form; but on the contrary, lamented the continuance of that empty form, which they admitted to be strange; but they relied upon the express terms of the act of the 25 Hen. 8. c. 20. Then the first observation that occurs to me in reference to this act is, that no form of confirmation whatever is set forth in it, or in the preceding act on the same subject, (23 Hen. 8. c. 20*); which latter statute, after denouncing former exactions of the pope, by means of delaying the confirmations of bishops named by the king, enacted that for the future any person presented to the Court of Rome as bishop of any English see, and whose confirmation by Papal Bull should be unduly deferred, should be consecrated by the archbishop, and be then and thereafter taken to be, and be, bishop of the see to which he had been named.

In this statute the word "confirmation" does not once occur. The statute was kept alive by the 25 Hen. 8. The statute in question was framed in that spirit of jealousy of Rome which was at that time severing one by one all the ties between this kingdom and that see, but neither King Henry nor any other king was likely to leave the means of making bishops imperfect or uncertain for the time to come. That was one of the objects of the statute, as set forth by the preamble; and it has been asked whether such a king was likely, at the same time that he deprived the pope of his veto, to give it to one of his subjects. The only answer which has been made to this question I confess I have heard with surprise and regret, because, as I understood it, it was a severe reflection on that great father of the English protestant church, Archbishop Cranmer, that the king knew how obsequious he was, and that he would readily comply with the king's will—an imputation by no means borne out by the history of those times. But even supposing Cranmer's character to have been as it has been represented, King Henry was no stranger to the obstinacy of religious faith; he knew its strength from experience and church history; and it is, therefore, inconceivable that he should have allowed any doubt to remain as to the prerogative which he proposed to establish. These considerations are entitled to great weight. The arguments on either side, in this respect, rest upon the meaning to be attached to the word "confirmation," as found in the statute. This word, however, does not occur alone, but is connected with the term "election." The words "should confirm the said election," plainly indicate the duties devolving on the metropolitan. When the election was real, two things were required to be certified to the archbishop: first, that the election was duly made; and, secondly, the identity of the person who brought the certificate, it being further desirable, no doubt, that the archbishop, by his benediction and gracious reception of his new colleague, should inspire the people with confidence and respect for him. But it is said he is bound to cite all persons to oppose; and it is made a question whether he is bound to open a court for this purpose. I do not well see how there can be any necessity for such a course, when the person to be confirmed has already been ordained a deacon, on which occasions all people have been called upon to pronounce whether they suspect him of any crime or offence, when, if anything was alleged against him, future proceedings were deferred until inquiry should be made. The same person must have undergone the same ordeal on being ordained a priest; and, when bishop elect, he comes with the additional testimony of parties well qualified to judge of his fitness in all respects; for, since the provisions of that statute, he brings the recommendation of the Crown—which ought not to pass for nothing. Why is the archbishop, then, to commence an inquiry? Why is he to call upon all the world to come forward and oppose? If the election were in the people I could understand the argument; but here it has passed away from the people, and been vested for ages in the dean and chapter on the recommendation of the Crown. The limitation of time imposed on the two great processes of election and confirmation—of twelve days in the former case, and twenty in the latter—strengthens this view of the matter. The election by the dean and chapter is to be made within twelve days, and the archbishop is enjoined to consecrate in twenty days. The election is a mere form, the appointment being in terms by the king. The consecration, however, is a more solemn act. The form is contained in the Book of Common Prayer. The bishop, before receiving episcopal ordination, is "called, tried, and examined;" and the archbishop, after receiving him at the hands of two bishops, demands the king's mandate for his consecration. Then the archbishop, sitting in his chair, is to put certain fixed questions, to which fixed answers are to be given. The 36th article ordains especially that the consecration shall be in this form. The confirmation is like the election, very little more than a formal ceremony. Nominally, the one is the election of the dean and chapter, and the other the confirmation of the archbishop; but both are, in reality, the acts of the sovereign: and that being so, we are now asked to find some reason why confirmation should be more than a mere form also. The answer given is, that the word "confirm" had a certain known legal sense. I will not now inquire what was at that time the meaning of the word "confirmation," and whether the command to the archbishop to confirm is to be understood as giving him power to hold a court at which all persons not pleased may come in and oppose. If this were so, the favour of the sovereign must be supposed to have placed the bishop elect in a position analogous to that of a felon, upon whose trial the jury are to decide. He has pleaded not guilty to the charge, and all persons are then to be invited, by public proclamation, "if they know any treasons, felonies, or misdemeanours, done or committed by the prisoner at the bar, to come forward and give their evidence." That is the position in which it is now contended a bishop

upon this subject, and the delay which may be interposed, but that is not a sufficient reason for refusing the writ. I have not alluded to the nature of the objections to be urged; for, in my opinion, the mistake has been in refusing to admit the parties to appear and state their objections, whatever they might be. That is the position in which it is now contended a bishop elect, whose doctrines have been approved on his ordination to the offices of deacon and priest, and who has been nominated by the Crown, and elected by the dean and chapter, is to be placed by the favour of his sovereign; and the charge is to be made blacker, if possible, by the use of the full and comprehensive word "heresy." While upon this topic, I feel it necessary to repeat what has often been stated in former judgments, that the canon law forms no part of the common law of this realm, unless practice can be shewn to the contrary. And I am of opinion, that the burden of proof on such a point rests on the parties opposing; but into this I need not go, for I am convinced that the practice alleged in the present case never has existed authoritatively in this country, and for proof of that I rely, not upon affidavits, but upon the arguments of the appellants themselves; for I am satisfied that if ever such a case could have occurred, it would not only have been cited in this court, but would have been notorious to all the world. But there is not a trace of such a case; all records, historical and legal, prove a perfect blank with respect to it. It was argued that perhaps such a case never had occurred, because an appeal to that Court might never before have been necessary. What! during all the centuries Christianity has existed, has there not been one person, some of whose opinions may have been alleged to be heretical, elevated to the rank of bishop? Has there been none elevated with "spiritual pride," none with "jealousies," none against whom some person or another might not have alleged some sort of "immoralities"? And even if this were so, were there no persons during all that period capable of making a false charge, or of drawing a false inference? But, suppose opposers admitted, what would happen? "Come forth," says the proclamation, "and offer your opposition in the case of this person about to be made a bishop." The answer is, from one: "I knew this man at college twenty years ago, and I can tell you of some irregularities in his life." Another would say, "This person is justly suspected by one of having performed the service whilst in a state of inebriety." A third might charge him with "vanity." Another might throw a slur upon the chastity of his mother, or attack his conduct respecting his son. All that the Pharisee blessed himself in being free from, these people might falsely allege against the bishop. He might know all the allegations to be false and infamous. The archbishop might think the accusers utterly unworthy of belief, or know the charges to be false; but, nevertheless, the inquiry must proceed, and though they should be disproved, and the confirmation take place, still the fatal calumny must remain. But how much is the case strengthened when the charge is the unfathomable charge of heresy, supported by extracts from books, probably little understood, and by reported conversations, probably imaginary, and, if real, difficult to be correctly repeated. Thus, the life of a bishop might be frittered away whilst proceedings are pending against him, and his see might be left without any occupant, to the detriment of the church and of the people. The evidence that this opposition took place in ancient times is very small, and it is proved to have been a mere matter of form during the last three centuries. And why should it not have been formal, when it is well known that nothing could have resulted from any attempt to make it otherwise? Why not give the ecclesiastical authorities credit for surrendering so invidious a power, or rather for refusing to adopt it? Any attempt to carry such a scheme into effect must have shewn its utter impracticability. But let us consider what mighty edifice is sought to be raised upon this word "confirm." We are told the archbishop holds a court, but that this Court has ever done what is now required is not pretended. The right of appointment of a bishop by the Crown without the interference of the archbishop has, in fact, never been doubted: that any opposer to the confirmation was entitled to appear was never even surmised. The records of the Court are silent on the subject. There has been, in fact, only one exception to the rule of the non-appearance of opposers, and that exception was in the case of Bishop Montague, when the vicar-general, Dr. Rives, refused to hear an opposer, guarding himself, however, by stating that he did so because the opposition was not in writing. Of this Dr. Rives we know little, and that little not much to his credit; but it is very clear to me that if he did give such a judgment he was wrong; for in the canon law nothing is said about the opposition being in writing, and indeed it might proceed from a party who is not able to write. If such were the law there would be plausible reasons for admitting the opposition. Dicta have been cited from the case of Evans v. Ascuthe, in which the Dean of York having been promoted to the bishoprick of Bristol, and in the interval between his election and confirmation having performed acts as dean, and granted leases in conjunction with the chapter, it had been mooted whether his election was valid. In the course of that proceeding the opposition cooled very much. Judge Whitelocke, it was true, alluded to the possibility of the ceremony not being completed; but he never dropped a hint in favour of the opposer's right to be heard. A useful pamphlet has been cited in this court, containing a collection of opinions upon the subject of the prerogative, in the form of a dialogue and statement. The question discussed is, whether the sovereign has the power of the keys the same as the pope, and can confer ecclesiastical orders. It takes the form of a dialogue between a Roman Catholic and a Church-of-England man. The former maintains the converse proposition; and the subject then branches off to the creation of bishops. The Church-of-England champion maintains that freedom of election in respect to bishopricks is consistent with the recommendation of the sovereign to the vacant see; that it does not exclude it. The Roman Catholic then suggests the appointment of an uncanonical or immoral person, to which the Church-of-England-man replies, that the kings of this country are wont to proceed in such matters carefully and piously; which is the reason why the Church of England is in such a flourishing condition. The Roman Catholic then urges that the sovereign is but a man, and, as such, subject to human weakness; to which his antagonist answers, that in such case the electors would no doubt represent the case to the king, beseeching His Majesty to take care whom he recommends to them: and he adds, the princes of England are so famous for their piety and condescension, that he has no doubt the sovereign would nominate another person. It appears from the pamphlet, that Charles the Second having taken into his serious consideration how much it would conduce to the honour of God so to do, resolved that no secretary of state should thenceforward move His Majesty to appoint to any bishoprick in the church without a certificate of the competency of the candidate signed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London. The same thing was done by William the Third; but in neither of those instances was the right of interference with the appointment of the Crown in any way recognized, nor any allusion made to the rejection of the individual nominated for election. The case of Bishop Gibson, which had been before mentioned, was a remarkable authority. He was assailed by one of the most learned Judges who ever sat in this court, Sir Michael Forster, as one who desired to create an ecclesiastical hierarchy, and to erect the church into an imperium in imperio. This charge it was that induced him to write that celebrated treatise which still remains a perfect storehouse of ecclesiastical law; but in no one page of which does he assert the existence of any power on the part of the archbishop to defeat by such an inquiry as that of confirmation, the right of nomination by the Crown. Certainly, some questionable applications have been made in regard to the subject. There are no less than four of these reported. In the case of Bishop Hoadley, for instance, that prelate gave his opponents free opportunities of making opposition to his confirmation, knowing that something was alleged against him. Archbishop Wake remonstrated successfully with the sovereign against the promotion of Dr. Samuel Clarke, and other sovereigns have consulted archbishops before promoting to the office of bishop. But not a word has been uttered, not a fact has been cited to shew that any archbishop has ever instituted or could institute any inquiry. Every one has heard in this case of the celebrated protest by thirteen or fourteen bishops to that prelate. The arguments they urged were arguments of great weight and power, but though they warned the minister of "scandal" arising from the nomination, not once did they allude to rejection of the prelate for confirmation on the ground of heresy. One of the objectors wished not to be exposed to the perils of a præmunire; but there was no assertion of the danger and disgrace so likely to arise from any opposition on the part of those who had procured the condemnation of the bishop by the convocation of the University of Oxford. It was said, indeed, that by not allowing the Court to inquire, the archbishop would be converted into a mere "machine." That word "machine" suggests to me the idea that the writ of this court may possibly be used as a machine with some sort of galvanic operation upon powers hitherto supposed to be extinct, which would thereby make some convulsive motions for the space of twenty days, and then relapse into the most profound repose. But that idea implies that the forms in which vitality is to be generated had a real existence. I do not believe that to have been the case. The duty of the archbishop in the matter appears to me to be clear and entirely apart from the functions of a Judge. It is, in my opinion, more analogous to the duty of a returning officer at elections. His confirmation is necessary. If his inquiries lead him to the opinion that the appointment would be injurious, he can remonstrate. He can advise the Crown not to issue a congé d'élire. He may ask to be removed from the painful operation of performing, or ordering to be performed, the duty of consecration after the election has been made. Even then he may resort to the presence of the sovereign, and pray to have the congé d'élire and the letters missive superseded. But even at the worst, if the Crown persists in nominating the particular person to be bishop, and if he is quite clear that the congé d'élire ought to be set aside, he may act as his conscience would doubtless dictate, and as some of the Judges of this court have acted, and resign the office which the Crown had given him. The present archbishop, I have no doubt, would do so after hearing the objections that are made to Dr. Hampden, if he did not consider that he would not be justified in such a course of proceeding. I ask whether it has been the opinion of any person, until this unfortunate controversy occurred, which has so influenced the public mind, that the archbishop had a veto on the appointment of the Crown to a vacant bishoprick? And when I hear the Court solemnly entreated not to call upon the archbishop to invoke the Almighty in prayer, and perform as a sacred ceremony that which is in reality a mockery, a shadow, and at best a useless form, I confess that I hardly know how to treat such an observation. Are the dean and chapter to be treated as nothing? Do they conduct their proceedings without prayer and solemn ceremony? And if they are required, notwithstanding, to proceed to the election, without the power of refusing to elect the nominee of the Crown, why should this argument be referred only to the confirmation, and not to the election? It may be an ill-considered act of parliament, and one, perhaps, that ought to be repealed; but why should there be any objection made to the solemn ceremony of the confirmation and not of the election, which is conducted with equal solemnity, and both of which are in conformity with the same act of parliament, I cannot understand. Having stated my reasons for the opinions which I deliberately, firmly, and conscientiously entertain—that what has been contended for in support of the rule never was at any time the law of England, I must say that I think the Court is bound to refuse the writ of mandamus. At the same time, I may state that I have had the greatest possible hesitation in coming to this conclusion; and the more especially as I feel that this is a refusal of an inquiry which in a railway or any ordinary case would at once be granted. My opinion is so strong against making such a rule absolute, and so entirely unchanged by what I have heard this day, notwithstanding I feel the greatest disposition to shew the highest respect for the sentiments of my learned Brethren who differ from me, that I cannot possibly say that this writ ought to go. I think, if it went, it would be good for nothing, for the return which would be made to it would be a sufficient answer. But I am also bound to consider the consequences which would arise from the issuing such a writ, viz. the frightful state of theological animosity which it would create and perpetuate for a period of, perhaps, two years, and the sanction it would give, upon the avoidance of every see, to the adoption of a similar course, where the archbishop would be called upon to summon all mankind in every case as objectors to the appointment by the Crown, and to keep open a Court, which, in fact, might never be closed. It must also be borne in mind that the Court has a discretion in the issuing of a mandamus, supposing even it thought that the proceeding complained of was of a judicial character, and that the archbishop might be compelled to hear the objectors; and in the exercise of this discretion, without regard to the legal right, I feel bound to refuse the writ. I must also acknowledge that some deference is due to the exalted person who is the defendant in this case, as well as to Dr. Hampden himself, whilst more regard is to be paid to the safety of the church and the peace of the state, which I verily believe would be perilled by the encouragement of the smallest doubt as to the true meaning and intention of the act of Henry the Eighth. I repeat, that I have the greatest respect for the opinions of my learned Brethren. I think, however, this is a question which ought to have been discussed. I must say, in reference to my Brother Coleridge's admirable argument, that it only confirms me as to the danger of exposing the clear construction of acts of parliament to those who bring down their forgotten books, and wipe off in this court the cobwebs from decretals and canons of which we, as Judges, know nothing. For these reasons, and thinking myself bound by the act of parliament and the practice which has prevailed, I think the rule must be discharged.

The Court being equally divided in opinion, the mandamus was not issued, and the rule nisi was accordingly

Principal and Agent—Continuing Authority—Baron and Feme—Liability.

The liability of a defendant who has cohabited with a female not his wife, and has allowed goods to be supplied at her residence on his credit, continues until the parties supplying the goods have been informed of the termination of such connexion.

Debt for goods sold and delivered, for work and labour, and on an account stated.

Pleas—First, except as to 9l. 2s., parcel, &c., never indebted; issue thereon. Secondly, payment into court of 9l. 2s., which the plaintiff took out of court.

At the trial, before Erle, J., at the Sittings after last term in Middlesex, it appeared that the plaintiff, a looking-glass and picture-frame maker, had, on different occasions, between the 2nd of July 1846 and the 20th of May 1847, furnished goods to a lady named Stanley, with whom the defendant had resided for two or three years prior to March 1846, but from whom he had separated on the 9th of November of that year. It appeared also that in 1843, the defendant and Mrs. Stanley were living in Upper Marylebone Lane, as man and wife. In that year goods were ordered of the plaintiff, and paid for by the defendant. They subsequently removed together to other residences, where goods were supplied to her, and the bills sent in to the defendant half-yearly, and paid by him up to December 1846. About the 8th of that month Mrs. Stanley removed to a house in Upper Seymour Street, and it was for articles supplied at that house that the defendant now contended he was not liable. The plaintiff was aware, throughout his dealing with the defendant, that Mrs. Stanley was not the defendant's wife, but there was no proof that he had received any direct intimation that the parties were separated, before supplying any of the articles charged in the bill of particulars. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 48*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*, with liberty to move to enter a nonsuit.

Humfrey (with whom was Hugh Hill) now moved accordingly. — Munro v. De Chemant (1) is a very strong authority in favour of the defendant. It is there put by Lord Ellenborough that a man is not liable on the contracts of a woman with whom he has previously cohabited after the cohabitation has ceased, unless she is proved to be really his wife. If this were not so, it would be difficult to say how long the agency of a woman, under such circumstances, is to be presumed to continue.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—It will be presumed to continue so long as the person giving credit on the faith of the connexion is uninformed of the separation.]

The evidence here shews that the plaintiff knew that the defendant was not married to the lady. The liability in such cases arises either from the implied relation of principal and agent, or from the relation of husband and wife supposed to exist between the parties. Here there was no evidence for the jury of either.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—In the case cited, the liability of the defendant was rested upon the fact of the goods supplied being necessities for which he was bound to pay, and that he could not deny that the woman was his wife, after having held her out as such. Here no such question arises; but it is merely whether the plaintiff sold her these goods on the faith of her still having authority to pledge the defendant's credit. These orders were given continuously, and those prior to the separation had all the authority of Sams. The rule must be refused.

PATTESON, J.—There certainly was evidence for the jury in this case. The defendant and Mrs. Stanley had lived in different places together. It is true the former had never passed the female off to the plaintiff as his wife, but he clearly authorized him to supply goods to her on his credit. No intimation of the separation was given to the plaintiff, and therefore the defendant's liability still continued.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case from Campbell was founded only on the marital liability of the defendant. This, on the other hand, is purely a question of agency. The mere change of place of abode was not sufficient to inform the plaintiff of the alteration of the position of the parties, for there had been at least three changes of residence before, and during all these the authority had continued. The plaintiff therefore had a right to suppose he was still supplying her on the defendant's credit.

ERLE, J.—It appeared to me, at the trial, that the defendant had so acted as to induce the plaintiff to suppose that Mrs. Stanley had a continuing authority, and therefore the action will lie.

Rule refused.

Land Tax, Redemption of—42 Geo. 3. c. 116.—Tenant for Life—Reversioner—Repayment of Consideration.

Where tenant for life has redeemed the land tax under 42 Geo. 3. c. 116, the reversioner may on coming into possession compel the representatives of such tenant for life to accept the consideration paid for such redemption, together with the arrears of interest, so as to render the land no longer chargeable with the yearly payment of interest.

Therefore, where the defendants in replevin avowed as devisees of a tenant for life in respect of the yearly sum payable as interest on the redemption money, and the plaintiff pleaded in bar that he held a moiety of the remainder in fee as tenant in common, and being desirous of freeing the lands from that charge, had, before the distress, tendered to the defendants the redemption money and interest which they had refused,—Held, that the plea in bar was good.

Replevin. Avowry, that before, &c., to wit, on &c., H. G. M. was seised for life of certain messuages, &c. in the parish of C, in the county of Kent, of which the close in which, &c. was parcel; that the said messuages, &c. were assessed for the said parish of C, for the year ending the 25th of March 1816, at the rate and assessment of 20l.; that before, &c. and after the passing of the statute 42 Geo. 3. c. 116, to wit, on the 28th of September, A.D. 1816, the said H. G. M. contracted with A. and B, two of the Commissioners acting under that statute, for the redemption of the 20l. land tax, and by the said contract the consideration for such redemption was declared to be so much money to be paid to the receiver general or his deputy for the county of Kent, as would be sufficient for the redemption of 3l. 6s. 8d., part of the said land tax, on or before the 25th of March 1817 (and so on yearly), the last portion being payable on or before the 26th of March 1822, according to the price of stock, &c.; that such contract was duly certified according to the form prescribed by the act of parliament; that before the said time when, &c., and during the lifetime of the said H.

G. M. the whole of the payments amounting to 525l. 5s. 0½d. had been duly made according to the terms of the contract, and that the contract was duly registered, whereby and by reason of the premises the land tax became and was redeemed by the said H. G. M. and the messuages, &c., including the close in which, &c. were wholly freed and exonerated from the said land tax, and chargeable for the benefit of the said H. G. M., his executors, &c., with the amount of the money paid as the consideration for its redemption, and with the payment of a yearly sum by way of interest thereon, equal in amount to the said land tax so redeemed as aforesaid; that H. G. M. died in 1829, having devised the yearly sum to his three daughters as tenants in common. The avowry then traced the yearly sum to the defendants by devise and assignment.

Plea in bar—That C. H. M. being seised in fee of the messuages, &c. died in 1804, having first devised to H. G. M. for life, remainder to the two daughters of C. H. M. as tenants in common; that on the death of H. G. M. in 1829, the trustees under the marriage settlement of one of the daughters became seised in fee of one moiety, and the other daughter of the other moiety, and thereupon demised to the plaintiff from year to year; that the trustees had always been ready to pay the redemption money in full, whereof the defendants had always had notice, and afterwards and before the said time when &c., the trustees for the purpose of freeing and discharging the said messuages from all charges in respect of the redemption money and interest, without the privity of the other daughter tendered the amount of the redemption money and interest to the defendants.

General demurrer and joinder.

The defendants' marginal point was, that the tender pleaded is bad in law, first, because the devisees or the representatives of a tenant for life, who redeemed the land tax under the 42 Geo. 3, cannot be compelled to accept a sum of money in satisfaction and discharge of the yearly sum payable by way of interest, with which the land became under the act charged for the benefit of the estate of such tenant for life. Secondly, that the trustees were seised of a moiety only of the lands charged, and could not compel the devisees or representatives of the tenant for life who had redeemed, to accept a sum of money in discharge of the yearly sum, without the privity or consent of the other tenant in common.

This case was argued (June 22,) by—

Hoggins, in support of the demurrer.—The statute 42 Geo. 3. c. 116. gives no power to the reversioner to compel the representatives of the tenant for life who has redeemed, and who has charged the land with an annuity in respect of the redemption money, under section 123 (1), to take back the redemption money, and so to free the lands of that charge. The argument derived from the absence of any provision to enable the reversioner to pay off is fortified by the circumstance that the previous Land Tax Act, 38 Geo. 3. c. 60. s. 18, has a provision that the reversioner next in succession, on coming into possession, and so on toties quoties, shall be entitled to an assignment of the contract, on paying the original contractor the consideration for his purchase. Neither is it equitable that the reversioner should at any time, taking advantage of the low price of stock, insist on redeeming at any period of time, after the annuity charged has passed through various hands, and become the subject of family settlement. Secondly, it would be also most unfair if the owners of one moiety should be able to redeem without the consent or even the knowledge of the owners of the other.

Bramwell, contra.—It is true that the statute 42 Geo. 3. c. 116. contains no express provision enabling the reversioner to redeem as against the tenant for life or his representatives; but that the act contemplated the existence of such a right may be inferred from various clauses. The title of the act is material: it is entitled "An act for consolidating the provisions of the several acts passed for the redemption and sale of the land tax into one act; and for making further provision for the redemption and sale thereof, and for removing doubts respecting the rights of persons claiming to vote, &c., in respect of messuages, lands, &c., which shall have been redeemed or purchased." The act accordingly contains two sets of provisions, one for the redemption, the other for the sale of the land tax. The redemption clause is section 10, which empowers all persons having any interest to redeem. Section 18. gives them a preference till a certain time. Section 19. gives a preference to parties in possession. There are then clauses, providing for the mode of payment, and giving the form of contract; and section 38. provides for the exoneration from the tax of the lands so redeemed. Section 40. lets in persons who had partially proceeded under former acts. The redemption being complete, and the tax, therefore, got rid of, the act contains various other provisions for something quite different from redemption. Sections 151, 152, 153. provide for the purchase and sale of the land tax. Section 154. provides that the purchaser, his heirs, &c. shall be seised of a fee-farm rent equal to the tax, and have a power of distress. There is then a third set of clauses providing for limited interests. The effect of the enactment was to create a debt, and it would be a great hardship if it could not be paid off. Suppose land liable to a charge of 20*l.* a year, under the act, is let on building leases, and becomes worth 10,000*l.* a year, is the whole of the land to remain for ever liable to distress? Section 155. uses the term "interest": what does that apply to?

(1) Which provides, that where any person or persons having any estate or interest (other than an estate of inheritance) in any manors, lands, &c., shall redeem the land tax charged thereon, by or out of his or their own absolute property, such manors, lands, &c., shall be and become chargeable for the benefit of such persons, his or their executors, administrators, &c., with the amount of the 34. per cent. annuities which shall have been transferred or with the amount of the monies paid as the consideration for the redemption of such land tax, as the case may be, and with the payment of a yearly sum or sums of money by way of interest thereon, equal in amount to the land tax redeemed.

[PATTERSON, J.—I see no provision enabling the owner of the land to pay off a fee farm rent. I suppose you would deal with it as something in the nature of a mortgage.]

Yes; and the case of Ex parte Northwick (2) will apply.

[ERLE, J.—That case only seems to decide that the mortgagee might accept the money, and that the charge is an incumbrance.]

If it is an incumbrance, the reversioner might pay it off. If it could be shewn that the reversioner was liable to be sued for it, it would surely follow as a consequence that he might pay it. In Hopkins v. the Mayor of Swansea (3) it was held, that whenever a debt is created by statute, an action will lie for it, though no right of action is created by express words; the enactment, that the lands are to be "chargeable," creates a statute debt.

[PATTESON, J.—There would be an injustice in saddling a person with a debt he never contracted or received consideration for.]

With respect to the statute 37 Geo. 3. c. 60, any argument to be derived from that act is in the plaintiff's favour. That act provides, by section 17, that by a contract for redemption the lands shall be wholly freed and exonerated from the land tax, unless the contractor should declare an option of being put on the footing of a purchaser. Section 18. applies to cases in which the option has been exercised, but in no case under that act is the land charged with the tax as a fee farm rent. As to the second point, it is perfectly clear that if this is a debt with which two parties are chargeable, either of the two may pay it.

Hoggins, in reply.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. subsequently (July 12) delivered the judgment of the Court (4).—In replevin the defendants avowed for the interest upon a sum paid for the redemption of the land tax, by a former tenant for life, under whom they claimed. The plaintiff pleaded that he held a moiety of the remainder in fee, and being desirous of freeing the lands from this charge, had before the distress tendered to the defendants the principal sum paid for such redemption, together with all the interest that was due, and they had refused the same. By the demurrer thereto, the question raised is, whether the person in remainder who has come to the possession of land, can compel the assignees of the tenant of a previous particular estate who has redeemed the land tax charged on such lands out of his own property to receive at any time the principal money paid as the consideration for such redemption, together with all arrears of interest, and so to free the land from the charge and payment of the interest. If he can, the plea is valid, because it shews a tender of the principal and interest before the distress; and though the present plaintiff is only tenant in common of a moiety, still if the right exists for a remainder-man in severalty, it appears to us that it would exist for each tenant in common, who might take the estate in remainder. The point depends upon the effect of the 42 Geo. 3. c. 116. s. 123, which in case of redemption of the land tax by a tenant of an estate not of inheritance, enacts, that the lands shall be and become chargeable for the benefit of such tenant, his executors, administrators and assigns, with the amount of the monies paid as the consideration for the redemption, and with the payment of a yearly sum by way of interest thereon, equal in amount to the land tax redeemed. The plaintiff contends that the land is hereby made subject to the payment of a debt and interest, which the holder of the land may at any time discharge. The defendant contends that the land is made subject to a perpetual annuity or rent-charge equal to the amount of the interest. It appears to us, that the plaintiff's is the true construction. If we confine our attention to this section, the expression, that "the land shall be chargeable with the principal sum for the benefit of the tenant and his executors," indicates the existence of a debt, and would have no effect if the enactment made the payment of interest an annuity without power of redemption, and gave neither party any right in respect of the principal; also the expression that "interest should be due" implies a debt, and is not the language for creating an annuity. If we regard the other parts of the statute, the presumption in favour of this construction is increased. The legislature has provided for charging the land tax redeemed either in perpetuity or for a time, and has used throughout the act appropriate language for a continuing annual charge, where such was the intention.

By section 88, when bishops redeem with monies raised under the statute, the land tax redeemed is made a perpetual charge to be added to the accustomed yearly rent; so by section 89, in case of redemption of the land tax on the lands comprised therein, it is added to the rent of existing leases.

(3) 4 Mee. & Wels. 621; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. s. c. Exch. 121.

(4) Lord Denman, C.J., Patteson, J., Coleridge, J. and Erle, J.

But the 154th section affords the most important contrast, which provides for the sale of the land tax to a purchaser unconnected with the estate; it provides that such purchaser and his heirs shall be entitled to demand, and shall be deemed to be in the actual seisin of a yearly rent, as a fee farm rent, equal to the land tax redeemed, to be issuing and payable out of the lands which were liable. It is not easy to suppose that the legislature intended to produce the same result by two enactments, which are so very different in their words. The precautions required by the statute before a stranger is allowed to fix an annual payment irredeemable on the lands, make it probable that the enactment in question was intended to create a debt payable at any time.

The statute regards those who are interested in the estate, whether jointly or successively, as one owner, and gives to any one of them a preference over strangers to redeem, and prevents the sale to a stranger till notice has been given to them and they have refused to redeem, it being considered that the fixing a perpetual rent-charge on the estate might be a great inconvenience to the owners. But in the case where the ownership is to pass to several in succession, and the preference to redeem is given to the holder of the particular estate who happens to be in possession, it would be an unreasonable sacrifice of those in remainder to him if he was allowed the choice of investing his money, so as to fix a perpetual incumbrance on those who are to succeed, they probably being of the same family, or taking under the same grantor, and so not wholly to be disregarded by the tenant of the particular estate, and they being in many instances either under the disabilities of coverture or infancy, and so incapable of default, or holding contingent interests only, and so not entitled to interfere. If the tenant of the particular estate makes the necessary advance, it is just to him that his advance with interest should be secured to him, and it is just to those in remainder that they so indemnify him should be allowed to free their estate. The construction we adopt attains these objects. It is confirmatory that the clause relating to redemption by one coparcener, section 124, is worded in the same way. They may well be considered to be of one family, and the advance by one to be a loan to the others, secured on their estates, which they might pay off with interest, this being an indemnity to the coparcener that made the advance; and such redemption is distinguishable from the more hostile description where a stranger has the fee farm rent above mentioned, in case of total default of all interested in the estate. This statute is pari materid with, and in a degree in furtherance of, the 38 Geo. 3. c. 60, and a reference to that statute makes the construction clear. That statute also gave a preference to those who were interested, and enabled a tenant not of the inheritance to redeem, and gave such tenant an option either to declare his wish to be considered on the footing of a purchaser not being interested or not, and if he so declares, he is to have all the rights of such purchaser, section 17; and by section 37, he and his executors, administrators and assigns, are to hold the land tax so redeemed as an annuity issuing out of the lands, subject to a power of redemption about to be mentioned. And by section 18, where such option shall have been declared by such tenant, viz. to have a continuing annuity, it shall be lawful for those in remainder at any time after the remainder has vested in possession to demand from the proprietor of such annuity (that is, the land tax) an assignment of his interest therein, on transferring to him the same amount of 3*l*. per cent. stock as was transferred by the original contractor for redemption, and such proprietor is to make an immediate assignment, and persons under disability are capacitated to assign. These are the provisions for the alternative of such tenant electing to have a continuing annuity. The legislature pointedly negatives his right to effect this against the will of those in remainder, and enables them at any moment after possession to clear the land of the annuity, by transferring the same amount of stock. The provisions for the other alternative, when such tenant does not so declare his option, are now to be considered. In that case, by section 37, the lands shall be and become chargeable for the benefit of such person, his executors, administrators, and assigns, with the amount of the 3*l*. per cents. which shall have been transferred as the consideration for the redemption, and with the payment of such yearly sum of money by way of interest thereon as shall be equal to the land tax redeemed. It is almost certain that the legislature must by these words have intended to create a debt in the nature of a mortgage, which the mortgagor, upon coming to the possession, might at any time pay off by returning the principal stock, and paying up the interest; for it would be inconsistent to provide that the annuity might be redeemable at any moment if the tenant for life declared his option to have it permanent; but if he declared no such option, it should be permanent, and those in remainder should have no power of redemption, so that permanence should be taken away where the option to have it should be declared, and should be granted where such option is not declared. These being the provisions in respect of options by such tenants in the 38 Geo. 3, by the 42 Geo. 3. certain alterations are made: the power of declaring the option is no longer to exist; a power to dispose of the cases, where the option has been already declared under the former act, is provided by section 40; and by section 23, if the land tax does not exceed 25*l.*, the consideration for redemption may be money instead of stock. Then by section 123. the provision is made for charging the land with the debt in case of redemption by tenant of a particular estate. The provision is literally the same as that in 38 Geo. 3. for such charge, where such tenant had not declared his option; in that case we have seen the words created a debt, which those in remainder might at any moment pay off, and as the 38 Geo. 3. is for many purposes recognized and continued by the present act, it is almost certain that the legislature, by re-enacting this clause in terms, intended it should have its former effect. These being the reasons for the construction that the debt and interest might be paid off, it remains to consider the grounds adduced for holding that a permanent charge was created. It was said that there were no words expressly compelling the creditor to receive the debt, but express provision is not to be expected; generally speaking, no compulsion is necessary for the receipt of a debt. It was said that there was no provision for compelling a debtor to pay at any time. There is not; but the legislature may have well considered that the lands were an ample security; that the interest was a compensation; and that if the principal was wanted, this charge as a mortgage might be assigned, and so the consideration raised. It was said that there was hardship in giving those in remainder the option to pay off at any moment, because they might choose to pay off when the 3*l.* per cents. were low, and so gain an advantage; but this ground is founded on misconception. By the 38 Geo. 3. the consideration was to be 3*l.* per cent. stock, and the payment was to be by transfer of stock only. By the 42 Geo. 3, where the land tax does not exceed 25*l.* the consideration may be money. In the present case the land tax was 20*l.*, and the consideration was money as alleged in the pleadings; and therefore those who seek to pay off the debt have to repay the same amount of money which was originally paid for the redemption, and the price of stock has no bearing. Even if this inconvenience had existed it would have been no argument, for the 38 Geo. 3. s. 18. expressly provided for redemption at any moment by transferring an equal amount of stock. If inconvenience is to be considered at all, it affords a strong argument in favour of the construction we have adopted; for thereby an indemnity is secured for the tenant who advances the money, and a provision to free from incumbrance is secured to the successors; but by the other construction the tenant of the particular estate might injure the inheritance by a perpetual incumbrance affecting every part of it, and without a power of apportioning the charge which would be requisite, and which is expressly provided where a permanent rent-charge is intended by section 155. It follows that our judgment is for the plaintiff.

Nor is it an objection that it does not appear on the face of the order or on the examinations, that the pauper did not become chargeable in respect of relief made necessary by sickness or accident.

A pauper, after residing thirteen years in H, was, by an order which was unappealed against, on the 1st of March 1845, removed to A, where she remained, receiving relief out of the workhouse there until the 19th of March, when, on being promised 7s. 6d. a week by the guardians of A, she returned to H, where her friends lived, and where she had always been desirous of returning. On her return to H, she took possession of a house which she had rented before her removal to A, and of which she had kept the key, and in which she had left her furniture whilst she remained at A. The guardians of A, discontinuing the promised allowance, she again became chargeable to H, on the 4th of November 1846, and another order was made for her removal to A:—Held, that she was properly removable notwithstanding the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, as the first removal to A. entirely put an end to the residence at Halifax.

—Pleading—Departure.

Where the sheriff seizes goods in execution, and assigns to the execution creditor, having notice that a year's rent is due to the landlord, though he may be liable to an action at the suit of the landlord, yet such landlord cannot distrain for his year's rent while the goods are in the possession of the sheriff or his assignee.

Trespass qu. cl. fr. of plaintiff. Plea, entry to seize growing crops under a distress for rent. Replication, a previous seizure under a fi. fa., at the suit of the plaintiff against the tenant of the locus in quo, and an assignment to the plaintiff by the sheriff under it. Rejoinder, that the seizure was made after notice to the sheriff and to the plaintiff that a year's rent was due to the landlord, and that neither the plaintiff nor the sheriff paid such year's rent, wherefore the landlord (the defendant) distrained:—Held, that the rejoinder was bad.

Held, also, that the replication was good, and was no departure from the declaration, which stated the closes to be the closes of the plaintiff, for although the replication shewed a tenant from whom the rent was due at the time of the execution, yet such possession was consistent with the possession of the plaintiff at the time of the trespass.

Trespass for breaking and entering, on &c., and on divers other days, four closes of the plaintiff, and reaping, mowing, and cutting the wheat and oats of the plaintiff.

Second count, asportavit of wheat, oats, and straw.

Fourth plea to the first count, that before &c., one John Lind, from thence until &c., held the closes in which &c. in the first count mentioned, together with other premises, as tenant thereof to the defendants, under a certain demise, &c., and that 40l., being a half-year's rent, was at the said time when, &c., in arrear, wherefore the defendants, on the first day when, &c., did enter, &c., in order to distrain, and did then distrain for the said rent, and afterwards, on the day last aforesaid, and when the said wheat and oats were ripe, did gather and cut the said wheat and oats for the purpose and in order that the defendants might carry, lay up, and impound the said wheat and oats, as such distress as aforesaid, on the most proper, fit, and convenient part of the said premises so held, &c., according to the form of the statute, &c. Sixth plea, as to the first count, that the rent was in arrear, [as in the former plea,] and that the goods in the second count mentioned were on the premises so held by John Lind, and liable to be distrained, and the defendants then seized and distrained them.

Replication to the fourth plea, that before the said times when, &c. in the said first count mentioned, the plaintiffs recovered a judgment in the Court of Queen's Bench against John Lind for 377l. 8s. 5d. debt, and 9l. 19s. costs, and that the plaintiffs sued out a writ of fi. fa. to levy the above sums, which writ was delivered to the sheriff, who, by virtue thereof, seized the wheat and oats in the first count mentioned, the same being the growing crops of the said John Lind, and being of great value, &c., and therefore within a reasonable time afterwards, and before the said times when, &c., and before the defendants entered and distrained, as in the said fourth plea mentioned, and whilst the said writ remained in full force, to wit, on &c., the sheriff duly bargained, sold, and assigned the said wheat and oats so seized and taken in execution, and so being the growing crops of the said John Lind as aforesaid, to the now plaintiffs, for 38*l.* 10*s.*, and the now plaintiffs thereupon became and were possessed of the said wheat and oats then being growing crops until the said times when, &c.; and that before a reasonable time had elapsed for the cutting and gathering the said wheat and oats by the plaintiffs, and whilst the same were growing, to wit, on &c., the defendants entered and distrained and afterwards cut and gathered the same, as in the fourth plea mentioned. Verification.

Similar replication to the sixth plea.

Rejoinder to the replication to the fourth plea, that the said rent so due and in arrear, as in the said fourth plea mentioned, became so due and in arrear long before the said time when the plaintiffs sued and prosecuted out of the said court the said writ in the said replication mentioned, and long before the day of the teste of the same writ, and long before the said time when the said writ was delivered to the said sheriff, as in the said replication alleged, and also long before the said time when the said sheriff seized and took in execution the said wheat and oats, as in the said replication mentioned, in manner and form, &c., to wit, on &c., and of all which premises the plaintiffs and also the said sheriff, before the said time when the said sheriff bargained, sold, and assigned the said wheat and oats to the plaintiffs, as in the said replication mentioned, to wit, on &c., had notice; and that the said last-mentioned wheat and oats, at the said time when the same wheat and oats were seized and taken in execution, were certain wheat and oats which were in and upon the said closes in which, &c. in the said first count and fourth plea respectively mentioned, whereof the plaintiffs and also the said sheriff, then and before the said time when the said sheriff bargained, sold, the said wheat and oats to the plaintiffs, or at any time before the said time when, &c. in the said first count mentioned, pay to the defendants, so being such landlords as aforesaid, or to their bailiff, the said rent so due and in arrear as aforesaid, or any part thereof; wherefore the defendants, on the said day when, &c. did enter into and upon the said closes in which, &c., for the purpose and in order to seize, take, and distrain the said wheat and oats as and for a distress for the said rent so due and in arrear as aforesaid, and afterwards cut and gathered the same as in the fourth plea mentioned, as the defendants lawfully might for the causes hereinbefore and in the said fourth plea mentioned, and of all which premises the plaintiffs then had notice, which are the same supposed trespasses in the said first count mentioned, and which are in the said fourth plea above justified. Similar rejoinder to the replication to the sixth plea.

Demurrers to each rejoinder, assigning for causes that the rejoinder confessed the facts stated in the replication, and did not avoid them; and that it ought to have shewn a seizure for the rent anterior to the seizure and sale by the sheriff; and that the landlord could not legally distrain the crops which had been legally seized by the sheriff, and sold to the plaintiffs, before a reasonable time for the plaintiffs to gather and remove them; and that the rejoinder should have shewn that the crops were removed from the premises by the sheriff or the execution creditor, without paying the landlord a year's rent.

This case was argued (July 1) by—

W. H. Watson, in support of the demurrer (1).—The rejoinder raises a question which has never been expressly decided; namely, whether, where growing crops have been seized in execution, and assigned to a purchaser, the landlord can distrain if the rent is not paid before removal. Before the statute 8 Ann. c. 14. goods in the custody of the law could not be distrained, and they must of course be held as much entitled to protection in the hands of the vendee as in the hands of the sheriff. It is true that that statute makes the goods seized in execution liable to the payment of a year's rent; but the seizure in execution stands good, and the sheriff is liable to an action if he removes the goods without paying a year's rent; but the landlord cannot enter and distrain. In Peacock v. Pervis (2), the year's rent had been paid; but that case is important as shewing the rights of the vendee. Smallman v. Pollard (3) may be relied on on the other side. The remarks made by several of the Judges, as reported in that case, were not necessary for the decision of the question raised in it, and are not supported by any authority. Perhaps if the goods were left on the premises an unreasonable time after the seizure and sale under the execution, they might be liable to be distrained—Cocker v. Musgrove (4). Secondly, there is no departure, as this assignment gives the vendee an interest in the land until the crops are reaped; besides, the goods were in the custody of the law.

(1) The defendants' points were, amongst others that the crops were not, at the time of the distress, in the custody of the law, or otherwise protested against the distress. That the replication was a departure from the declaration, as the first count alleged the closes to be the closes of the plaintiffs; but the replication admitted, that at the times when, &c. they were the closes of John Lind. That the sheriff having, after notice of the rent being due, proceeded to a sale under the execution, his bill of sale to the plaintiffs was void at all events, as against the defendants; and the plaintiffs could not, by their own unlawful act in proceeding with their execution, defeat the defendants' claim or remedy for their rent. That both counts of the declaration and both the replications were bad and insufficient.

Hindmarsh, contra.—It is true that rent becoming due after the levy cannot be distrained for—Peacock v. Pervis; but here the plaintiff and the sheriff had notice, before the levy, that the rent was due. The sale, therefore, was void. The sheriff's hands were tied by the notice; and his legal custody did not exist after the notice—Blades v. Arundale (5) and Wintle v. Freeman (6). Lastly, as to the departure. If the goods were in the custody of the law the plaintiff had not the possession.

Watson, in reply.—The landlord is not in a worse situation by the goods remaining on the premises, as he could not, had he distrained, have removed them before they

LORD DENMAN, C.J. subsequently (July 19) delivered the judgment of the Court (7).—The declaration in this case contains two counts in trespass. The first for breaking and entering the closes of the plaintiffs and cutting down growing crops of corn. The second upon a cepit et asportavit. The defendants plead to the first count, and justify under a distress for rent due for the closes from one John Lind. They also plead a similar plea to the second count. The plaintiffs reply separately to each plea, shewing a judgment at the suit of the plaintiffs against John Lind, and a writ of fiery facias under which the sheriff seized the growing crops in question and sold them to the plaintiffs, and that before a reasonable time had elapsed for cutting and gathering them the defendants distrained and seized thereon. The defendants rejoin that the rent for which the distress was made became due long before the judgment; that the sheriff and the plaintiffs had due notice of it; that it continued in arrear and did not exceed one year's rent; that they required the sheriff before he sold to the plaintiffs to pay the rent, of which also the plaintiffs had notice, and that it was not paid. The plaintiffs demurred.

On the argument, it was contended for the defendants, that as regards the first count the replication was a departure, inasmuch as the count alleges the closes to be the closes of the plaintiffs, whereas the replication shews them to have been the closes of John Lind. We think that there is nothing in this point. The plea, being in confession and avoidance, admits the possession of the plaintiffs at the time when the trespass complained of was committed, and there is nothing in the replication inconsistent with that fact, for it only admits the rent to be due from J. Lind, and that he was in possession when the sheriff entered under the fiery facias long antecedent to the trespass complained of: both of which circumstances are quite consistent with the possession of the plaintiffs at the time of that trespass. The principal question in the case is, whether the growing crops so seized by the sheriff and sold to the plaintiffs could be distrained for antecedent rent of which the sheriff and the plaintiffs had notice, and which they neglected to pay. That goods which are in the custody of the law cannot be distrained for rent is clear: the point therefore is, whether these crops are to be considered to have been in such custody when the defendants seized them. If the rent had been paid, it is plain that they would have been in such custody, though in the hands of a vendee under the sheriff, and not of the sheriff himself—Peacock v. Purvis. In that case it is true that rent distrained for accrued after the seizure under the fiery facias, but still it establishes the principle that the crops in the hands of the sheriff's vendee are as much in custodia legis as if in the hands of the sheriff, until they are in such a state as to be capable of removal. We have then to consider what is the effect of the statute 8 Anne, c. 14. s. 1, whether goods seized by the sheriff under a writ of fiery facias are prevented by the operation of that statute from being in custodia legis, so far as regards the landlord's right of distress for one year's rent then due. The statute says, that no goods shall be liable to be taken by virtue of any execution, unless the party at whose suit the execution is sued out shall, before the removal of such goods from off such premises by virtue of such execution, pay to the landlord of the premises rent not exceeding one year.

The words cannot be taken literally. The true construction is given in Riseley v. Ryle (8) by Parke, B. The meaning is, that the sheriff shall not remove the goods unless a year's rent be first paid. The seizure is lawful prima facie; but if the goods be removed without payment of the rent, after notice that it is due, such removal renders the whole proceeding unlawful as regards the landlord, and subjects the sheriff to an action on the case at his suit. The goods, however, in the mean time until they are removed are in custodia legis. A bill of sale of the goods is not a removal, as was established in the case of Smallman v. Pollard. If indeed the sheriff receives the proceeds under such bill of sale, either from a stranger vendee absolutely, or from the execution creditor constructively, he being an officer of the court will be compelled on motion to pay over a year's rent to the landlord—West v. Hedges (9), Henchett v. Kimpson (10); but such bill of sale and receipt will not amount to a removal so as to subject him to an action. In the case of growing crops possibly the sheriff may sell either for a sum of money to be paid immediately, or for a larger sum to be paid on reaping and removal of the crops; and in the latter case he could not be called upon by the landlord by motion to pay his rent until the time came for removal of the crops. The landlord is in no way injured by this, for if there had been no execution and he had distrained the crops for his rent under 11 Geo. 2. c. 14. s. 8, he could not sell them till they were reaped, and must therefore wait for his money till that time. There seems, therefore, to be no reason why he should be held to be authorized by the statute of Anne to do that which at common law he could not do, namely, to distrain goods in custodiâ legis, but rather that that act intended to give him protection through the liability of the sheriff in lieu of his right of distress which is taken away by the seizure under a fiery facias. This appears to be the reasonable construction of the statute of Anne in regard to goods of any kind seized by the sheriff; and it is more strongly so in regard to growing crops which, although liable to be taken in execution by the common law, were not liable to be distrained for rent until the statute 11 Geo. 2.

It is true that in the case of Smallman v. Pollard there are dicta of the learned Judges, especially of Mr. Justice Maule, intimating their opinion, that by the statute of Anne the landlord's right to distrain is preserved; but those dicta are entirely beside the point on which the case was determined, which was simply that the declaration against the sheriff alleged a removal of the goods (which allegation Mr. Justice Cresswell considered to be necessary), and the fact of removal was not established by proof of a bill of sale, the goods remaining on the premises. With all possible respect towards the learned Judges whose dicta are there stated, we cannot agree with them in opinion. We think that the crops in question, having been lawfully seized by the sheriff (for not having been removed at the time of the trespass complained of, the seizure of them had not been rendered unlawful), were in custodiâ legis though in the hands of the plaintiffs, the vendees, under a bill of sale from the sheriff, and could not by law be distrained for any rent. We think that the statute of Anne does not preserve any right in the landlord so to distrain, but gives him his remedy against the sheriff in lieu of such right, and that our judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

Bankruptcy—Execution—Notice of prior Act of Bankruptcy—Service on Clerk of Attorney—2 & 3 Vict. c. 29.

Notice of a prior act of bankruptcy given to a clerk of an attorney, who had issued a writ of execution, at the office and in the absence of his master, such clerk not being shewn to have had personally the conduct of the suit in which execution issued, will not operate to defeat the execution under the proviso in the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. s. 1, until communicated by the clerk to his master.

This was an action on the case against the defendant as sheriff of Berks, for neglecting to levy under a writ of fi. fa. delivered to him against certain persons named Toms and Matthews, at the suit of the plaintiff, until after the lapse of a reasonable time in that behalf, and until after the plaintiff had received notice of a prior act of bankruptcy committed by Toms and Matthews, whereby he was deprived of the benefits of his execution.

Pleas (inter alia) not guilty, and that a reasonable time had not elapsed before the receipt by the plaintiff of the notice of the act of bankruptcy. Issue thereon.

At the trial, before Coleridge, J., at the Gloucestershire Summer Assizes, 1847, it appeared, that the writ in question was lodged with the town agents of the sheriff of Berks on the 2nd of December 1846, and that a warrant was forwarded by them by post the same night to the bailiff at Newbury, the place of business of Toms and Matthews being at Hungerford, which is distant nine miles from Newbury. The sheriff of Berks never had a bound bailiff at Hungerford. It appeared that the post arrived at Newbury about nine o'clock in the morning, and the plaintiff called as a witness a boy who was a clerk in the office of Mr. Astley, an attorney at Hungerford, who was in partnership with Matthews, who stated that the bailiff called at their office as early as a quarter before ten on the morning of December the 3rd. It also appeared, that on the same morning a docket was struck against Toms and Matthews, and a verbal notice that they had committed acts of bankruptcy given a few minutes after ten o'clock at the office of Mr. Hooker, the plaintiff's attorney, to a clerk who had issued the writ of execution in the cause. Mr. Hooker had not then arrived at his office, but the clerk undertook to communicate the notice to him, which he accordingly did on his arrival about a quarter before eleven; a written notice to the same effect was also served on Mr. Hooker himself soon after eleven. The defendant gave evidence shewing that Macgraw (the bailiff) did not quit Newbury until ten o'clock on that morning, and that he had borrowed a horse for the purpose of going over to Hungerford, there being no public conveyance before the afternoon, and that he reached that place about half-past eleven, and levied about half-past twelve or one. The counsel for the defendant contended, that the verbal notice given to the clerk of the plaintiff's attorney at his office was a valid notice from the time when it was given to defeat the execution under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. s. 1, and that taking all the evidence together there was no such unreasonable delay in the execution of the writ as ought to make the sheriff liable to this action.

The learned Judge thought the notice of the act of bankruptcy could only operate from the time when it was communicated to Hooker, by his clerk, and told the jury that although a levy at one o'clock would have been early enough under ordinary circumstances, yet if they thought Macgraw was in Hungerford as early as ten o'clock, and had neglected to levy before a quarter to eleven, the time when notice of the act of bankruptcy was communicated to Hooker, he had been guilty of unreasonable delay.

The jury under this ruling gave a verdict for the plaintiff.

In the ensuing term,—

H. S. Keating obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection as to the notice, and also on affidavits, against which—

Talfourd, Serj. and Gray shewed cause. —It is not denied that the principle laid down by Coleridge, J. in Rothwell v. Timbrell (1), that notice to the attorney in the cause is notice to the client, is correct. But the notice given, as here, to a mere clerk in the attorney's office, not clothed with any authority to act on behalf of the client, is of no avail to defeat the execution. The words in the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. s. 1. are "provided the persons at whose suit the execution was issued had not notice of a prior act of bankruptcy," and notice there must clearly mean knowledge by some person who is authorized by the party issuing the execution to act upon that knowledge, as much judgment and discretion may be required to determine what ought to be done on the receipt of such a notice as the present. In Ramsey v. Eaton (2) the Court held, that notice to the sheriff's officer was insufficient, as he was not the agent of the execution creditor. That is the principle upon which the few decisions on this point have proceeded. It may be argued that this was a managing clerk, and had some greater authority to act for his master than is ordinarily the case with clerks in attorneys' offices, but that does not appear from the evidence. No doubt he acted officially in issuing the writ, but that was only under his master's direction. There is nothing to shew that he was treated otherwise than as a mere conduit pipe to convey the information to his master, and he could not have been in a condition to act upon the notice at the time he received it. If the view taken by the defendant be correct, notice given at an attorney's office to a boy or a laundress there would be sufficient. Conway v. Nail (3) was also referred to (4).

(4) The Court heard the argument as to the misdirection only in the first instance.

H. S. Keating and H. J. Hodgson, in support of the rule.—This is a notice given in the course of a suit, and stands on the same footing with other similar notices, which are well served upon any clerk at the office of the attorney. In fact, it is the place where the service is made which is the most material consideration, as the Courts consider that an attorney is bound to be present either by himself or some person qualified to receive notices during business hours. Grant v. Mackenzie (5) is a very strong authority on that point. There a notice was put through the door of an attorney's office during the regular hours, and it was held on the same principle that it was a good service from the time when it was so put through the door.

[PATTESON, J.—That was a notice of taxation given in the progress of the cause, and therefore different from such a notice as this.]

It is submitted that it ought to be regarded in the same light. Neither notice is strictly a step in the cause, but it is immediately connected with, and affects the proceedings in the cause. Suppose the attorney is absent from London, surely service at his office upon a clerk there is more likely to be effective than if made personally on him at a distant place.

It would be a question for the jury, whether the person receiving it had authority. No such question was here left to them.

[ERLE, J.—You must go the length of saying it would be good service if it were put through the door or delivered to any person, or at any place referred to by a notice on the attorney's door.]

Grant v. Mackenzie and Lackington v. Elliot (6) support such a view. As to this being a managing clerk, that is a question which ought to have been left to the jury. It is not necessary that he should be what is called the general managing clerk of the office, it is enough if he appears to have had the conduct of the particular suit, and that it is submitted does appear in the evidence. Rothwell v. Timbrell was the first case where notice to the attorney acting in the cause was held to be a notice to affect the client, and that was followed up by Bird v. Bass (7).

[COLERIDGE, J.—Merely issuing execution, which is all that this clerk appears to have done, is not such an acting in the cause as will render him the immediate agent of the client.]

The notice in such a case as the present is merely technical, and whether given to the attorney or his client it would have been utterly impossible for either of them in London to have taken any step which could have stopped the execution in Berkshire. Its effect is to defeat not to prevent the levy by the sheriff.

On a subsequent day in this term (June 13) the judgment of the Court (8) on the point of law was delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The point which has been argued in this case, and on which we think it right to pronounce our judgment before we go into the remaining questions, arises on the first proviso in the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. s. 1. That section enacts "that all contracts, dealings and transactions by and with any bankrupt, really and bond fide made and entered into before the date and issuing of the fiat against him, and all executions and attachments against the lands and tenements, or goods and chattels of such bankrupt, bond fide executed or levied before the date and issuing of the fiat, shall be deemed to be valid, notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy by such bankrupt committed; provided the person or persons so dealing with such bankrupt, or at whose suit or on whose account such execution or attachment shall have issued, had not at the time of such contract, dealing or transaction, or at the time of executing or levying such execution or attachment, notice of any prior act of bankruptcy by him committed." Upon these words the question is, whether a notice in other respects treated as sufficient, but served on a clerk of the plaintiff's attorney issuing the writ of execution, such clerk not being shewn to have had personally the conduct of the suit, will take the execution out of the protection of the clause. The learned Judge ruled that it would not. In deciding this question, it is important, of course, to consider the object of the proviso, which is in restraint of the previous enactment, and that is clearly this:—whereas dealings with a trader bond fide carried on, or executions issued out against his property in ignorance of a prior act of bankruptcy, and prior to the date of the fiat, are to be protected, nothing is to be done to relieve from the ordinary operation of the bankrupt law any transaction entered into or any execution levied with notice of such act. And, in advancement of this, a second proviso further limits the operation of the enacting part of the section, by providing, that even where there is no such notice, still if the payment by the bankrupt be in the way of a fraudulent preference by him, or the execution be founded on a judgment or warrant of attorney, or cognovit, which he has given by way of fraudulent preference, the act shall give no protection. On the receipt of the notice it becomes the duty of the person properly served to stop the transaction or execution as the case may be. This, then, being the object of the proviso, the notice must be understood to be such as will advance it, and therefore in the case of an execution it has been held, rightly we think, in Rothwell v. Timbrell, that although the words are the person or persons at whose suit or on whose account the execution issues, yet notice to the attorney who conducts the cause for him, when acting in the cause, is sufficient. It is obvious that notice to him will in the majority of such cases be more effectual to stop promptly the further proceedings, than notice to the client himself. And it would be easy to suppose cases where the clerk of the attorney may have been so entirely entrusted with the management of the cause, and the control of the proceedings, that notice to him might be as effectual as to his principal, and equally bind the client. And so in the cases of contracts, dealings and other transactions in business, instances might be put of confidential clerks or managers invested with such authority in the management of their masters' affairs, or so trusted in the particular negotiation, that a notice to them ought to stop at once the further progress of it, and therefore would bind the principal as a notice to himself. The statute in terms requires, that the person dealing or suing should have notice, not that he should be personally served; and wherever in the transaction or the suit he has put, or allowed to be put, some one else in his place to manage or controul, in good sense and equity a notice to that person must be considered a notice to himself. This being the principle, the question is, whether such a clerk as we have described from the evidence in the cause, falls within it. The counsel for the defendant contended that he did; that any clerk at the office of the attorney—the place where all notices in the cause were to be served—was such clerk; nay, that any other person, at any other place, to whom or at which by notice over his door, the attorney might direct papers, letters, or notices in a cause to be delivered, was such an agent as might receive a notice under the proviso, to bind the client. But there is an obvious distinction between such a notice and those notices and matters which, in the ordinary progress of a cause, must be passing from one attorney to the other. That the cause may proceed with regularity and without delay, the Courts require that the attorney shall always be at his office, or have some competent person there during office hours, for the purpose of receiving them, and as to these, the attorney is regarded not merely as the mere agent of the client, but rather as a substituted principal. What is required upon a notice of this kind to be done or communicated, there ought to be a clerk at the office sufficiently skilled and entrusted to be able to do or communicate, or take the necessary step upon, if the attorney himself be absent; and the client must suffer if his attorney be guilty of any default in not employing such a clerk. But the notice now in question was not a notice in the cause; it was the intervention of a third party, on the result of which would depend the perception or not of the whole fruits of the cause. It cannot be said that the clerk receiving it had authority to stay the issuing or the levying of the execution, nor that his master was bound at all office hours to have a clerk there with such authority in his own absence. This was a matter which would require the whole discretion of the principal to determine whether he would yield to it, or enforce his writ, and attorneys are not bound in all cases to have in their employment clerks to whom such extensive authority may be safely entrusted. What has been called a managing clerk is by no means a necessary officer in an attorney's establishment; it would be very unjust to require it, and it must not be taken that even such a person would, under all circumstances, be one on whom such a notice could be effectually served. If it be said that the doctrine now laid down may sometimes lead to injustice, and that by the absence of the attorney from his office it may become impossible to serve the notice in time to prevent the execution from taking effect, the answer is that the proviso embraces other cases than that of execution, and must be construed throughout on the same principle; that, even as construed by us, the party seeking to prevent the operation of execution has unavoidably an advantage over him who seeks to invalidate a mercantile transaction, because he has in all cases both the client and attorney, on either of whom he may serve the notice as may be most convenient; but lastly, and chiefly, that the statute is framed in advancement of the policy of modern legislation to restrain the relation to the act of bankruptcy, and that we ought to be careful not to limit that by a notice which is in truth merely nugatory as regards the object with which it is professed to be served. The words compel us to hold that where the notice is served on a proper person before the execution levied, it must have effect, even where from distance it cannot be used to stop it, but we ought not to go beyond that. We think, therefore, that in this case, having regard to the exact circumstances, the ruling of the learned Judge was right, and it is clear that the party serving the notice treated the clerk merely as a channel through which it was to reach the attorney, and never intended to rely on the service on him as in itself good service.

In the ensuing vacation the rule was further argued upon the affidavits, when the Court ordered that it should be discharged.

Where the declaration alleged that the defendant, an attorney, wrongfully, and without the consent or retainer of the plaintiff, entered an appearance for him in an action brought by D. (a third party) against the plaintiff, and took upon himself to conduct the action, and such proceedings were thereupon had that D. recovered judgment, and issued execution, and the plaintiff was obliged to pay the amount recovered and the costs of the execution, and "by reason of the premises" was injured in his credit and character,—Held ill, after verdict, as not shewing any damage resulting from any act of the defendant.

Case. The declaration stated, that before and at the time of the committing, &c., he, the defendant, was and still is an attorney of the Court of Queen's Bench, at Westminster, and whereas also before, &c. a certain writ of summons had been duly issued out of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, in a certain action against the plaintiff, at the suit of one Adolphus Dyer, which said writ, at the time of the committing, &c., still was and continued to be in full force, but no further proceedings, beyond the issuing of the said writ, had then been had in the same action, nor would the plaintiff have defended the same, nor had the defendant then been nor was he then or at any time thereafter retained or employed by the plaintiff to defend the said action; all which said premises he, the defendant, before and at the time, &c., well knew, yet the defendant, heretofore, to wit, on &c., then and there still being such attorney as aforesaid, but contriving, &c., did wrongfully and injuriously, and without the consent, authority, or retainer of the plaintiff, and without any just or reasonable cause in that behalf, enter an appearance for the plaintiff in the said action, and did afterwards, without the consent, authority, or retainer of the plaintiff in that behalf, take upon himself to manage and conduct the defence to the said action, and that such proceedings were thereupon had in the said action, the same being continually and wrongfully defended by the now defendant, without the leave, licence, authority, consent, or retainer of the plaintiff, that afterwards, to wit, on &c., it was considered and adjudged by the said Court of Exchequer, that Adolphus Dyer should recover against the plaintiff a certain large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 83*l.* 9*s.*, and thereupon execution was afterwards, to wit, on &c., issued upon the said judgment against the plaintiff; and the plaintiff, in order to satisfy the said execution, was afterwards, to wit, on &c., forced and obliged to pay to the said Adolphus Dyer, in satisfaction of the said judgment, the money so recovered, and also another large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 9*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, being the costs and expenses of and occasioned by the said execution; and the plaintiff, by reason of the premises, was thereby then greatly injured in his credit and character, &c., and put to great loss, costs, and charges, &c., and is otherwise greatly injured, &c., to the plaintiff's damage, &c.

Plea—First, not guilty; second, that the defendant was retained and employed by the plaintiff. Issue thereon.

In Easter term,—

Montagu Smith obtained a rule nisi for arresting the judgment, on the ground that the declaration disclosed no cause of action, or shewed that the plaintiff had sustained any damage; and it was quite consistent with the declaration, that the now plaintiff derived great benefit from the proceedings taken by the defendant, though without authority; and that it did not appear what the first action was brought for, or any reason why the now plaintiff might not have protected himself by paying the demand.

Greenwood shewed cause.—The declaration is sufficient after verdict. A good cause of action is disclosed, if damage might have resulted from the defendant's undertaking the defence without authority; and it is not necessary by an allegation in the form of per quod, or otherwise, to pursue the exact chain of circumstances, to shew how the consequential injury was sustained—Pryce v. Belcher (1), Taylor v. Henniker (2). The only question is, whether the act of the defendant was a wrongful act. That cannot be disputed. It can never be contended, that one man may defend an action for another without authority, and justify himself on the ground, that on the whole it was the best thing that could be done—Clifton v. Hooper (3). If there is a wrongful act, and an allegation of damage, the Court cannot inquire into the amount given by the jury, who, at all events, might have given nominal damages. Suppose the jury had specially found the facts to have been (as they really were) that the defence was skilfully conducted, though unauthorized, and that the plaintiff's credit and character were injured.

[PATTESON, J.—How could his character be damaged by an appearance being entered for him? A judgment might have that effect; but it is not said that the judgment was recovered by reason of the defence. The plaintiff does not say that there was no defence to the action.]

He says that he should not have defended it.

[PATTESON, J.—That does not signify. The plaintiff in the action might have entered an appearance for him. The plaintiff in the present action might have stopped the action for anything that appears. The injury arises from the judgment, and not from the defence.]

The rule as to distinctly shewing that the damage resulted from the wrongful act, would be ground of special demurrer only. In Marzett v. Williams (4), which was an action against a banker, for non-payment of a cheque drawn by a customer having assets at the time, it was held that the plaintiff, who could not shew that he had sustained actual damage, was held entitled to nominal damages; and Taunton, J. observes, that "there are many instances where a wrong, by which the right of a party may be injured, is a good cause of action, although no actual damage is sustained."

[PATTESON, J.—That case has no sort of bearing on the present case. The action there was for a breach of duty; this is for an unauthorized interference, which is quite a different thing.]

The non-payment of a cheque might be a benefit to the customer. A refusal to transfer stock is a ground of action—Com. Dig. 'Action on the Case' (A); but that also might be a benefit to the party entitled to the transfer, as the funds might rise. Admitting that the declaration might be bad on special demurrer, it falls within the class of cases in which it has been held that a defective averment is cured by the verdict—Hitchins v. Stevens (5), Hall v. Marshall (6), May v. King (7), Anonymous (8), Roe v. Hersey (9), Gostwick v. Mason (10), Hedger v. Steavenson (11), Lewis v. Gompertz (12), Alston v. Buscough (13), Wicker v. Norris (14). In Spier v. Parker (15), which may be relied on for the defendant, the facts must be taken to have appeared by necessary implication. It cannot be contended that the verdict does not help—Stennel v. Hogg (16).

Montague Smith, in support of the rule, was not called upon.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The rule must be made absolute. All the authorities have been brought before us, but I adhere to the opinion I formed when the rule was applied for. It is evident that the declaration means to impute that the plaintiff was injured in his reputation by the appearance being entered for him in the former trial, but that does not appear to have been the necessary effect or result of such appearance being entered, and no reason is shewn.

PATTESON, J.—I really cannot understand the declaration as stating anything amounting to damage. It states the entry of an appearance by the defendant, and that afterwards there was judgment and execution against the now plaintiff, and goes on to say, that "by reason of the premises" (which must mean the execution, if anything) the plaintiff was injured in his character. There is a total failure of averment to shew any injury resulting from the act of the defendant.

Rule absolute (17).

Pleading—Trover—"Not possessed."

In trover, evidence that the goods were delivered to the defendant by the plaintiff's wife, with his authority, is available under "not possessed."

Trover for furniture.

Pleas—Not guilty, and Not possessed.

At the trial, before Patteson, J., at the Summer Assizes for Suffolk, 1847, it appeared that the conversion complained of was the removal of the furniture in question from the plaintiff's house by the defendant, who justified doing so, on the ground that the plaintiff's wife had delivered it to him in payment of a debt due to him from the plaintiff. Subsequently to the removal, but before the action, a written demand to restore the furniture was served on the defendant by the plaintiff, when the former refused to give it up unless his debt was paid. The learned Judge left it to the jury to say, whether the goods were converted by the defendant, saying, that this depended upon whether the plaintiff's wife had authority to deliver the goods, and the defendant took them by her leave; and if they should be of that opinion, the defendant was entitled to the verdict, which the jury accordingly gave. Leave was reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for 10*l.* 7*s.*, (the value of the furniture,) if the Court should be of opinion that this defence was inadmissible without a special plea of leave and licence, his Lordship expressing a strong opinion that there could not be a plea of leave and licence in trover. A rule nisi having been accordingly obtained,—

O'Malley shewed cause (May 13).—This defence was admissible without a plea of leave and licence. In Stancliffe v. Hardwick (1), and Vernon v. Shipton (2), it was held, that not guilty only denies a conversion in point of fact, and that any defence shewing that there was no wrongful conversion, must be specially pleaded. Some doubt was thrown on these decisions in Wilkinson v. Whalley (3) and Whitmore v. Greene (4). In Kynaston v. Crouch (5), the Court of Exchequer intimated that Stancliffe v. Hardwick was wrongly decided. In Higgins v. Thomas (6) and Mason v. Farnell (7), it was held, that the defence of joint tenancy must be pleaded; but in the latter case, the distinction between trover and detinue was adverted to. In trover, "conversion" necessarily implies a wrongful dealing with the goods; and cannot, therefore, be confessed and avoided—Warde v. Blunt (8), Bull. N.P. 48, a, and Bac. Abr. 'Trover,' were referred to. In defamation, "not guilty" puts in issue the malicious nature of the words, not merely the fact of uttering them.

Couch, in support of the rule.—This evidence was not admissible under "not guilty." Here was an actual, not a mere constructive, conversion, as the goods were taken away; and it is no less a taking away from the plaintiff if done by his leave.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—But does not the law mean by "conversion" a wrongful conversion?]

It means an act prima facie wrongful, and capable of sustaining an action of trover. Stancliffe v. Hardwick has never been expressly overruled. The dicta cited on the other side refer to constructive conversions.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—In trespass, you may admit the act done and justify it; but in trover, the conversion is the gist of the action; and if it be necessarily wrongful, it cannot be justified.]

If the principle applied to trover be correct, it must be equally applicable to other actions on the case—such as for obstructing rights of way or water, where "not guilty" puts in issue the obstruction only, and not the plaintiff's right—Frankum v. the Earl of Falmouth (9). There the declaration alleged the diversion of the water to be wrongful, but the wrongfulness was not put in issue by not guilty. Wilkinson v. Whalley, Higgins v. Thomas, and Mason v. Farnell, all turn on the plea of "not possessed." Walker v. Mellor (10) is in point. There, under "never indebted," the fact only of a sale and delivery, but not the plaintiff's title to the goods sold, was held to be in issue. If the dictum of Alderson, B., in Whitmore v. Green, that "not guilty" and "not possessed" together make up the old "not guilty," be correct, it will never be necessary for a sheriff to justify specially under a writ, as it is held he must do in Samuel v. Duke (11).

[PATTESON, J.—In Pickard v. Sears (12), this Court held, that under "not possessed" a sale of goods by leave of the plaintiff might be given in evidence; but there the goods were not in the plaintiff's possession.]

The argument on the other side would tend to the abolition of every special plea in trover, except such as go in discharge of a vested cause of action—for instance, release.

The judgment was subsequently (May 30) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This was an action of trover, to which the defendant pleaded, first, not guilty; secondly, that the plaintiff was not possessed. It appeared at the trial, that the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant, and that the wife of the plaintiff, in his absence, gave the furniture in question to the defendant, in payment of his debt, and that he then took it away. The jury believed that the wife had sufficient authority to do so, and found a verdict for the defendant, the plaintiff having leave to enter a verdict for 10*l.* 7*s.*, if the Court should be of opinion that the defence was not admissible under either of the pleas, but ought to have been specially pleaded, and a rule nisi was accordingly granted.

At the trial, the defence was treated principally as one of leave and licence, and so upon the argument, and the general question has been discussed, whether the word "converted" ex vi termini, means "wrongfully converted," so that any evidence which shews that what the defendant did was rightful, must be admissible under the plea of not guilty, as negating "conversion."

Upon consideration, however, we are of opinion, that where the wife with the authority of the plaintiff, (as must be taken to have been found by the jury,) gave the goods to the defendant, the property in them passed to him; and, therefore, his taking them, which was the conversion relied on, was a taking of his own goods, and not the goods of the plaintiff, and so the second issue was properly found for the defendant—Vernon v. Shipton and Pickard v. Sears. In that case, there was a demand and refusal, but as that is not an actual conversion, but only evidence of one, it seems to follow that any evidence explanatory of the demand and refusal must be receivable under the plea of not guilty, because it goes directly to shew that there is no conversion at all. In the present case, however, that point does not arise, because the original taking was an actual conversion, and no subsequent demand and refusal could constitute a second conversion.

This being a case not of mere leave and licence, but of transfer of the property previous to the taking by the defendant, the verdict was right, and the rule must be discharged.

10 & 11 Vict. c. lxxi.

Under the 49th section of the London Small Debts Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. lxxi.), the privilege of attorneys to be sued as defendants in their own court is abolished.

This was an action of assumpsit against the defendant, who was an attorney, in which the plaintiff had recovered the sum of 2*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* The cause was tried before the sheriff of Middlesex, pursuant to a writ of trial duly granted. The defendant subsequently obtained a rule nisi to compel the plaintiff to bring in the record, and for leave to enter a suggestion under the City of London Small Debts Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. lxxi.), to deprive the plaintiff of costs. The affidavits on which the rule was obtained stated the facts requisite to shew that the plaintiff and the defendant were living within the jurisdiction, and that a plaint might have been entered under the said act for the cause of action, in respect of which the verdict was obtained.

It appeared upon the affidavits in answer that the defendant was an attorney.

Bramwell now shewed cause.—The question is, whether the 49th section of this statute deprives attorneys when defendants of their privilege of being sued in the superior courts. That section is, "That no privilege except as hereinafter excepted, shall be allowed to any person to exempt him from the jurisdiction of the Court." It is in the same terms as the general County Court Act, but there are no exceptions afterwards specified. The privilege of an attorney of being sued in the superior court is the privilege of his supposed clients, not his own. It cannot be taken away either by charter or act of parliament, unless they are therein mentioned by express words—Welles v. Trahern, per Willes, C.J. (1), Jolliffe v. Langston (2).

[WIGHTMAN, J.—What were the words?]

It was on the question of the charter of the University of Oxford.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—They were affirmative words. In Lewis v. Hance (3) I understand the full Court decided this question.]

That was not the matter before them, but the privilege of attorneys as plaintiffs.

[He referred also to the cases under the various Courts of Requests Acts.] Further, the 113th section corresponding to the 129th section of the general County Court Act, which deprives the plaintiff of his right to costs, contemplates trials before a Judge who can certify, which a sheriff cannot—Jones v. Barnes (4).

Ball, contra.—"No privilege" must mean no privilege.

WIGHTMAN, J.—The plaintiff is not within the exception, as the Judge has not certified. The course to adopt is, when the writ of trial is obtained to make it a term that the Judge shall have power to certify. The words of the section are clear, and there is no privilege.

Error from the Queen's Bench.

The Court of Queen's Bench having given judgment, affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, in favour of the defendants, a writ of error was subsequently brought in this court upon that judgment. The pleadings are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below (1).

Aitherton (Feb. 1) argued the case for the plaintiff in error; and Cowling appeared for the defendants.

The arguments of counsel and the cases cited were the same as in the court below.

PARKE, B. now (May 2,) delivered the judgment of the Court (2).—This case comes before us on a writ of error from the Court of Queen's Bench, affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, in an action of replevin. The principal question argued before us was as to the sufficiency of the avowry after a verdict for the defendants, on a plea of non tenuit. The avowry alleged that the plaintiff, before and at the time when, &c., held the lands of which the locus in quo was parcel, as tenant to the avowants, under and by virtue of a certain demise thereof to the plaintiff theretofore made, upon and subject to certain rents, provisions, conditions and stipulations, that is to say, amongst other things, that the plaintiff should not nor would during the continuance of the said tenancy sell any hay produced during such continuance upon the said demised premises, under the penalty of 2s. 6d. for each yard of the said hay so sold as aforesaid, to be recovered by distress as for rent in arrear. There was a plea of non tenuit, and the verdict was for the defendants, and judgment thereon not pro retorno habendo, but under the stat. of 17 Car. 2. c. 7. On a writ of error, the Court of Queen's Bench affirmed the judgment. On the writ of error to this Court, it was argued that the judgment so affirmed was erroneous; that it could only be supported on the ground that the sum distrained for was a rent service, and that on this record it could not be taken to be such. And we are of that opinion.

(1) 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 424.

(2) Consisting of Parke, B., Alderson, B., Rolfe, B., Cresswell, J., Platt, B. and Williams, J.

We must assume that the legal effect of the terms under which the plaintiff held is set out; and, if so, the sum payable is a penal sum, by way of punishment for not spending the produce on the land, to be recovered indeed by distress, in the same way as a distress is made for rent in arrear, but not being itself rent. We have little doubt that if the whole instrument was before us, containing the terms of the holding, it would appear that the parties intended the sum to be paid, as additional or penal rent; but on the record we must assume that the legal effect is set out, and take it to be, as the defendant pleaded it, a penalty. If it is so taken, the defendant had certainly no right to avow in the general form given by the stat. 11 Geo. 2. c. 19, which applies to rents only. A penalty is not a rent, as a nomine pœnæ is not a rent within the stat. 32 Hen. 8. c. 37.—Co. Litt. 162, b. But after verdict upon the issue whether he held on the condition that he should pay a penalty, we should probably hold that it must be presumed that it was proved at the trial, either that he had granted by an instrument under seal this penalty to be levied by distress, or that, if the plaintiff held by a demise from the defendants themselves, he had given a license to enter and distrain his own goods for it.

Whatever was legally necessary to make the plaintiff hold at the time of the distress, under the penalty so claimed, must be presumed to have been proved. Thus the grant of an advowson or reversion, though not proved to be by deed, is good after a verdict on non concessit, for a deed must have been proved; and so a grant of a rent-charge, where it is not said to be by deed, is good after a similar issue—Lightfoot v. Brightman (3). We should, probably, hold, therefore, that the avowry was good after the verdict, if we could give the defendants judgment after verdict on this writ of error. But as the judgment has been given, not at common law, but under the 17 Car. 2. c. 7, which applies to distresses for rent only, it remains to consider what course is to be pursued. As the judgment is erroneous in its present shape, it is clear it must be reversed; but is the Court simply to reverse it, or to give judgment for the defendants for a retorno habendo at common law? The rule used to be, as laid down by the Court of King's Bench in the case of Parker v. Harris (4), "where judgment is given for the plaintiff, and the defendant brings error, there shall only be judgment to reverse the former judgment, for the suit is only to be eased and discharged of that judgment; but where the plaintiff brings error, the judgment shall not only be a removal, but the Court shall also give such judgment as the Court below should have given, for his writ of error is to revive the first cause of action, and to recover what he ought to have recovered by the first suit, wherein erroneous judgment was given." And the rule is given in similar terms by Lord Mansfield in Cuming v. Sibly (5). But in the case of Gildart v. Gladstone (6), the question was considered, and the Court held, that they were bound, ex officio, to give a perfect judgment on the whole record, and do all the justice to the plaintiff in error to which he was entitled; and where a verdict had been found, and the Court of Common Pleas had given judgment for the plaintiff, the Court of King's Bench, on a writ of error brought by the defendant, not only reversed the judgment for the plaintiff, but also gave judgment for the defendant for his costs. This case was considered as having established the reasonable rule, that the Court, which has a commission by the writ of error to view and examine the transcript and proceedings, and to cause to be further done thereupon what of right ought to be done, should do complete justice on the whole record to the plaintiff in error, and give the same judgment for him which the Court below ought to have given; and the distinction above adverted to was thought to be done away with—see 2 Saund. 101. cc. n. (i) to Jaques v. Cesar, sixth edition; the note of the learned annotator, and Tidd's Prac. 1179; but it happened in the subsequent case of The King v. Bourne (7) that the late Mr. Justice Littledale—a great authority—raised a doubt about the propriety of that decision, though he did not think it necessary to give any opinion upon it.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber, in the recent case of Gregory v. the Duke of Brunswick (8), gave a good deal of consideration to this question, which, however, they thought it unnecessary to decide. There the plaintiff below brought a writ of error, and objected that the judgment for the defendant below, who had succeeded on an issue on some pleas, and was entitled to judgment on the whole record, was erroneous, because the Court had omitted to give the plaintiff judgment for the costs of a demurrer to a plea which had been decided to be bad; and the Court held, that, as the plaintiff asked to have the judgment reversed, and justice done to himself, they ought to give him judgment on the demurrer and his costs, which might exceed the defendant's costs of the cause, but that they could not give that judgment without giving a complete judgment on every part of the record; and the result, therefore, was, that the plaintiff must have that judgment, and the defendant the general judgment. The rule, therefore, laid down by the Court in Gildart v. Gladstone was not re-established by the decision in Gregory v. the Duke of Brunswick, though it was by no means questioned; and it remains, therefore, to consider, whether it was right. We think it was right. The former cases adverted to in the argument in this case were chiefly reversals of judgment on demurrer prior to the 8 & 9 Will. 3. c. 11. s. 2, which gave the defendant his costs on demurrer; and, therefore, the simple reversal gave all the relief to which the defendant, the plaintiff in error, was entitled. The same reason applied to reversals of judgments for the plaintiff for defective declarations after judgment by default or verdict against the defendant; and though the same position is laid down in general terms in some cases since the 8 & 9 Will. 3. c. 11, it may be attributed to inadvertency in not sufficiently considering the reason of the rule.

It seems just and reasonable, that whether the plaintiff or the defendant brings a writ of error, each should have all the justice donè him by the court of error which the nature of the case admits, and that he should not only have a judgment of reversal, but such a judgment as the plaintiff in error ought to have had in the court below. This is the principle of the decision in the case of Gildart v. Gladstone, and we are of opinion that it was right, and is good law. But the question in this case is different; it is not whether the plaintiff in error is entitled to have, besides a judgment of reversal, a further judgment for his damages and costs, for he is clearly entitled to more than the former; but whether the defendant on this writ of error brought by the plaintiff is entitled, after the judgment is reversed, to such judgment as the Court below ought to have pronounced in his favour. This is a very different question. Though it is true, that if a party prays judgment, and then goes on to ask something which the Court cannot by law give, the Court will, nevertheless, give the party the proper judgment, as was held in the case of Street v. Hopkinson (9) and Le Bret v. Papillon (10), it does not follow that they can give a judgment against his prayer for the opposite party, and we do not find any satisfactory precedents of such a course. In The King v. Bourn, which is itself an authority to the contrary, Mr. Justice Patteson remarks on the absence of authorities to the effect that the Court could give the proper judgment for one party on a writ of error at the suit of another; and speaking of an anonymous case, in Salk. 401, which states, that if judgment be below for the plaintiff and error is brought, and that judgment is reversed, yet, if the record will warrant it, the Court ought to give a new judgment for the plaintiff, he observes that it does not appear who brought the writ of error. Nor does it in the note of the same anonymous case in 7 Mod. 3. Both of these are merely loose notes. In Roll. Abr. 774, (D 1), however, Slocomb's case (11), on the prayer of a plaintiff to reverse a judgment for the defendant in an action of slander, which was not maintainable, the declaration being insufficient, it appearing that the terms of the judgment were "ideo concessum est," instead of "consideratum," the Court did not merely reverse, but gave a judgment against the plaintiff quod nil capiat, &c. That, however, is a necessary consequence of the reversal in that case, for the Court could not give judgment for the plaintiff. In Rees v. Morgan (12), on a writ of error by the plaintiff, in replevin on an erroneous judgment on the 17 Car. 2. c. 7. s. 3, Buller, J. says, "Supposing this judgment shall be reversed on a writ of error, we shall award a judgment pro retorno habendo," and, therefore, adjudicates in favour of an application by the defendant in error to amend the record, by inserting such a judgment. Also, in answer to a question put by the House of Lords (4th of May 1793,) to the Judges in The King v. Amery (13), "Whether, if on a writ of error, the judgment of the Court below be reversed, the court of error must give the same judgment that the Court below ought to have given," the Judges answered in the affirmative. This, however, was a case in which the relator, the plaintiff below, brought a writ of error, and the Judges may have answered with a view to the particular case. On the other hand, there are many precedents of reversals of judgments, as is observed by the Lord Chief Baron, in the case of Gregory v. the Duke of Brunswick, where an in misericordiam is entered instead of a capiatur pro fine, and vice versa; which cannot be reconciled with the supposition that the Court might, on a writ of error by the defendant, have given against the defendant the proper judgment. These defects are cured by the stat. 16 & 17 Car. 2. s. 8, and it is not to be supposed that they were curable without the aid of the statute, by merely entering the proper judgment; and besides the consequence of such a course would be, that a plaintiff in error, who had a perfect right to sue out his writ of error, would pay the costs of it, and yet be defeated in his object. In effect, he would cause an amendment in the judgment at his own expense, instead of that of the opposite party. We think that a court of error cannot give a judgment against the party suing out a writ of error after reversing an erroneous judgment against him, though they may give one in his favour, whether he be plaintiff

M'DOWALL v. BOYD.

Pleading — Payment and Discharge — Immaterial Issue.

An averment that a bill of exchange was given "for and on account of and in payment and discharge" of a debt, is not equivalent to an averment that the bill was given in satisfaction of such debt; and therefore where a plea with such averment further stated that the bill so given was afterwards altered, and shewed that in consequence thereof it became ineffectual, and the plaintiff traversed the fact of alteration, upon which issue the defendant had a verdict, judgment non obstante veredicto was awarded to the plaintiff.

Debt by the drawer against the acceptor of a bill of exchange for 52*l.* 10*s.*, and upon an account stated.

Pleas, to the first count, that the bill was altered in a material point; and to the account stated, that the acceptance of the bill in the first count was the account stated therein mentioned, with an averment of the identity of the debt.

Replication, a traverse of the alteration, and a new assignment as to the account stated.

Rejoinder, joining issue as to the alteration; and pleas to the new assignment, first, never indebted, and, secondly, as to the said several causes of action by the plaintiffs above newly assigned as to the plea of the defendant by him lastly above pleaded, that after the accruing of the said debt of 52*l.* 10*s.* upon the said account stated above newly assigned, and the causes of action in respect thereof, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the 15th day of June A.D. 1847, the plaintiff made and drew his certain bill of exchange in writing, bearing date, to wit, the day and year last aforesaid, and thereby then required the defendant, four months after the date thereof, to pay to the order of the plaintiff a certain sum, to wit, the sum of 52*l.* 10*s.* for value received; and the defendant then accepted the last-mentioned bill, and then and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid delivered the same to the plaintiff, who then took and received the same of and from the defendant for and on account of and in payment and discharge of the said debt of 52*l.* 10*s.* so accrued upon the said account stated above newly assigned as aforesaid, and the said causes of action in respect thereof. The plea further stated that the last-mentioned bill of exchange, after the same had been fully drawn and dated as lastly above mentioned, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the said 15th day of June A.D. 1847 was accepted by the defendant in the words and in manner following, that is to say, by the defendant writing across the last-mentioned bill the words "Accepted, John Boyd;" that after the said drawing and accepting thereof, and after the same was completely issued and negotiated, to wit, by the defendant as such negotiator as aforesaid, and during the currency thereof, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the 20th day of June 1847, the plaintiff, without the consent of the defendant, altered and changed the last-mentioned bill in a material part, by adding to the defendant's said acceptance of the last-mentioned bill so made and drawn in manner and form as last aforesaid in writing on the said bill the additional words following, to wit, "Payable at the Joint Stock Bank, London," such last-mentioned words falsely purporting to be part and parcel of the acceptance of the last-mentioned bill, and that the said alteration was not made in correction of any mistake originally made in the framing of the last-mentioned bill, or to further the first intentions of the parties thereto, or any of them. Verification.

Replication to the pleas to the new assignment, joining issue upon the first, and to the second the plaintiff replied that he, the plaintiff, did not alter or change the said bill in that plea mentioned in manner and form, &c. Issue thereon.

At the trial a verdict was returned for the defendant, and a rule subsequently obtained by—

O'Malley for judgment non obstante veredicto, upon the pleas to the new assignment, or for a repleader.

J. Brown now shewed cause.—The validity of the plea turns upon the averment, that the bill alleged to be altered was delivered for and on account of, and in payment and discharge of the debt. If it amount only to an averment of the bill being delivered for and on account of, then the issue is immaterial.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—The plaintiff will say it is not an extinguishment or satisfaction of the debt.]

The word “extinguishment” is not used in pleadings; it is merely a legal consequence, and which it is submitted results from the above averment being true. Effect must be given to every part of the plea, and the words “in payment and discharge” are not a mere repetition of “for and on account of.” “Discharge” must mean extinguishment. In Maillard v. the Duke of Argyle (1), the Court seemed to think that payment was something more than “for and on account of.” In Emblin v. Dartnell (2), the plea averred the delivery of a bill in discharge, and the replication traversed the delivery in discharge and satisfaction, and was held bad as traversing that which was not alleged. That case is in some degree against the defendant, but there Parke, B. said “in discharge” meant “for and on account of,” and something more. It therefore deserves consideration as to what the real meaning of “discharge” is as stated in a plea like this. If it be equivalent to “satisfaction” then the giving of the bill would, under the circumstances, be a good answer to the action. He referred to Sibree v. Tripp (3).

O'Malley, in support of the rule, was not heard.

WIGHTMAN, J.—It was very properly conceded that if the averment amounted only to a delivery “for and on account of” the debt, the subsequent part of the plea would be immaterial, for it shewed that the bill so given had not been effectual, and the collateral security which would be a good answer while running, for it would operate as a suspension of the cause of action, would be no answer when it had failed. It is contended, therefore, that the words express not merely a suspension, but a satisfaction of the debt: that is, that the words “in payment and discharge” are equivalent to satisfaction. I cannot attribute this meaning to these words. I always distrust the use of supposed equivalents, and the effect of the two cases referred to is this: in Maillard v. the Duke of Argyle “payment” was considered not equivalent to “satisfaction”; and in Emblin v. Dartnell “discharge” was decided not to mean “satisfaction;” for if the terms of the plea in that case had been equivalent to satisfaction the replication would have been good. I agree with both cases; and whatever may be the exact meaning of “in payment and discharge,” their legal effect is not equivalent to satisfaction. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to judgment.

Contract—Parol Assignment—Delivery —Licence.

A. being on the eve of insolvency, made a bonâ fide verbal assignment of all his goods to the plaintiff, in trust, for the payment of his debts, and to hold the surplus for relations who had advanced money to him. An order was given by the plaintiff, with A's consent, for sending the goods to an auctioneer's for sale, from time to time, and several portions were accordingly parted with by A, and sold:—Held, that the successive deliveries were made under a mere licence to sell the goods from time to time, and that the property in the whole did not pass to the plaintiff.

Feigned issue, the question being whether certain goods seized in execution were or were not the property of the plaintiff. It appeared, at the trial, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the sittings after Michaelmas term 1846, that one Walker being in difficulties, and pressed by his creditors, proposed to assign all his property to the plaintiff in trust to pay the trade creditors in full, and to divide the surplus between his relations, who had also advanced money to him. A deed to carry out this arrangement was proposed; but under the advice of counsel, it was abandoned, as it would amount to an act of bankruptcy; and, accordingly, Walker was informed by the attorney acting for the plaintiff, that everything was to be made over to the plaintiff, on the same understanding, but by parol. To this Walker agreed, and sent to the plaintiff a list of his stock and debts; and Mayhew, the plaintiff's attorney, instructed him to send his goods, from time to time, to an auctioneer's, where they were sold under the directions of Mayhew, who received the proceeds of the successive sales; and, subsequently, Mayhew gave Walker directions to send more goods to the auctioneer's. The residue of the goods were seized by the defendant in execution, and being claimed by the plaintiff, the present issue was directed. A verdict was found for the plaintiff. In Hilary term, 1847, a rule nisi was obtained, pursuant to leave reserved at the trial, to enter a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that there had been no valid transfer of the goods to the plaintiff, against which—

Petersdorff shewed cause (1).—The verdict is right. It is unnecessary that there should be any delivery of the property by Walker to the plaintiff contemporaneously with the verbal contract, which being substituted for the contemplated deed, operates in the same way. The division of the property by Mayhew, under the direction of the plaintiff, and by Walker's consent, amounts to an act of ownership by the plaintiff. Again, the power of sale is unlimited, though it is only to be exercised from time to time. At common law a delivery is immaterial, if there be a contract shewing an intention on one side to part with, and on the other to accept the property. Shep. Touch. p. 224, White v. Wilks (2), and Tarling v. Baxter (3), were cited.

W. H. Watson and Lush, in support of the rule.—There was no transfer of the goods, but only a simple revocable licence to the plaintiff to take and sell the property from time to time, and no possession was taken of any of the goods besides those actually sold—Wallwyn v. Coutts (4).

[COLERIDGE, J.—If it was a mere licence to receive the goods, how could any property in them pass at all?]

The execution of the authority to sell perfected the gift quoad the part sold—Mogg v. Baker (5). No question was put to the jury whether a delivery of part was to operate as a delivery of the whole. Property can only be transferred in one of three ways—by contract, by deed, or by gift and delivery. A gift or grant, without delivery, is inoperative—2 Black. Com. 441, Irons v. Smallpiece (6). If there be no delivery it is a mere contract, and must be founded on a good consideration.

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This was a second trial of a feigned issue, whether stock in trade and goods which had belonged to one Walker were the plaintiff's property, under a gift from him as the plaintiff. On the eve of complete insolvency he, under the advice of counsel, made a verbal assignment of all his goods to the plaintiff, in trust for the payment in full of all his trade creditors, and of the surplus to some relations, who had advanced money to him. An order was given for sending them to an auction-room, from time to time, to be sold under the directions of their attorney; and much of the stock in trade was conveyed afterwards in parcels from his warehouse, where it remained, to the auctioneer's, who disposed of it by successive sales. Some portion remained, and was taken in execution. The property of the plaintiff in this surplus was in question. Fraud was imputed, but properly negated by the jury. But the question was, whether the whole stock in trade was, by this transaction, assigned to the plaintiff, as there was no deed, and, it was said, no delivery. One of these was allowed to be essential to the validity of the transfer; but we paused to consider whether there was not evidence of a delivery in the circumstances of the case. We think they did not amount to such evidence. The goods sent to be sold were not delivered in the name of all; and the successive deliveries of them were made under a licence to take and sell them, but did not convey the whole. The licence might have been revoked.

Debt on a mortgage deed.

Plea, that the cause of action did not accrue under the said indenture within twenty years.

Replication, that defendant, after the accruing of the said cause of action, and before the commencement of this action, to wit, on &c., by writing, signed by him the defendant, acknowledged the said debt in the declaration mentioned to remain unpaid and due to the plaintiff, and that the present action was commenced within twenty years next after such acknowledgment so made as aforesaid.

Special demurrer, on the ground that the writing mentioned in the replication ought to be set out.

H. S. Keating, in support of the demurrer.—This case depends on the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. ss. 3, 5; the latter of which requires that the written acknowledgment shall be specially replied. It is matter of law whether the writing does or does not amount to an acknowledgment; and, therefore, the terms of the writing ought to be set out on the record. Reliance will be placed by the other side on the cases decided under the Statute of Frauds, to the effect that when a writing is essential it need not be set out. But in Lowe v. Eldred (1) the Exchequer threw out a doubt whether such a course was not necessary. That case is, no doubt, opposed to Wakeman v. Sutton (2), where Lysaght v. Walker (3) is cited and relied upon. But that last case is very different from the present. Here there is no fortifying of the declaration by the replication, but a new and independent matter pointed only to defeat the plea is alleged in the replication.

[COLERIDGE, J.—In Lysaght v. Walker it would still be for the Court to say whether the contract contained in the writing is the same as that declared on according to its legal effect.]

The defendant ought to have an opportunity of admitting that the writing is his, but arguing its legal effect: by this replication he is bound to go to a jury. The case of debt on a bond conditioned to perform an award is analogous. There to a plea of nul tiel agard the plaintiff must reply, setting out the award—2 Wms. Saund. 62. c. 5.

[PATTERSON, J.—That is to enable the plaintiff to assign breaches. In cases under the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. the written acknowledgment or ratification is never set out.]

Fortescue, contra, was not called upon by the Court to argue.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The mode of pleading in cases arising under the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. rules the present. If the mere question to be raised were, whether the writing amounted in law to an acknowledgment, it would be right to set it out in the pleadings; but the question is a mixed one, consisting partly of the fact that the defendant did intend to acknowledge the existence of the deed. This is for the jury, and therefore may be raised by asserting the acknowledgment generally.

PATTERSON, J.—It is always a mixed question of law and of fact, whether the defendant gave a written acknowledgment of a previous debt or deed. In such cases many questions of fact properly triable by a jury may arise, as, for instance, the question of agency, when the acknowledgment is given by an agent. Therefore this replication is correct in form.

COLERIDGE, J.—I think the general replication is good, for two reasons: first, whenever a party relies on the fact of a writing being made, he may always state its legal effect, together with the surrounding circumstances, leaving the Court to put a legal construction on the document when produced in proof of the pleading; and, secondly, it may often happen, in such cases as this, that a plaintiff relies on more than one acknowledgment in different terms, which he could not do if he were obliged to set out one only in hæc verba on the record, whereas if he is allowed to reply generally, he will be able to avail himself of all.

—Statute—Negating Exceptions.

To a declaration for work and labour the defendant pleaded that the work, &c. consisted of an appraisement of personal property, which the plaintiff appraised in expectation of reward to be therefore paid by the defendant to him, without being duly licensed according to 46 Geo. 3. c. 43:—Held, that the plea was sufficient, without stating that the plaintiff did the work as an appraiser, as it followed the words of the statute.

Held, also, that the plea need not negative that the appraisement was for the purpose of ascertaining legacy duty.

There is no difference, in respect of declarations and subsequent pleadings, as to negating exceptions in acts of parliament.

Assumpsit for work and labour, and on an account stated.

Second plea, that the said work, &c. were and consisted entirely of an appraisement of certain personal property, which personal property the plaintiff theretofore, to wit, on the day and year in the first count mentioned by the said appraisement appraised; that plaintiff, after the passing of an act, &c. (4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 60.) (1), and between the 5th of July 1845 and the 6th of July 1846, to wit, on &c., in Great Britain, appraised the said personal property in expectation of reward, to wit, the money in the first count mentioned, to be therefore paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, without being then licensed in that behalf so to do by a licence, stating the true name and place of abode of the plaintiff, and granted by any two or more of the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, or by any person duly authorized by such Commissioners, or any three or more of them, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided; and that the said account, in the last count mentioned, was so stated as there mentioned of and concerning the said sum of money in the first count mentioned, and of no other money whatever.

Demurrer, on the ground that the plea

(1) By which the Boards of Stamps and Taxes were consolidated.

does not allege that the plaintiff, at the time of doing the said work, &c. or at any other time was, or used or exercised the calling or occupation of, an appraiser, or that the plaintiff appraised the said property as such appraiser; and that it does not allege that the plaintiff was an appraiser, or that the appraisement was not an appraisement or valuation of any property made for the purpose of ascertaining the legacy duty payable in respect thereof.

Tomlinson, in support of the demurrer (July 1).—This plea is framed under the 46 Geo. 3. c. 43. ss. 5. and 6, and does not shew that the plaintiff was a person requiring to be licensed under section 5. of that act; it only states evidence of his being an appraiser, not that he was in fact an appraiser.

[ERLE, J.—The ultimate fact stated in the plea is, that he appraised.]

The statute makes the fact of appraising prima facie evidence that the party is an appraiser, but it is not conclusive of that fact—Atkinson v. Fell (2), where Lord Ellenborough, C.J. anticipates this very point. It is essential to see quo animo the act of appraisement is done in order to determine whether the party is within the statute.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J. referred to Forster v. Taylor (3) and Cope v. Rowlands (4).]

[COLERIDGE, J.—Section 6. uses the words “no person,” which is wider than no appraiser, and seems pointed at those not regularly appraisers who act as such.]

[ERLE, J.—Why cannot the plaintiff traverse that he appraised?]

The proper traverse would be, that he did not appraise as such appraiser, so as to exclude a valuation for the private information of the parties—Jackson v. Stopherd (5). Secondly, the plea does not negative that the plaintiff appraised the property for the purpose of ascertaining the legacy duty, which is exempted from duty by 55 Geo. 3. c. 184. Sched. ‘Appraisement.’ This plea goes to defeat the action, and therefore ought to negative the exception. It would be different in a declaration—per Lord Abinger in Thibault v. Gibson (6), Turquand v. Mosedon (7).

[COLERIDGE, J.—The exception applies only to the stamp on appraisements, not to the appraiser’s licence.]

J. Karlake, contra.—The plea states enough to be a defence, as it shews that the plaintiff appraised personal property in expectation of reward; and by section 4. of 46 Geo. 3. c. 43. any person so doing is to be “deemed and taken to be an appraiser within the provisions of this act to all intents and purposes.” If the plaintiff denies that he appraised within the meaning of the act, he should traverse the averment in the plea. Atkinson v. Fell and Jackson v. Stopherd were both cases where the point arose on the evidence under the general issue. Here the plea is framed in strict accordance with the words of the statute. Secondly, the exception need not be negatived. The suggested distinction between a declaration and a subsequent pleading cannot be sustained. The exemption in the case of legacy duty is contained in a subsequent statute, and therefore the plaintiff should reply it if he relies on it; besides, it relates only to the stamp, not to the licences—Washbourn v. Burrows (8), Lee v. Simpson (9).

Tomlinson, in reply.

The judgment of the Court (10) was subsequently (July 12) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—To a declaration for work and labour, the defendant pleaded that the work done was and consisted entirely of an appraisement of certain personal property, which the plaintiff appraised without a licence, contrary to the act 46 Geo. 3. c. 43. (5) 2 Cr. & M. 361; s.c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 95.

We think it was properly answered, that the plea was sufficient, as it followed the words of the statute, and that the doctrine of the case cited does not require the defendant to state that the plaintiff appraised as an appraiser; though upon a replication traversing the fact of appraisal, the plaintiff might have been entitled under the authority of that case to a verdict, if his appraising was not in the exercise of that calling. There was also a special demurrer, because the plea did not negative certain exceptions introduced in the statute. Generally, it certainly is not necessary to negative exceptions not contained in the sentence which imposes the penalty, and the negative of which therefore forms no part of the description of the offence. But that rule was said to apply to declarations only, not to subsequent pleadings. This observation, made by counsel arguendo in Thibault v. Gibson, was adopted by Lord Abinger to distinguish that case from Turquand v. Mosedon; where, however, the rule was not mentioned, and in which case the exception was contained in the same section, which was relied on. In Thibault v. Gibson it is said by counsel, that a plea requires more strictness than a declaration; and 1 Wms. Saund. 276, is cited, by mistake for 277, b, for the proposition that greater strictness is required in a plea than in a declaration. The proposition, though true in some cases, is not applicable here. The exception of an auctioneer is in a subsequent section of 46 Geo. 3. c. 43, and that with respect to legacy duty, in a subsequent act of parliament; and the rule in this respect applies as well to pleas as to declarations.

 July 12. } PRIAR v. GREY AND OTHERS.

Covenant — Pleading — Condition Precedent.

A lease contained a proviso that on notice being given by the lessee eighteen months before the end of the eighth year, and all arrears of rent being paid, and all covenants and agreements on the part of the lessee having been observed and performed, the lease should determine at the end of the eighth year;

"nevertheless, without prejudice to any claim or remedy which any of the parties hereto may then be entitled to for breach of any of the covenants or agreements hereinbefore contained":—Held, that the performance of all the covenants by the lessee was a condition precedent to his right to determine the lease, notwithstanding the concluding clause.

To an action by the lessor on the lease where the declaration alleged specific breaches of covenant, the lessee pleaded that he gave eighteen months' notice to determine the lease at the end of the eighth year, and that at the expiration of that year all arrears of rent had been paid, and all and singular the covenants and agreements on the part of the lessee had been observed and performed, and thereupon the lease determined. The plaintiff replied, setting out a specific breach of covenant which had been assigned in the declaration, absque hoc that all and singular the covenants and agreements on the part of the lessee had been observed and performed by him at the end of the eighth year, concluding to the country:—Held, that the plaintiff was at liberty to put the defendant on proof of his averment in the general terms in which it was made, and that the replication concluded properly to the country.

Covenant by assignee of lessor against lessees under an indenture of lease. The declaration assigned several breaches of covenant by the defendant. The plea set out the indenture upon oyer, the only material part of which was as follows:—"Provided also, that if the said lessees, their executors or administrators shall be desirous to quit the said premises hereby demised at the end of the first eight years of the said term, or at the end of the first or any subsequent three years after the expiration of the said eight years, and of such their desire shall give to the said J. F. (the lessor), his heirs or assigns, notice in writing eighteen calendar months before the expiration of such eighth year, and thereafter, before the expiration of any such three years (as the case may be), then and in such case, all arrears of rent being paid, and all and singular the covenants and agreements on the part of the said lessees having been duly observed and performed, this lease, and every clause and thing herein contained, shall, at the expiration of the first eighth year, and thenceforward at the expiration of any such third year (whichever in the said notice shall be expressed) cease, determine, and be utterly void to all intents and purposes, in like manner as if the whole of the said term of forty-two years had then run out and expired. But nevertheless, without prejudice to any clause or remedy which any of the parties hereto, or their respective representatives, may then be entitled to, for breach of any of the covenants or agreements hereinbefore contained." The plea then averred that the breaches of covenant in the declaration mentioned respectively happened after the expiration of the first eight years of the term, and after the lease and every clause and thing therein contained had ceased, determined, and become void, as thereafter mentioned. That after the making of the lease, and eighteen calendar months before the expiration of the first eight years of the term, the defendants being desirous to quit the demised premises at the end of the first eight years of the term, gave notice in writing to the plaintiff of such their desire, and thereby gave the plaintiff notice that they would quit and deliver up possession of the said demised premises on the 12th of May, A.D. 1846, being the end of the first eight years of the said term; that, at the expiration of those eight years all arrears of the said rents so reserved and made payable by the said indenture had been and were paid, and all and singular the covenants and agreements on the part of the defendants had been and were duly observed and performed by the defendants; and thereupon, at the expiration of the said first eighth year of the said term, and which happened before the commencement of this suit, the said lease, and every clause and thing therein contained, ceased, determined, and were utterly void, to all intents and purposes, in like manner as if the whole of the said term of forty-two years had then run out and expired, according to the said indenture and the said proviso in that behalf so contained as aforesaid. Verification.

Replication, that after the making of the said indenture, and during the said term thereby granted, and before the expiration of the first eight years of the said term, to wit, on &c., and on divers other days and times afterwards, and before the expiration of the first eight years of the said term, the defendants wilfully neglected and omitted to draw and pump out of the said colliery and coal mines divers large quantities of water, &c. [reassigning a breach of covenant which had been assigned in the declaration], contrary to the said indenture and the defendants' covenant in that behalf so made as aforesaid; and at the said expiration of the said first eight years of the said term that breach of covenant was still subsisting and continuing; without this, that all and singular the covenants and agreements on the part of the defendants had been and were duly observed and performed by the defendants, at the expiration of the said first eight years of the said term: concluding to the country.

Special demurrer, on the ground that the covenants and agreements on the part of the defendants, in the plea mentioned, are independent of the proviso in the indenture; and of the right and power thereby given to determine the indenture and term by such notice to quit, as in the plea mentioned, and that such covenants and agreements do not in anywise qualify or constitute a condition precedent to the said proviso or stipulation, or to the exercise of the provisions thereof; that the traverse raises an immaterial issue; that the replication is too general and indefinite; that the plaintiff should have stated as a substantial part of the replication, and not by way of inducement only, that some one, and which, of the covenants and agreements on the part of the defendants was broken at the expiration of the first eight years of the term, and should have concluded with a verification, in order that the defendants might have denied or confessed and avoided such breach of covenant; that the general allegation of performance in the plea is not traversable, but the replication ought to have assigned some particular breach of covenant; that the only breach assigned in the replication is assigned in the inducement, so as to make the assignment of it immaterial. Joinder in demurrer.

The case was argued (1) by—

Corrie, for the defendants.—First, this issue is bad as being multifarious, as it is not allowed by the rules of pleading to raise a general issue whether several distinct covenants have been performed.

[COLERIDGE, J.—Would it not be allowable to state that each covenant aeriatim had not been kept?]

No. Steph. Plead. p. 387, rule 7. (4th edit.)

[ERLE, J.—How do you say the plaintiff should reply?]

By setting out the particular breach relied on, and concluding with a verification. The only instance of such a general mode of replying is to a plea of plene administravit, where the plaintiff relies on bad debts. In 2 Wms. Sessd. 410, (4), the rule is laid down. Here, if the plaintiff, in his declaration, assigned as a breach, that the defendants broke all the covenants, that would be bad as tending to a multifarious issue. Secondly, admitting that the replication is good in form, it is no answer to the plea. It never was the intention of the parties under this lease to take away the lessees' power of putting an end to the term on a breach by them of some minute covenant in the lease. Dawson v. Dyer (2) is in point. There a covenant by the lessor that the lessee paying the rent and performing the covenants shall quietly enjoy, was held not to be a conditional covenant; and a plea setting up a breach of covenant or non-payment of rent was no bar to an action by the lessee on the covenant for quiet enjoyment. Besides, the subsequent proviso that either party is still to have his remedy for breach of any covenant is insensible, if the performance of the covenants be a condition precedent to the exercise of the right given to the lessee.

Manisty, contra.—The performance of the covenants by the lessees is a condition precedent to the lessees' power of determining the lease. The words, "the covenants having been performed," are sufficient to give such a construction, and the subsequent proviso does not alter it. It is argued, that they can have no meaning if such a view be taken, but several cases may be put to which they would apply. Suppose, for instance, the lessee after breach of covenant gives notice to quit, and the lessor, though not bound to do so, chooses to accept the notice, the proviso will preserve his right of suing for the breach of covenant. Again, though the lessee may have performed all his covenants, the lessor may not have done so, and the former may have his action, though he has determined the lease. Porter v. Shephard (3) is very like this case. The broad principle applicable to such cases is to see what the parties meant. Secondly, the replication is only as general as the plea which it follows; the plaintiff in fact takes, and does not offer an issue. It is performance of all covenants that gives the defendant a right to determine the lease, and therefore the plaintiff has a right to traverse performance of all, in which case a general mode of pleading is allowed. But it is said, if the plaintiff had assigned a specific breach, and concluded to the Court, the defendants might have rejoined a waiver of that breach, but such a rejoinder would be a departure from the plea, which is one of performance, not waiver. The onus is on the defendants to prove performance of all his covenants. The cases of bonds referred to are exceptions to the general rule.

Corrie, in reply.

Judgment was now delivered by—

PATTESON, J.—The principal question in this case arose on the proviso in the lease giving power to the lessees to determine it by notice eighteen calendar months before the end of the eighth year. That proviso contains the words "then and in such case all arrears of rent being paid, and all and singular the covenants and agreements on the part of the said lessees having been duly observed and performed, this lease and every clause and thing therein contained shall, at the expiration of the first eighth year, and thereafter, at the expiration of any such third year (whichever in the said notice shall be expressed) cease, determine, and be utterly void, to all intents and purposes, in like manner as if the whole of the said term of forty-two years had then run out and expired. But, nevertheless, without prejudice to any claim or remedy, which any of the parties hereto, or their respective representatives, may then be entitled to for breach of any of the covenants or agreements hereinbefore contained." The declaration states a notice by the lessees to determine the lease at the end of the eighth year, and avers that at the expiration of those eight years all arrears of rent had been and were paid, and all and singular the covenants and agreements on the part of the lessees had been and were duly observed and performed by them, and thereupon the lease determined. The replication states a specific breach of covenant before the expiration of the eight years (which breach had been already stated in the declaration); without this, that all and singular the covenants and agreements on the part of the lessees had been and were duly observed and performed by them at the expiration of the said first eight years of the said term, and concludes to the country. The case of Porter v. Shephard is directly in point to shew that the performance of all the covenants by the lessees is a condition precedent to the determination of the lease. In that case, however, no such words as these "but nevertheless without prejudice," &c. were introduced into the proviso. We are of opinion that their introduction into the present proviso makes no difference in the construction of it. They appear to be introduced for greater caution, as regards the right of the lessor to sue for breaches of covenant which might be unknown to him at the expiration of the eight years, or possibly to meet the case of the lessor acquiescing in the notice given by the lessees, although strictly the condition precedent might not be performed. Besides which, they are applicable to any parties, and preserve the right of the lessees for any breach of covenant committed by the lessor. They are evidently introduced not to qualify, or do away with the condition precedent contained in the previous part of the proviso, but for a wholly collateral purpose. We are, therefore, of opinion that the averment of performance in the plea is a material one, which the plaintiff was entitled to traverse. It is, however, objected that he ought to have concluded his replication to the Court, after averring a specific breach of covenant, and not to have traversed the performance in the general terms which he has adopted. The traverse appears to have been in the same form in Porter v. Shephard, and not to have been objected to on that ground; neither do we think that it could have been objected to with success. This is not like the case of a bond declared on generally for the penalty, with a plea setting out a condition and averring general performance, in which, or any similar case, no doubt, the plaintiff must in his replication shew a specific breach, and conclude to the Court, giving the defendant an opportunity to plead to that breach. Here the declaration alleges specific breaches of covenant, and the defendants seek by their plea to avail themselves of a proviso containing a condition precedent, the performance of which they aver in general terms, and must prove in order to entitle themselves to the benefit of that proviso. The plaintiff, therefore, is at liberty to put them upon proof of that averment, by denying it in the same form in which it is couched. Our judgment must, therefore, be for the plaintiff.

The liability of a consignee or indorsee of a bill of lading to pay freight is a new contract, the consideration for which is the delivery of the goods to him at his request.

A declaration in an inferior court containing the common indebitatus count for freight, and which alleges the delivery of the goods, at the request of the defendant, to have been within the jurisdiction of such court, sufficiently shows that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction; as the words "at the request of the defendant" are to be taken to apply to the delivery of the goods only, and not to the carriage of them, which may have been out of the jurisdiction.

Error from the Court of Record, Kingston-upon-Hull.

The declaration in the court below contained (amongst others) the common indebitatus count for freight for the carriage of goods from Marseilles to Hull, and stating the delivery of the goods at the request of the defendant to have occurred within the inferior jurisdiction.

The plaintiffs below had a general verdict, and on this error was brought in this court.

Hugh Hill, in support of the writ of error (June 26).—The question arises on the validity of the first count in the declaration in the court below. It appears by this count, that the consideration for the promise, or at least part of it, is for the carriage of goods from Marseilles to Hull. Now, to give jurisdiction to the Court below, it being an inferior court, it was necessary that the consideration for the promise should be shewn to have arisen within the jurisdiction—Peacock v. Bell (1), Stannian v. Davis (2), Ramsy v. Atkinson (3). The shipper is the person liable for the carriage—Domett v. Beckford (4). By the indorsement of the bill of lading, the property in the goods only is transferred, but not the contract between the shipowner and the shipper—Sargent v. Morris (5), Thompson v. Domingy (6). If this be so, can anybody sue for the carriage of the goods but the shipper? The shipowner may indeed sue the consignee for a sum equal to the carriage; but that liability of the consignee arises from his having deprived the shipowner of his lien, and arises on a new contract, which is not a contract for freight. The proper form of count was considered in Amos v. Temperley (7), and in the judgment of Sanders v. Vanzeller in error (8), where it is said, that special assumpsit is the proper form for the delivery of the goods. "Freight" means something due for the carriage of goods, and is not applicable when the consideration is only abandoning a lien on goods actually carried.

Cleasby, contra.—Whichever way the liability arises the Court below had jurisdiction. The count does not say "goods carried for the defendant," but "that he was indebted for freight for the carriage of goods."

[PATTERSON, J.—It does not say for the delivery of goods heretofore carried.]

If a cause of action for freight can arise within the jurisdiction, then the jurisdiction is sufficiently shewn.

[PATTERSON, J.—Do the words "at his request" override the whole count? if so, the carriage of the goods is included in the consideration, and that was out of the jurisdiction.]

The whole cause of action arises from the delivery. The debt is indivisible, and no freight is earned until the goods are completely carried. Emery v. Bartlett (9) is in favour of the defendant in error.

[PATTERSON, J.—There the whole consideration for the promise is the account stated.]

If the allegation of the carriage of the goods be struck out, the count will be a good count. A long course of practice is not to be set aside because a difficulty has been suggested.

Hugh Hill, in reply.—After verdict it is impossible to say what part of the consideration stated occasioned the verdict. It may have been for the carriage of the goods only. The earning the freight is the gist of the action, and that arises from the carrying the goods.

[PATTESON, J.—We must look at the case of Sanders v. Vanzeller again before giving our judgment.]

The judgment of the Court (10) was now (June 27) delivered by—

PATTESON, J.—Upon reading the case of Sanders v. Vanzeller, in the 4th Queen's Bench Reports, and particularly with reference to the concluding paragraph in the judgment of my Lord Chief Justice Tindal, in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, p. 297, and upon considering the other cases upon this subject, we are of opinion, that the liability of a consignee or indorsee of a bill of lading to pay freight is a new contract, the consideration for which is the delivery of the goods to him at his request; that the words in the declaration, "at the request of the said defendant," are to be applied to the delivery only, and then it sufficiently appears by this declaration that the delivery only was the consideration for the promise of the defendant. That delivery at the request of the defendant is stated to have been within the jurisdiction of the Court below, and we are, therefore, of opinion, that the cause of action and the consideration are well alleged to have been within the jurisdiction of that Court, and that the defendants in error are entitled to our judgment. The judgment of the Court below will therefore be affirmed.

June 27. } HOARE v. SILVERLOCKE.

Libel—Innuendo, when necessary—Arrest of Judgment.

Allegorical terms of a defamatory character of well-known import, such as imputing to a person the qualities of the "frozen snake" in the fable, are libellous, per se, without innuendoes to explain their meaning.

To write to the members of a charitable institution calling on them "to reject the unworthy claims of Miss H," and stating that "she squandered away the money which she did obtain from the benevolent in printing circulars abusive of Commander D," the secretary of the institution, is libellous.

This was an action for libel. The following are parts of the third and fourth counts in the declaration:—Third count, and also for that the defendant, further contriving to injure the plaintiff, afterwards (to wit) on &c. in a public newspaper, called the Nautical Standard and Steam Navigation Gazette, falsely and maliciously composed and published, and caused and procured to be published of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning her said application to the society, another false, scandalous, malicious, defamatory libel, containing, amongst other things, the false, scandalous, malicious, defamatory and libellous matter following, of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning her said application to the said society (that is to say), the Royal Naval Benevolent Society:—"We were sorry to perceive, by a report of last Monday's proceedings, at a meeting of the above society, that the case of Miss Hoare (meaning the plaintiff), which we imagined had been entirely dismissed by the unanimous decision of a large body of officers of high rank and distinguished position in the service, at the last quarterly court, had been re-opened, and that, too, by an officer distinguished no less for his illustrious services against the enemy than his noble descent: the gallant Rear Admiral the Earl of Cadogan has happily been a stranger to those scenes which have occurred at the former meetings of this society, when the case of the above misguided woman (meaning the plaintiff) has been brought forward; but if he has escaped the exhibition of such conduct on the part of one or two officers who would, by the display, be certainly very much lowered in his estimation, his lordship has, unfortunately, also missed the hearing of an overwhelming mass of evidence which is a complete justification for the society's decision with respect to the claims of Miss Hoare (meaning the plaintiff), to say nothing of the recantation of some who were her warmest friends, and who, in giving up their advocacy of her claims, stated that they had realized the fable of the 'frozen snake.' We have no doubt that his lordship's genuine feelings of philanthropy have been enlisted in inducing him to take the course he pursued on Monday. The manner in which his Lordship acquitted himself was highly honourable to him, and demanded, as it obtained, the respect of the Court, inasmuch as his lordship did not make the case of Miss Hoare (meaning the plaintiff) the excuse for a display of bitter vindictive feeling towards the secretary; but let the noble earl go to the society's offices and examine carefully the documents, and make himself acquainted with the whole of the proceedings of the secretary and the society in this matter, and he must come to the conclusion that the case of Miss Hoare (meaning the plaintiff) is a most forlorn hope, and that, unfortunately, many much more worthy objects of the society's benevolence are excluded from participation in it by the limited state of its funds."

Fourth count—And also for that the defendant, further contriving to injure the plaintiff, afterwards, &c. falsely and maliciously composed and published of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning her said application to the said society, a certain other false, scandalous, malicious libel, containing, amongst other things, the false and libellous matter following:—"For one, I am determined to withdraw my subscription should any of our funds be granted to Miss Hoare (meaning the plaintiff); but I hope and trust the good sense of the members at our next meeting will as heretofore prevail, and reject for ever the unworthy claims of Miss Hoare" (meaning the plaintiff). And in another part of the same libel there was the libellous matter following:—

"Who is this woman (meaning the plaintiff), that she (meaning the plaintiff) is to engross almost the whole of the time of the society? She (meaning the plaintiff) is not entitled, as the descendant of a subscriber or in her own right, to relief; and it is avowed by her (meaning the plaintiff's) friends that she (meaning the plaintiff) squandered away the money which she (meaning the plaintiff) did obtain from the benevolent in printing circulars abusive of Commander Dickson. Really it is time that all this twaddle about humanity, and this display of knight errantry in defence of a slandered and forlorn damsel (meaning the plaintiff) should be laid aside."

At the trial, before Lord Denman, the plaintiff had a general verdict on the third, fourth, and fifth counts of the declaration.

Talfourd, Serj. having moved for and obtained a rule to shew cause why the judgment should not be arrested, or a venire de novo awarded,—

Miss Hoare, the plaintiff, in person, now shewed cause.—No innuendo was necessary to shew that the imputation in the third count is libellous; the meaning of the allusion to "the frozen snake" is evident to all, and requires no explanation. There is no ambiguity, and therefore no innuendo is necessary. The following cases were cited:—Digby v. Thompson (1), O'Brien v. Clement (2), J'Anson v. Stuart (3). As to the case of Forbes v. King (4), relied on when this rule was moved, there is nothing defamatory to another to say he is "Man Friday;" that is not a charge of crime. Any writing is libellous that tends to shew that the party libelled is unfit for the society in which he is placed: as to say of a protestant archbishop that he attempts to convert catholic priests by offers of money—Tuam (Archbishop) v. Robeson (5). What, then, would make a person more unfit for society than making those acquainted with her realize the fable of "the frozen snake"? The declaration can be supported after verdict, if the words can be made to bear a defamatory meaning—Gardiner v. Williams (6). The fourth count is good. Merely to say that the plaintiff squandered away the money which she obtained from the benevolent in printing circulars abusive of Commander Dickson, and calling on the members to reject the unworthy claims of the plaintiff, are such injurious expressions as to be libellous. Then as to the fifth count.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The fifth count is clearly libellous.]

[PATTESON, J.—I believe the Court of Exchequer has held that if one or more of several counts on which general damages have been assessed be bad, the judgment should not be arrested, but a venire de novo awarded to assess the damages on the good counts.]

Corrie, contra, in support of the rule.—The third count is not libellous. The allusion to the fable of "the frozen snake" at most amounts to a charge of want of gratitude.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Surely something more—stinging those who had served them; but that want of gratitude is a crime is not without authority.]

The real objection, however, to the count is, that the Court cannot take notice of the meaning of the allusion to "the frozen snake"; it is not apparent by merely stating it; it required an innuendo to point its meaning, as in the case of Forbes v. King, before referred to.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—To say that another was a "Man Friday" imputed no crime; to be a black man may be a great misfortune, but no crime.]

If the Court takes notice of the meaning of this fable, why not of all others? Suppose one in the Chinese language, could the Court take notice of that? where is the line to be drawn? Suppose a fable well known in Germany; known perhaps to some members of the Court and not to others. If it depend on the fact that the fable is universally known, what should be the proof that there is a universal knowledge of it? An innuendo was therefore necessary. As to the fourth count: the charge is that the plaintiff squandered away her own money, which she had a perfect right to do. In Robinson v. Jermyn (7) the words were, "the plaintiff, not being a person that the proprietors and annual subscribers think it proper to associate with, is excluded this room;" and the Court held that this was not a libel. Surely those words are as strong as those charged as libellous in the fourth count. The defendant, however, relies principally on the objection to the third count, as that raises a general question.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—There is no ground for arresting this judgment. Before we can make this rule absolute, we must be prepared to say that the jury are wrong in finding these words to be libellous, for we need not take judicial knowledge that these words would be libellous on demurrer. The jury say they understand the allusion to "the frozen snake" as all the world understands it: can we say it is not so? It would be trifling with language to say that we do not clearly see what is the meaning of the allusion. The cases referred to do not come up to this case. The last case cited, Robinson v. Jermyn, is merely this, that the parties will not keep company with one another. As to the case in which it was attempted to make it libellous to allude to the plaintiff as a "Man Friday," that imputed no crime at all. The "Man Friday," we all know, was a very respectable man, although a black man, and black men have not been denounced as criminals yet. This reference to the plaintiff as "the frozen snake" tends to degrade her in the eyes of the world, and is, therefore, libellous. As to the fourth count, no persons can be charged with circulating abusive circulars but that their characters must suffer.

PATTESON, J.—This is a written statement respecting the application of the plaintiff to the Royal Naval Benevolent Society, and the words in the third count are that there was "an overwhelming mass of evidence which is a complete justification for the society's decision with respect to the claims of Miss Hoare, to say nothing of the recantation of some who were her warmest friends, and who, in giving up their advocacy of her claims, stated that they had realized the fable of "the frozen snake." Can we say that these words, on the face of them, appear not to be libellous? If we see they are not libellous, then we cannot discharge this rule, but being after verdict, if they are capable of a libellous meaning, then the finding of the jury can be supported. The objection is that they require an innuendo; but, taking the context, it appears to me that it may be seen the words are defamatory, and no innuendo is necessary. As to the fourth count, the words are, "I trust the good sense of the members, at our next meeting, will as heretofore prevail, and reject for ever the unworthy claims of Miss Hoare:" and in another part it is said "she squandered away the money which she did obtain from the benevolent in printing circulars abusive of Commander Dickson." It appears by these words manifest that misconduct is thereby imputed; and in my opinion the counts are good.

COLERIDGE, J.—The matter charged as libellous in the third count is this.—[His Lordship read that libel]. It is said that without an innuendo we cannot understand that these words are libellous. If we cannot so understand them then we are different from all the rest of mankind. Supposing that it was said of a person that he was a Judas, would that want an innuendo to explain its meaning? We ought to attribute to the jury and Court the knowledge of such terms, whether they be allegorical, historical, or fabulous. If such terms, whether historical, fabulous, or allegorical, have passed so much into common use as to have obtained a fixed meaning to persons of ordinary knowledge, then we should take notice that such is their meaning. Our language is, in a great measure, made up of allegorical terms. It is a common expression to say of a person that he has a vinegar face or a sour temper; but surely such well-known terms require no explanation. I am of opinion that this rule must, therefore, be discharged.

ERLE, J.—I see no ground to arrest the judgment. The jury say these words are libellous. We are to say whether they are wrong: unless we can say they are wrong, we must discharge the rule. Likening persons to certain animals may bring them into contempt. Why may I not take judicial notice that an allusion to "the frozen snake" has a tendency to lower a person in the eyes of the world? In my opinion it does so, and is therefore libellous. As to the fourth count, there is no doubt.

*Pleading—Confession and Avoidance—Plea bad as amounting to General Issue—
De Injurid.*

A declaration stated, in the first count, that it was agreed between the defendant and the plaintiffs, that the defendant should sell and deliver to the plaintiffs certain iron rails to be made and delivered of certain weights and shapes at a price stated, and the said rails to be inspected and certified as then agreed on, and to be of a certain quality, and that the defendant did make and deliver certain rails as and for the rails of such quality; and alleging as a breach that the rails were not of the said quality. The defendant pleaded that the said rails were, according to the agreement, to be inspected by an agent of the plaintiffs, who was at liberty to approve and accept the same if he should think fit, and that the said rails were inspected and approved and accepted by such agent on the delivery of the same:—Held, bad, in substance, as not answering the breach complained of, and only shewing performance of one of the stipulations of the contract set out in the said count. And, semble, that it was also bad in form, as amounting to the general issue.

To the second count, which stated that the defendant promised to deliver rails fit and proper for the purpose of a certain railway, and alleging as a breach that the rails delivered were not fit and proper for such railway, the defendant pleaded a plea similar to the plea to the first count:—Held, that the plea was bad in substance, for the same reason as the plea to the first count; and, also, in form, as amounting to the general issue.

Assumpsit. The first count stated that before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on, &c., it was agreed by and between the said company (the New British Iron Company) and by the plaintiffs, that the said company should, at certain times then agreed upon between the plaintiffs and the said company, sell and deliver to the plaintiffs, who should then buy and receive of the said company, divers, to wit, 982 tons of iron rails to be made and delivered by the said company to and for the plaintiffs at certain times and in a certain manner, and of certain weights, shapes and dimensions, then agreed upon by and between the plaintiffs and the said company, at the price of 9*l.* 10*s.* for each ton of the said rails at the Staffordshire works of the said company, the payment of such price to be made by the plaintiffs to the said company according to certain terms and subject to certain allowances then agreed upon by and between the plaintiffs and the said company, and the said rails to be inspected and certified as then agreed upon by and between the plaintiffs and the said company, and to be, to wit, at the several times of the sale and delivery thereof by the said company to the plaintiffs in quality equal to any rails made in Staffordshire. And thereupon in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiffs then promised the said company to observe and perform all things in the said agreement contained on the part of the plaintiffs to be observed and performed, the said company then promised the plaintiffs to observe and perform all things in the said agreement contained on the part of the said company to be observed and performed. And the plaintiffs, in fact, say, that from the time of the making of the said agreement and promises to the time of the commencement of this suit they have been ready and willing to observe and perform, and during that time have observed and performed, all things in the same agreement and promise contained on the part of the plaintiffs to be observed and performed. Yet the plaintiffs further say, that although, after the making of the same agreement and promises, and at the said times in the said agreement in this behalf mentioned, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, and on divers other days and times during the time last aforesaid, the said company did make and sell and deliver to the plaintiffs, divers, to wit, 982 tons of certain iron rails as and for the rails in quality equal to any rails made in Staffordshire, in the said agreement mentioned as aforesaid. Yet during the times aforesaid the said company, disregarding their said promise and agreement in this, that such last-mentioned rails were not at the said times of the sale and delivery thereof to the plaintiffs, and during the time aforesaid, nor at any time, nor did nor would the said company at any time, make, sell, or deliver any rails whatsoever, in quality equal to any rails made in Staffordshire, contrary to the said agreement and promise of the said company so made as aforesaid.

The second count stated, that theretofore, to wit, on &c., in consideration that the plaintiffs, at the request of the said company, then promised the said company to buy of the said company, at certain times and upon certain terms then agreed upon by and between the said company and the plaintiffs, divers, to wit, 982 tons of iron rails of certain sizes, weights and dimensions, and for certain prices then agreed upon by and between the plaintiffs and the company, amounting to a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 6,000*l.*, for the purpose of a railway in parts beyond the seas, the said company then promised the plaintiffs to make, sell, and deliver at the several times, and upon the terms and in manner aforesaid, the said rails for the purposes of the said railway. And the plaintiffs, in fact, say, that although they, confiding in the said promise of the said company, did afterwards, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, buy of the said company at the said times and upon the said terms so agreed upon as aforesaid, the said several tons of iron rails of such sizes, weights, and dimensions, and for the said prices and for the said purposes of the said railway which the said company then made, sold, and delivered to the plaintiffs as and for such rails then fit and proper for the said purposes of the said railway; yet the said company, disregarding their said promise in this, to wit, that at the several times of such sale and delivery of the last-mentioned rails the same were not, nor were any or either of them, or any part thereof, fit or proper for the said purposes of the said railway, nor did nor would the said company at any time, make, sell, or deliver any rails fit or proper for the said purposes of the said railway, contrary to the said promise of the said company in that behalf so made as aforesaid, whereby and by means of the premises the plaintiffs have not only lost and been deprived of the use and benefit of the price of the said rails, amounting to a large sum of money, to wit, 6,000*l.* which they then paid to the said company, and the said company then accepted from the plaintiffs on account of the said price of such rails, but have during the time aforesaid lost and been deprived of great profits, amounting to a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 5,000*l.*, which they might and otherwise would have gained from certain contracts then made between the plaintiffs and a certain railway company in parts beyond the seas, to wit, the Mecklenburgh Railway Company, for supplying rails of the respective qualities above mentioned for the purposes of the said railway in the said parts beyond the seas, and have by reason of the premises necessarily incurred debts and liabilities to a large amount, to wit, to the amount of 5,000*l.* on the faith of the said agreement and promises of the said New British Iron Company, and of their due performance thereof by making rails of the qualities respectively above mentioned, and have by reason of the premises necessarily paid divers sums of money, and incurred divers liabilities, amounting altogether to a large sum, to wit, the sum of 1,000*l.* in and about the necessary travelling expenses of the plaintiffs and their servants and agents, and in and about the necessary removal and sending of such rails so made and sold and delivered as and for rails of the quality above mentioned, from the works of the said company to the said parts beyond the seas, and by reason of the premises the said railway company have refused to pay the plaintiffs any price for the rails made, sold, and delivered by the said New British Iron Company as and for rails of the respective qualities above mentioned, and the same have become and are of no use or value to the plaintiffs.

Third plea, to the first count, that according to the terms and the true intent and meaning of the said agreement in that count mentioned, the said rails therein referred to and the subject of the said agreement were to be inspected and certified as in the said first count mentioned (that is to say), the same were to be inspected at the works of the said company after the making thereof, and prior to the delivery of the same by the said company to the said plaintiffs, by an agent of the said plaintiffs, to be appointed by them for that purpose, and who was to be at liberty to approve and accept in performance of the said agreement for the said plaintiffs, if he should think fit, any of the said rails so to be made as aforesaid, and certify to the plaintiffs, to wit, as he should think fit respecting the same. And the defendant further says, that the said rails in the first count alleged to have been made, sold and delivered to the said plaintiffs, were inspected at the works of the said company, to wit, in the county of Stafford, after the making of the same, and before the delivery thereof respectively, to wit, on the respective days of the delivery thereof, in the said first count mentioned in that behalf, and were thereupon then approved and accepted in performance of the said agreement, for the said plaintiffs, by one James Gladstone, an agent of the said plaintiffs, theretofore appointed by them in that behalf, according to and in pursuance of the said agreement. Verification.

Eighth plea, to the second count, that it was part of the terms of the said agreement in that count mentioned, that the said rails therein referred to, and the subject of the said agreement in that count mentioned, should be inspected at the works of the said company after the making thereof and prior to the delivery of the same by the said company to the said plaintiffs, by an agent of the said plaintiffs, to be appointed by them for that purpose, and who was to be at liberty to approve and accept in performance of the said agreement for the said plaintiffs, if he should think fit, any of the rails so to be made as aforesaid. And the defendant further says, that the said rails in the said count alleged to have been made, sold, and delivered to the said plaintiffs, were inspected at the works of the said company, to wit, in the county of Stafford, after the making of the same and before the delivery thereof respectively, to wit, on the respective days of the delivery thereof, in the said second count mentioned, in that behalf, and were thereupon then approved and accepted in performance of the said agreement, for the said plaintiffs, by one James Gladstone, an agent of the said plaintiffs, theretofore appointed by them in that behalf, according to and in pursuance of the said agreement. Verification.

Replication to both pleas de injurid.

Special demurrer and joinder.

Bovill, in support of the demurrer (June 26).—De injuriâ is an improper replication to both pleas [a long argument took place on this point, but is omitted, as no judgment was given on it].

Bramwell, contra.—The replications are good. [This argument is omitted for the reason above stated.] The pleas are bad; they amount to this: the warrant as to quality is broken, but the agent certified. That is an excuse, but the pleas are bad, as it is a bad excuse.

Bovill, in reply.

PATTESON, J. now delivered the judgment of the Court (1).—In this case there were demurrers to the replications to the third and eighth pleas; but it is unnecessary to consider the replications as the pleas appear to us to be bad in substance. The part of the contract set out in the first count, as far as relates to the point of our judgment, is, that in consideration that the plaintiffs would buy and receive, the defendant promised to make and deliver certain iron rails to be inspected and certified as agreed upon, and to be in quality equal to any rails made in Staffordshire; and the breach is, that the rails which were made and delivered were not of that quality. The plea alleges that the rails were, by the contract, to be inspected before delivery by an agent of the plaintiffs, to be appointed for that purpose, who was to be at liberty to approve and accept any of the said rails, if he should think fit, and certify to the plaintiffs as he should think fit, and that the rails in question were accordingly so inspected, approved, and accepted, in performance of the agreement, by an agent of the plaintiffs. This plea confesses that the part of the promise relating to the quality was broken, and attempts to avoid that breach by alleging that another part of the promise, relating to the approval and acceptance by an agent, had been performed. Of course a complaint of non-performance of one part of a contract is not avoided by alleging performance of another part: the defendant must therefore contend that the two parts are not separate and distinct, but forming one subject-matter of promise only, and that the effect of such promise is, that the approval and acceptance by the agent should establish that the stipulation for quality had been performed, or that in a measure he had been relieved from the performance thereof. The plea, however, meets neither of these views. If the approval and acceptance by the inspector were conclusive evidence, or indeed evidence at all of the performance of the stipulation for quality, the breach should have been traversed or performance pleaded; and in this point of view the present plea pleads evidence merely. If they amount to a release from the stipulation for quality, the plea should have been of a release; but we see no reason for putting this construction on the contract: each stipulation is in its terms distinct, and in its nature, as an absolute warranty for quality, may well be required in addition to a provision for inspection and approval to guard against defects which inspection cannot discover. We are of opinion, therefore, that the plea is bad.

The same judgment applies to the demurrer to the replication to the eighth plea, which is to the second count. That plea is also bad, as amounting to non assumpsit, for the second count is silent altogether as to any certificate of approval; and, by the addition of that certificate made in the plea, there is manifestly a statement of a different contract from that stated in the second count; and it is by no means clear that the plea to the first count is not bad for the same reason.

May 31. } HADRICK v. HESLOP AND RAINE.

Malicious Prosecution—Probable Cause—Belief—Malice—Pleading—Evidence—Witness—Admissibility of Defendant who suffers Judgment by Default.

In case for a malicious prosecution for perjury against two defendants, one of whom suffered judgment by default, and the other pleaded to issue, the Judge left it to the jury to say whether the defendant believed, or had reasonable and probable cause for believing, that the plaintiff was guilty of perjury, and whether he acted maliciously. The jury found that he did not believe that the plaintiff was guilty of perjury, but that he had acted from improper motives, and with a view to exclude his evidence on a new trial. The Judge thereupon held that there was evidence of malice:—Held, that this ruling was correct.

Held, also, that in such an action the plea of not guilty does not put in issue the termination of the prosecution by the acquittal of the plaintiff.

Held, also, that the defendant, who had suffered judgment by default, was a competent witness for the plaintiff.

Case for a malicious prosecution for perjury. The defendant Raine suffered judgment by default, and the other defendant, Heslop, pleaded not guilty, and the venire was in the usual form, to try the issue against Heslop, as well as to assess the damages against Raine.

At the trial, before Wightman, J., at the Durham Summer Assizes, 1847, the plaintiff called Raine as a witness. He was objected to as being incompetent, but the learned Judge admitted the evidence.

It appeared that the perjury was alleged to have been committed by the plaintiff in an action brought by one Hinde against the present defendants, who were partners, and in which the present plaintiff Hadrick was called as a witness for Hinde, the question in dispute being whether certain barley had been sold on the credit of the firm, or on that of one of the defendants only. Witnesses were called for the defendants on that trial.

It appeared that Heslop was not present when Hadrick's evidence was given; but he had been told by two persons who gave evidence in the present case, that there was no ground for the indictment, whereupon he said that it would have the effect of stopping the plaintiff's mouth, and assisting him in a motion for a new trial, for which a rule was obtained, but subsequently discharged. Heslop did not call witnesses. The Judge asked the jury whether Heslop believed, or had reasonable and probable cause for believing, that the plaintiff's evidence was false, and whether there was malice. The jury answered the first question in the negative; and as to the second they said they thought "malice" a strong word, but found that the defendant acted from improper motives and with a view of suppressing the evidence. The Judge held that this was malice, and the plaintiff had a verdict, with 200*l.* damages.

Bliss, in the ensuing Michaelmas term, moved for a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and on account of the improper reception of the evidence of Raine, and also on affidavits. He contended, on the first point, that the Judge ought to have decided whether there was reasonable and probable cause independently of the belief of the defendant. Broad v. Ham (1) is different: there the belief came into question. Ravenga v. Mackintosh (2), Panton v. Williams (3).

The real question is, whether there was any fact which gave reasonable and probable cause for the charge, not whether the defendant believed its truth or not. Musgrove v. Newell (4) is strongly in point.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I never understood the decision of the Court of Exchequer in that case. The defendant believed his complaint to be true when he made it, but was afterwards convinced it was untrue, and yet persisted in the charge. Probable cause for a person acting, must mean probable cause in his own mind at the time when he acts.]

Belief may be an ingredient of probable cause, as in Venafr v. Johnson (5), Taylor v. Willans (6), and Delegal v. Highley (7); but it is not necessarily so—Turner v. Ambler (8). Secondly, this was a question for the Judge alone: the belief of the defendant, which is a matter for the jury, goes only to prove malice. The definition of "malice" was wrong. Malice in fact ought to be proved. The improper motives actuating the defendant should be in reference to the prosecution, not generally only. In Johnstone v. Sutton (9), Lord Mansfield lays down the true definition of "malice." Thirdly, the fact of the acquittal of the plaintiff was put in issue by not guilty, and ought to have been proved; on this he cited Drummond v. Pigou (10), Watkins v. Lee (11), Atkinson v. Raleigh (12). Lastly, Raine was an incompetent witness—Worral v. Jones (13), Pipe v. Steel (14).

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—It appears quite outrageous to say that where a party clearly believes a charge which he makes against another to be unfounded, that he can be said to have had reasonable and probable cause for making it under any circumstances. Turner v. Ambler has been referred to, and a decision of my Brother Maule, in Broad v. Ham, is there noticed, where he held that a defendant was liable who, though cognizant of what really was reasonable and probable cause, did not think it reasonable and probable, but acted from malicious motives only and without that belief, and the Court of Common Pleas upheld that ruling. It is, however, rather difficult to distinguish that case from some others. The question is not a general one as to belief, but whether in the particular case the party believed the existence of reasonable and probable cause. Absence of this belief must be brought to his knowledge; and in almost all cases it is mixed up with proof of malice. In Turner v. Ambler it was inferred that there was no want of probable cause; no point was there made as to the defendant's belief. The only question was, whether the facts proved bore him out in making the charge. Here the plaintiff takes upon himself to prove that the defendant did not believe the truth of the charge made by him; if so, that gets rid of the reasonable and probable cause which might have existed in the absence of such proof. It seems to me we cannot entertain any doubt as to the propriety of the ruling. As to the fact of the acquittal being in issue, the case of Watkins v. Lee is a direct authority to shew that it is not so, unless specially traversed. On these points therefore the rule will be refused.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is now settled that the question of want of probable cause is for the Judge; but I take it to mean want of probable cause in the individual case, not generally; therefore there must be certain facts found by the jury, before the Judge can decide the question. The present objection is, that the party did not believe in the charge, and made it from improper motives. Surely, then, it was right to ask the jury whether he believed the party who told him, and whether he preferred the indictment solely for the purpose of suppressing the evidence of the plaintiff. As to the malice I think enough was done, and that the correct definition was given by the Judge. Taking it in its ordinary sense, the jury said it implies a serious charge. The Judge told them it did not mean what they imagined; but if the defendant acted from improper motives it amounted to malice in the sense used. I think he was not bound to say more.

WIGHTMAN, J.—It appears that Heslop was not cognizant of the facts on the original trial: he seems to have acted on what other persons told him; and the question is, whether he had probable cause for indicting the plaintiff. He is told by two of the witnesses that there is no ground for doing so. Admitting, or at least not denying, that he believes what they tell him, he says it will stop his mouth, and therefore

I will indict him. That is evidence that he did not believe there was any probable cause at all. With respect to the malice, if once it is conceded that there was no probable cause, that in itself amounts to malice; but here it is proved that the defendant acted from improper motives, and therefore that is stronger evidence of malice. As to the acquittal being in issue, I take it, since the New Rules, there would be no doubt about this, if it had not been expressly decided, as it has been, by the Exchequer.

BALE, J.—The question left to the jury was, whether the defendant believed the information as to the evidence given by the plaintiff on the former trial, and the jury found that he did. It certainly would be monstrous to say there was no want of reasonable and probable cause. As to the pleading, wherever a material fact is essential to the case, and not denied, it is admitted on the record.

Rule refused on the ground of misdirection, but rule nisi granted on account of the reception of the evidence.

In Hilary vacation last, cause against the rule was shewn (15) by—

Knowles and Granger (Feb. 11).—The evidence of Raine was properly admitted at the trial. The old rule as to rejecting a party to the record merely on that account has been much qualified; and the only question is, whether the witness has an interest. Worrall v. Jones and Pipe v. Steel are in point, and this being an action of tort, in which there is no contribution, is a stronger case. The interest of Raine would be against the plaintiff, as there can be but one assessment of damages. Doe d. Harrop v. Green (16), Stevens v. Lynch (17), King v. Baker (18), Norden v. Williamson (19), Ward v. Haydon (20), Marsh v. Smith (21), Thorpe v. Barber (22), and Blackett v. Weir (23), were cited.

*Bliss and J. It is conceded that there would be contribution here. Chapman v. Graves (24) is the only case which was decided on the ground of direct interest.

[PATTESON, J.—In ejectment, if one defendant assists to fix another, he does not necessarily relieve himself; so here, the plaintiff may or may not issue execution against both defendants.]

Execution must issue against both, and may possibly be levied against both; and though Raine's goods will be bound from the delivery of the fi. fa. to the sheriff, they will be worth more if the charge is divided with those of Heslop—*Samuel v. Judgment was now delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This was an action on the case for a malicious prosecution against two defendants, Heslop and Raine. Raine suffered judgment by default, but Heslop pleaded to issue. The venire was in the usual form to try the issue against Heslop, and to assess damages against Raine. Raine was called and examined as a witness for the plaintiff, and on this ground a rule nisi for a new trial was obtained, and has been fully argued. Formerly, it seems to have been considered that a party to the record as such merely, was incompetent, but that doctrine is now finally overruled—Worrall v. Jones; and the true criterion is held to be, whether the proposed witness is or is not interested to obtain a verdict for the party calling him. In cases of contract, a defendant, who has suffered judgment by default is not competent for the other defendant, because he is directly interested to procure a verdict for him, since such verdict would enure to his benefit, notwithstanding the judgment by default. But, for the same reason, he is competent for the plaintiff, his direct and predominating interest being against the plaintiff who calls him, though he has a conflicting interest to fix the other defendant jointly with himself—Pipe v. Steel. In cases of tort such as the present, where an assessment of damages against the proposed witness is to take place, as well as the trial of an issue against the other defendant, he is not competent for that defendant, because he is directly interested to reduce the amount of the damages, though a verdict for that defendant would not enure to his benefit. This was expressly decided in Thorpe v. Barber. That same ground of incompetency for the other defendant would make him a competent witness for the plaintiff, by parity of reason with the case of Pipe v. Steel, and would be conclusive of the case, if no other ground of incompetency from a more predominating interest could be shewn. It is argued that such ground can be shewn, and also that there is direct authority against his competency. First, as to authority. The case cited is that of Chapman v. Graves, reported in a note to Stevens v. Lynch, as having been decided by Le Blanc, J. In that case, the learned Judge admitted a joint-trespasser, who was not made defendant, but rejected one who was, and who had suffered judgment by default. The decisions appear to have proceeded not on the question of interest, but on the fact of being or not being party to the record. If the question of interest had been taken into consideration, it should seem that the witness who was not a party to the record had the strongest inducement to fix the defendants, because the plaintiff after obtaining judgment against them could never have sued the witness at all, and so he by the effect of his own evidence might escape altogether, whereas, the utmost benefit that he who was party to the record could obtain, was that of having others made jointly liable with himself. This case, therefore, although it has been often cited, and with apparent approbation, does not seem to us to be a strong authority, if indeed it be any, since the doctrine that competency depends upon interest only has been established. In the case of Thorpe v. Barber, Maule, J. is reported to have said that the case of Worrall v. Jones has overruled the case of Chapman v. Graves, and so it has, if Chapman v. Graves is taken to have proceeded on the doctrine that parties to the record are as such merely not competent, but not otherwise. It should also be observed, that the plaintiff in Chapman v. Graves obtained the verdict upon other evidence. In the last treatise on evidence Mr. Pitt Taylor has expressed his doubt whether this case can be supported. Secondly, as to the interest of the witness. No doubt he has an interest to fix the other defendant, because it may be that the plaintiff, having recovered against both, will take his execution against the other defendant, and not against the witness, and in general (subject to some exceptions which are not shewn to apply here) there is no contribution between defendants in actions of tort. On the other side it was said that such an interest is contingent, and too remote and uncertain to be regarded, as it was considered to be in the case of Doe d. Hurrop v. Green, decided by Lord Ellenborough. In order to meet this view of the case, the learned counsel for the defendant Heslop cited numerous authorities to shew, first, that if the plaintiff succeeded against Heslop, his execution must be jointly against both Heslop and Raine.

This is so, no doubt, but it is equally clear that under a writ of feri facias against both, he might levy on the goods of one only. Secondly, that no execution could be taken out against the lands of Raine, though the judgment at once becomes a charge on them, until all the goods of Heslop as well as Raine should have been exhausted. The principal authority for this position seems to be in 2 Inst. 395: "If the chattels be sufficient to pay the debt, and so may appear to the sheriff, whereby he may satisfy the debt, then he ought not to extend the land for the residue," and it being clear that the execution, of whatever nature it be, must be joint, the position may be correct. So, if the plaintiff sues out a feri facias and executes it by levying part, he may not be able to sue out an elegit for the residue, until there has been a return of nulla bona as to both defendants; but there is nothing in the Statute of Westminster 2nd, which gives the elegit, to prevent him from suing out an elegit against both and taking the goods of one to satisfy his debt, though, if he take the lands, he must take the lands of all. So that the argument at last comes to this, that the witness has a direct interest to obtain the verdict against his co-defendant, and make him liable on account of the possibility that the plaintiff may take his execution against him only, or against the goods and lands of both. We think this too remote and contingent an interest to render the witness incompetent, and if he be held incompetent for this reason, we cannot see on what ground a joint trespasser, not a defendant, can be held competent, as his evidence might wholly discharge himself. Now, Lord Tenterden, in his judgment in Blackett v. Weir, says, "In actions of trespass witnesses apparently open to a much stronger objection are constantly admitted. In that action a recovery against one of several co-trespassers, is a bar to an action against the others, and yet scarcely a circuit passes without an instance of a person who has committed a trespass being called to prove that he did it by the command of the defendant. In that case, a verdict for the plaintiff would operate as a discharge to the witness, there being no contribution in actions of tort." The same proposition of law is stated as perfectly clear and well known in Morris v. Daubigny. The class of cases which ended in Bloor v.

Davies might perhaps lead to a contrary inference. The late act will prevent their coming again into operation, but they may be said to have been in a high degree unsatisfactory. Their doctrine would exclude every creditor from being a witness in favour of his debtor, however solvent, in any action whatever. Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the witness was rightly admitted, and that this rule must be discharged.

June 27.

Evidence — Presumption — Deed — Delivery.

At the trial of a cause it was admitted, that a document "was signed, sealed, and executed as it purports to be." The document, which was produced by the party who was to take a benefit under it, concluded "as witness the hands and seals of" (the parties), and the attestation was to the signing and sealing only:—Held, that it was to be inferred that the document was delivered, and amounted in law to a deed.

Assumpsit upon an agreement by which the defendants, who were members of the British and American Steam Navigation Company, agreed, inter alia, to pay to the plaintiff (the patentee of improvements in steam-engines) 5*l.* per horse-power on all engines constructed by them, in which the principles of the plaintiff's patent should be adopted (1). Breach, non-payment, &c.

Plea (inter alia), non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the Sittings in Middlesex, after Hilary term, 1846, it was admitted by both parties that a document embodying the terms of the agreement declared on, "was signed, sealed, and executed" as it purported to be by the plaintiff and one Isaac Solly, a director of the company on their behalf, on the 26th of November 1836. The conclusion of this document was, "as witness the hands and seals of the parties the day and year first above written. Samuel Hall (l.s.), J. Solly

(1) See the declaration at length, 5 Q.B. Rep. 233; and 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 6.

(L.S.). Witness to the sealing and signing hereof by the said J. Solly. M. Laird."

It was also admitted that another document, not under seal, was signed by the plaintiff and Solly on the 28th of November 1836, which recited part of the former agreement, and granted other patents in consideration of the same gross sum as was to be paid under the first agreement; but it did not in terms embody the first agreement, or refer to the clause for breach of which the present action was brought. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff subject to a special case, which was argued (2) by

Cowling, for the plaintiff (Dec. 10.)—It is contended that this agreement is a deed, and that, therefore, the issue on non assumpsit must be found for the defendants. No doubt the document is under seal, but there is no evidence of its ever having been delivered, which is essential to its being a complete deed. The admission that it was signed, sealed and executed as it purports to be does not carry the case any further. It may be a mere licence to use the patent under seal, on which assumpsit will lie, as in Chanter v. Johnson (3).

[WIGHTMAN, J.—This is an agreement, not a licence. If a document under seal is handed over by the party sealing, that is a sufficient delivery.]

That depends upon the intention of the party to deliver it as a deed.

[COLERIDGE, J.—There are two requisites: one that the document should be of the proper quality, that is, under seal, the other, that it should be delivered. If it be a deed and it is delivered, it must be delivered as a deed.]

But, assuming the document of the 26th of November to amount to a specialty, that of the 28th of November is under hand only, and will support the action.

[COLERIDGE, J.—A subsequent simple contract cannot do away with the prior agreement under seal if it refers to it for the terms. You cannot do without the first agreement; if you could, your argument might prevail.]

Peacock, contra.—The question is, whether the defendant ever entered into such a contract as that declared on, i. e. whether he agreed to pay 5*l.* per horse-power otherwise than by deed. Now the first contract is clearly in form a deed, as there is a covenant in terms, and the ordinary words of attestation. The admission as to the execution is only made to dispense with the attendance of the attesting witness. When an attesting witness appears he never, in fact, proves a delivery, and at the distance of eight or nine years no witness would take upon himself to do so. Signature is not necessary, but only sealing and delivery. The sealing is primd facie evidence of delivery, more especially when the deed comes out of the proper custody—1 Stark. Evid. p. 372. The proof of the handwriting of the party opposite to the seal is, therefore, primd facie proof of delivery by that party. It is argued that it is not to be presumed to have been delivered, as the attestation does not specify that it was; but the ordinary forms of attestation do not use the word "delivered." When a deed is thirty years old an attesting witness need not be called; would it be necessary in that case, with this form of attestation, to prove a delivery? Then, secondly, if the first instrument is a deed it contains the only contract to pay the 5*l.* per horse-power; and if a consideration is set up as contained in the second agreement, to support a promise to pay that sum, then the parol agreement is inconsistent with the deed, and cannot be set up as varying its effect.

Cowling, in reply.—It cannot be seriously contended, that a document is a deed merely because it has a seal upon it.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Do you contend that there was here no evidence to go to the jury of the due execution of the deed?]

Yes; Mr. Starkie (as well as Mr Phillips) in his work on Evidence, vol. i. pp. 372, 451, cites Talbot v. Hodson (4); but on referring to that case it appears that the attesting clause there stated that the deed was delivered.

[PATTESON, J.—A deed might be signed on one day and delivered on another]

case is, whether any written agreement to the effect stated in the declaration was proved to have been executed by an agent of the defendants, so as to bind them. Two agreements were proved, one dated the 26th of November 1836, under the seals of the plaintiff and Mr. Solly, a director of the British and American Steam Navigation Company, of which the defendants were members and directors, and purporting to be an agreement between the plaintiff and the company; the other not under seal, dated the 28th of November 1836, signed by the plaintiff and the same Mr. Solly. The plaintiff was owner of several patents, and by the first agreement he grants the use of such patents as are mentioned in it to the company upon certain terms, which are those embodied in the declaration. The second agreement recites part of the first, and grants the use of certain other patents of the plaintiff, which had been omitted in the first, in consideration of the same sum of 2,000*l.* agreed to be paid by the first, and varies one of the terms of the first agreement; but it does not in terms embody the first agreement, nor does it expressly refer to the clause, on which this action is founded, as to the payment of the 5*l.* per horse-power in case of the company contracting with any one to use the plaintiff's patents mentioned in the second agreement, but omitted in the first.

Under these circumstances, we do not think that the second agreement can be taken per se, or by reference to the first, to be the real contract between the parties. It merely adds the licence to use the additional patents, but it does not even say upon the terms and stipulations contained in the first agreement, nor anything to that effect. We think that the plaintiff must ground his action on the first agreement. Now, if that agreement be a deed, he cannot found on it this action of assumpsit. The plaintiff contends that it is not a deed, because the conclusion of it is only "as witness the hands and seals of the parties," and the attestations are only to the "signing and sealing." Nothing is said anywhere about any "delivery," which is essential to a deed.

The case was tried, so far as this point is involved, on an admission; which was only "that the document was signed, sealed, and executed, as it purports to be." The Court were to draw all inferences of fact that a jury would be justified in doing. The document was produced by the plaintiff, executed by Mr. Solly. We cannot doubt that if the subscribing witness had been called, and had proved that he saw it signed and sealed by Mr. Solly, the jury, on its production by the plaintiff, would have been justified in inferring, and would have inferred, that it was delivered by Mr. Solly; and we feel ourselves bound to draw that same inference, and to hold that it is a deed, and that this action of assumpsit cannot be maintained: therefore that a verdict must be entered for the defendants on the plea of non assumpserunt.

Verdict accordingly.

Landlord and Tenant—Custom of the Country.

Where a custom of the country is proved to exist, it is to be considered applicable to all tenancies, in whatever way created, whether verbal or in writing, unless expressly or impliedly excluded by the written terms themselves.

Debt for work and labour and other common counts.

Pleas—Never indebted, and a set-off for the use and occupation of farm lands, and for money due and payable from the plaintiff to the defendant, for and in respect of the defendant having before then relinquished and given up to and in favour of the plaintiff, and at his request, and for and in respect of the plaintiff having received the benefit and advantage of certain work done and materials provided and monies expended by the defendant in and about ploughing, harrowing, manuring, sowing, and otherwise cultivating and improving divers lands by him, the defendant, before then harrowed, manured, sown, and otherwise cultivated and improved and given up to the plaintiff; and for money due and owing from the plaintiff to the defendant for divers crops of corn, wheat and turnips, and other crops of the defendant before then bargained and sold by the defendant to the plaintiff, at his request, and by the plaintiff, under and by virtue of such bargain and sale before then accepted, had and received, and taken to his own use.

Replication to the set-off, nil debet.

At the trial, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the Sittings after Michaelmas term, 1847, it appeared that the plaintiff was a farmer, and the defendant the owner of the farm called Priestland Farm, Horley, Surrey, which he let to the plaintiff under a written agreement. The plaintiff proved that the defendant was indebted to him for the amount claimed in his particulars of demand; and the defendant then proceeded to shew that the plaintiff was indebted to him as incoming tenant for crops and manure in a sum equal to that proved by the plaintiff. To prove this set-off the defendant relied on the custom of the country, that incoming tenants took the crops and manure at a valuation. The witnesses proved that there was a custom of the country to that extent, but on cross-examination they stated that they were not aware whether this custom applied to lettings which were in writing or under seal.

For the plaintiff it was objected, that the defendant had not proved his set-off, for that he had not shewn that the custom applied to lettings under written agreements, and that as the affirmative was upon the defendant to shew a custom applicable to the particular case, the set-off failed.

For the defendant it was contended, that when a custom of the country was once proved, it must be taken to apply to all lettings, whether verbal, in writing, or under seal, unless it be proved to be limited to verbal lettings.

The Lord Chief Justice held that the defendant had not made out the custom, and the plaintiff had a verdict.

Watson (14th July 1847) moved for a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be had on the ground of misdirection, citing the following cases—Wiglesworth v. Dallison (1), Hutton v. Warren (2), Senior v. Armitage (3).

[PATTESON, J.—All the cases are collected in Smith's Leading Cases, vol. 1, in the notes to Wiglesworth v. Dallison.]

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—We will, before we grant a rule, look at the cases.

A rule nisi was subsequently granted, and now—

Keane shewed cause, contending that there was ample evidence to shew that the plaintiff had, in fact, paid for the crops, even if the custom were made out; for that a receipt was put in for 150*l*.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Supposing that were so, I gave a decided opinion on an objection formally made, that to prove the custom of the country, it was necessary for the defendant to give evidence that it applied to the case in question, that is, a letting under a written agreement. If a farming custom, when once made out, applies as a matter of law to cases where there are written agreements, as well as to cases of tenancy without written terms, then I was wrong, and there must be a new trial.]

He then contended that the law was as laid down at the trial.

Keane, for the defendant, was not called upon to argue.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I think I was wrong at the trial. It appears on examination of the decisions that the law is this, that when a custom of the country is once proved, it applies to all takings, whether parol or by lease in writing, unless shewn not to apply by the terms of the writing itself.

1847. } DE MEDINA v. GROVE AND
Feb. 5. } OTHERS.

Pleading—Case—Vexatious Process—Malice and Want of reasonable or probable Cause.

In an action for indorsing a writ of ca. sa. and imprisoning the plaintiff thereon for a larger sum than was due on the judgment (part having been paid), and for indorsing a fi. fa. and seizing the plaintiff's goods for a greater sum than was due on a second judgment,—Held, that the declaration in such a case is insufficient, if it do not contain averments of malice and of want of reasonable and probable cause.

Error from the Court of Queen's Bench.

This was an action for a vexatious arrest, and for vexatiously indorsing a writ of fi. fa. (1).

The first count of the declaration alleged that a judgment had been recovered against the plaintiff for 1,060*l.* 10*s.* damages, and had been assigned to the defendant Grove; that the plaintiff paid Grove 1,000*l.* in part satisfaction, and that afterwards Grove and the other two defendants well knowing this, and intending to vex, harass, and annoy the plaintiff, issued a ca. sa. on the judgment, and “wrongfully and injuriously” caused it to be indorsed to levy the whole sum of 1,060*l.* 10*s.*, and “wrongfully and injuriously” caused the plaintiff to be imprisoned until she gave a warrant of attorney for the whole amount, with costs. The second count alleged that the defendant Grove entered up judgment against the plaintiff on a warrant of attorney for securing 1,081*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*; that a large sum had been paid by the plaintiff to Grove in part satisfaction; that the defendants caused a writ of fi. fa. to be issued against the plaintiff, and intending to vex, harass, and annoy her, “wrongfully and injuriously” caused the said writ to be indorsed to levy 320*l.*, and the sheriff to seize the plaintiff's goods until she paid 320*l.*, whereas at the time of the seizure and payment much less than 320*l.* was due on the judgment.

At the trial, the plaintiff obtained a verdict against Grove and one of the other defendants. Those defendants having moved in arrest of judgment, the Court of Queen's Bench made the rule absolute for arresting the judgment, on the ground that the declaration was insufficient. Thereupon the plaintiff brought her writ of error.

Lush, for the plaintiff in error (2).—The Court below seems to have put this case on the same footing as cases of malicious prosecution. Here the act complained of was in itself wrongful, while in the other cases the act was prima facie legal. The case of Saxon v. Castle (3) was much relied on; the only material difference between that case and the present being the omission of a scienter there, which is inserted in the present case. It is a fallacy to liken this to an action for malicious prosecution. The cases cited in the judgment of the Court below do not bear upon the point. In Scheibel v. Fairbain (4) the wrongful act complained of was nonfeasance. It was charged to have been the defendant's duty to countermand execution of a ca. sa. after payment, and the Court decided that no such duty existed. There is, indeed, an intimation in that case that the action might have been maintained if malice had been alleged. But it is difficult to see how the motive for a nonfeasance could make any difference, if there was no duty at all. Scheibel v. Fairbain was the principal authority on which Saxon v. Castle was decided. In Gibson v. Chaters (5) the facts precluded the presumption of malice, and there was merely an omission to countermand the writ. Page v. Wiple (6) was also cited in the judgment. There it was alleged to have been the duty of the defendant to prevent the plaintiff from being arrested after payment, and the Court decided that there was no such duty cast upon the defendant. All these authorities only shew that where there is no duty incumbent upon a person, an action cannot be maintained for nonfeasance. In Crozer v. Pilling (7) an action for maliciously refusing to accept money tendered after the execution of a ca. sa. and to sign a discharge was sustained, and the Court said that the refusal was prima facie evidence of malice. In Wentworth v. Bullen (8), Parke, J. said he was satisfied that an action would lie for issuing execution for too much. The case was not decided on that point, but no notice was taken of the omission of an averment of "malice." In Gough v. Cribb (9) the declaration was in the form of the present one, for wrongfully and unjustly causing the writ to be indorsed for a larger sum than was due; although several objections were taken, the want of the averment of malice was not alluded to.

[MAULE, J.—The Court below relied not only on the want of an averment of malice, but also on the want of an averment negating probable cause. It is consistent with this declaration that there was probable cause.]

[WILDE, C.J.—Suppose the money had been paid in a dispute with regard to a set-off or appropriation of payments.]

[PARKE, B.—It has always been considered necessary in actions for the abuse of the process of the law to allege want of probable cause as well as malice. Can you plead payment of part to a scire facies?]

Perhaps not.

[PARKE, B.—Therefore the only mode of trying whether part has been paid is to issue execution for the whole, and then the other party can apply to the equitable jurisdiction of the Court for the reduction of the amount to be levied.]

Consistently with this declaration, there could have been no dispute about the amount to be levied.

[MAULE, J.—It is quite consistent with the declaration that the parties might have agreed to let the execution go for another debt, or that an unsuccessful application might have been made to the Court of Chancery or to the equitable jurisdiction of this Court. That could not have been if there had been a denial of probable cause. I think there is in this case what amounts to an averment of malice, but not to one of want of reasonable or probable cause.]

The allegation as to reasonable and probable cause does not occur in the older cases.

[MAULE, J.—You cannot maintain these as modern law.]

In an action for an excessive distress it is not necessary to aver malice or want of probable cause.

[MAULE, J.—That is the act of the party, not of the law. Can you say on what the practice of indorsing writs of execution depends?]

There is no statute and no rule; it is merely an old practice. The case of Water v. Freeman (10), which was an action for suing out double execution, distinguishes between actions for the abuse of process and those for malicious arrest.

[MAULE, J.—There is not here any allegation that the defendant had no right to issue execution for the whole sum, or that he knew that he had no right to issue for the whole. There might be circumstances which would entitle a party to issue execution for the whole after a part had been paid, as in the instances already adverted to.]

There is no instance of a case for the abuse of process in which it has been held necessary to negative reasonable or probable cause. In Grainger v. Hill (11), where the action was for abusing the process of the law by applying it to extort property, the absence of reasonable and probable cause was not alleged. In Skinner v. Gnaton (12) there was no denial of reasonable and probable cause. (See further, Comm. Dig. 'Actions on the Case,' Tortious Proceedings at Law, (A, 4.)

Watson and Corrie, for the defendants, were stopped by the Court.

WILDE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment in this case must be affirmed, and the rest of the Court concur with me in that opinion.

The declaration, in substance, complains of an abuse of the process of the law by having indorsed upon a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum a direction to levy a larger sum than was due upon the judgment. It is clear settled law that the declaration in actions of the nature of the present action must contain averments negating the existence of reasonable and probable cause for the conduct complained of, and that the defendant acted maliciously. It may be arguable whether this declaration contains a sufficient averment of malice; but it is clear beyond all doubt, that it does not contain an averment negating the existence of reasonable and probable cause; and all the statements in this declaration are consistent with the existence of reasonable and probable cause,—they are consistent with the existence of a dispute between the parties as to the amount really due upon the judgment, which dispute might relate to the amount of the payments which had been made, or as to the authority of the person to receive the payments on behalf of the plaintiff, or as to the appropriation of certain payments, or on numerous other supposable grounds; and the ordinary process of the law to enforce the payment of the amount claimed to be due upon the judgment was a writ of execution indorsed to levy such amount, leaving the now plaintiff to apply to the equitable jurisdiction of the Court before the writ was executed to stay proceedings upon the judgment upon payment of the reduced sum, which, on her part, was insisted to be due, or after execution of the writ to be discharged upon such payment. The Court would not have entertained an application by the now defendant for leave to issue the execution for the amount he claimed; but would have left him to act at his peril; and a suitor may use the process of the law for the purpose of enforcing a demand, without being subject to an action for so doing, in the event of his not being able to maintain his right to the extent which he claimed, unless he does so without reasonable and probable cause and maliciously.

That such is the law where a party sues by mesne process and holds a defendant to bail, and where therefore no prima facie right has been established, is admitted; and there is no valid ground for contending that where a party has established a demand by a judgment, he is subject to a greater degree of responsibility in using the ordinary process of the law to enforce such established demand than in the case of a suitor suing by mesne process. The law is clearly otherwise, and to maintain an action for indorsing an execution to levy a larger amount than in the event the party appears to be entitled to, it is at least equally necessary as in the former case that the declaration should aver malice and the absence of reasonable and probable cause, and no authority has been cited tending to create any reasonable doubt upon the subject. In this case the writ itself was warranted by the judgment; and, as before said, all the allegations in the declaration are consistent with the existence of reasonable and probable cause for the process having been indorsed in the manner complained of. It does not appear under what obligation the indorsement upon a writ of execution is made. I presume it is matter of practice; and if so, the legal liability in respect of such an indorsement cannot be greater than that which attaches upon a party for holding a defendant to bail upon mesne process for an excessive amount. This Court is, therefore, of opinion that the judgment must be affirmed, by reason of the absence in this declaration of the averment negating reasonable and probable cause for making the indorsement of which complaint is made.

And therefore where in an action on the case for disturbance of ferry, the plaintiff alleged in his declaration that he was possessed of an ancient ferry for passengers and goods to and from A, from and to B, and the defendant pleaded not possessed and a traverse of the ancient and entire right of ferry; and the jury found that there was a ferry from A. to B. only,—Held, that the verdict might be entered distributively for the plaintiff for so much as was proved at the trial.

The declaration stated that the plaintiffs before and at the time, &c. were and from thence hitherto have been and still are pos-assessed, to wit, as trustees for the society of free watermen of the river Thames, residing at Greenwich, in the county of Kent, called the Isle of Dogs Ferry Society, of an ancient ferry, called "Potter's Ferry" for foot passengers and goods belonging to such foot passengers, across the river Thames to and from a certain place, in the Isle of Dogs, in the parish of St. Dunstan, Stebonheath, otherwise Stepney, in the county of Middlesex, from and to Greenwich, in the county of Kent, taking for the carriage and conveyance of such passengers and their goods over and across such ferry, in any boat or boats kept by or by the authority of them, the plaintiffs, for that purpose, certain reasonable freights or ferryages in that behalf due, and of right payable; nevertheless, the defendant, well knowing the premises and wrongfully contriving, &c. to disturb and injure the plaintiffs in the peaceable and lawful enjoyment of their said ferry, to wit, on &c., and on divers other days and times, &c. wrongfully, injuriously, and unlawfully obstructed, disturbed and interrupted the plaintiffs, their servants and labourers, in the use and enjoyment of their said ferry and passage, and hindered and prevented them from carrying divers foot passengers, for hire, over and across the said river Thames, &c., by reason whereof the said plaintiffs have been deprived of large profits, and have been and are greatly injured, &c. in the possession thereof and their rights and title thereto.

Pleas—First, that the plaintiffs were not possessed of the ancient ferry in the declaration mentioned, modo et formâ. Second, that there was not at the said several times when, &c. in the declaration mentioned, or either of them, such ancient ferry as in the declaration mentioned, modo et formâ, &c.

The defendant took issue on both the above pleas.

At the trial, before Parke, B., at the Summer Assizes for Kent, 1847, at the close of the plaintiffs' case, it was submitted, on the part of the defendant, that the evidence did not support the claim as laid. The learned Baron reserved leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit; and witnesses were called on the part of the defendant, who proved that the only right of ferry was from Greenwich to the Isle of Dogs, but not to bring back, and the jury having found accordingly that there was a ferry from Greenwich to the Isle of Dogs for passengers and their goods, but negating the remainder of the right as claimed, the learned Judge directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs for so much of the right as was proved, damages 1s., with liberty to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit if the Court should be of opinion that the declaration was not distributable (1).

A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly,—

Channell, Serj. and Pigott shewed cause (June 10).—It may be admitted, that before the New Rules, the verdict in such a case as this could not be entered distributively, so as to sustain the right of the plaintiffs to part of that which they claimed, by evidence of user of that part only; but that was by reason of the difficulty which was supposed to exist as to what the record would prove, there being no other plea than not guilty—Kingsmill v. Bull (2). It may be admitted, also, that there is no one of the New Rules, Hil. T. 4 Will. 4, which in terms comprehends such a case as this; but by Reg. 6. tit. 'Trespasse,' "in all actions in which such right of way or common or other similar right is so pleaded that the allegations as to the extent of the right are capable of being taken distributively, they shall be taken distributively." This rule is applicable to all pleadings where a right is claimed, and will operate to prevent an inconvenient number of counts. In framing the rules, it was impossible to provide in terms for every sort of case. If so, then this is a case in which the verdict is capable of being entered distributively, as the plaintiff has proved part of the right claimed—2 Wms. Saunders, 175, l., Knight v. Woore (3); and not a qualified right as in Higham v. Rabett (4), Ivatt v. Mann (5). And for this purpose it is not material to consider whether the claim is in the nature of a franchise or an easement merely—Pim v. Curell (6), Bailey v. Appleyard (7), Beardsworth v.

(1) The learned Judge refused to certify that the action was brought to try a right, as the right tried was not that which the action was brought to try.

Torkington (8), Rickets v. Salway (9), Phythian v. White (10), Tafley v. Wainwright (11).

Montagu Chambers, Peacock and Baddley, in support of the rule.—The declaration contains an allegation of an entire and indivisible right, specifically described as "Potter's Ferry for foot passengers to and from the Isle of Dogs from and to Greenwich." The entire right is traversed by the defendant; and it is not pretended that there was any disturbance in respect of the more limited right which is now suggested. The plaintiff must stand or fall by the right which he claims—Morewood v. Wood (12).

[PATTESON, J.—Where a prescription consists of two distinct parts, as of a right to toll, and a right to distrain for it, you may traverse either part (13).]

That is the case of two distinct rights. This is like a claim of a right of way from A. to B, and proof of a right from A. to C. It is admitted that, but for the New Rules, the verdict could not be entered distributively; but the rule referred to does not apply to such a case as this: and it may be doubted whether it can apply to declarations at all. The intention was, that where a right of way or other right was set up in answer to an action, if the proof fell short of the right claimed, the verdict might be distributed so as to apply to the previous pleading; but there is no rule which gives a plaintiff the right of entering the verdict distributively for so much of his declaration as he has proved in such a case as this. The declaration cannot be taken distributively with reference to itself. Again, the rule can only apply to such a right as might be pleaded as an answer to an action of trespass; but a right to ferry is not such a right, it is a franchise and an exclusive right of passage, and does not include a right to the bank or shore. The plaintiffs should have applied to amend. There was no plea of not guilty; but the defendant would not have admitted the violation of the minor right, if it had been correctly claimed. This is one entire ferry, not two ferries: if two had been claimed, the defendant might have pleaded not guilty as to the disturbance of one of them—Anderson v. Chapman (14). And the Court will not extend the principle of the New Rules in favour of a claim of a ferry, which is in the nature of a monopoly and against common right—Churchman v. Tunstall (15). Prudhomme v. Fraser (16) was an action of libel, and there was a plea of not guilty, and the question arose on Reg. Gen. 2 Will. 4. r. 74, which applies to plaintiffs. So Doe d. Bowman v. Lewis (17).

LORD DENMAN, C.J. subsequently (July 12) delivered the judgment of the Court (18).—For the matter now in dispute, the case was shortly this: the plaintiffs claimed a right of ferry from Greenwich to the Isle of Dogs and back again, and they proved half what they claimed, the right to, but not from, the Isle of Dogs. The defendant admitted by his pleading that he had invaded the right claimed, supposing such a right in fact, but there was nothing to shew which part of that entire right he had invaded. Hence the plaintiffs claimed a verdict on the only issues on the record, viz., on "not possessed" and on the existence of the ancient and entire right of ferry. It appears to us, that in admitting the invasion of the right as stated, that right being on the face of it divisible, he, the defendant, must be taken to have admitted it as to each part which would entitle the plaintiffs to a verdict, and we think the plaintiffs may succeed as to any distinct part which they prove. The New Rule cited clearly applies in actions on the case as well as trespass; and for this purpose we cannot see any reason for difference where the plaintiffs claim as owners of a franchise or by virtue of an easement.

1848. } THE QUEEN v. THE LONDON
July 12. } AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAIL-WAY COMPANY.

Railway Company—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—8 Vict. c. 18.—Compulsory Power to take Lands—Mandamus.

By sect. 18. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, when the promoters of an undertaking require to purchase any lands, they shall give notice to the parties interested therein, and every such notice shall state the particulars of the lands required, and that the promoters are willing to treat for the purchase thereof. By sect. 92. no party shall be required to sell to the promoters of an undertaking a part only of any house or other building or manufactory, if such party be willing and able to sell the whole thereof:—Held, that this latter section is not obligatory on the promoters, though it protects an owner of a building, &c. from being compelled to sell a part of it only.

Therefore, when a company have given a notice requiring part of a manufactory, a mandamus directing them to summon a jury to assess compensation for the whole cannot be sustained.

Where a mandamus requires the company to take the whole manufactory, the prosecutors cannot have the writ for a part only.

Mandamus to the London and South-Western Railway Company to issue their warrant to the sheriff of Surrey, requiring him to summon a jury to assess compensation to J. H. Coward, Ellis Cancellor, and T. B. Illidge, in respect of their estate and interest as well in the lands and premises mentioned in the notice given to them by the said company as in the remaining part of the manufactory and premises known by the name of the Lambeth Starch Manufactory. The writ recited that J. H. Coward and Ellis Cancellor were lessees of the premises in question, and carried on the business of starch-manufacturers there in partnership with T. B. Illidge; that on the 14th of May 1846, the company being the promoters, according to "the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845," of the undertaking mentioned in the writ, gave a notice to the said J. H. Coward and E. Cancellor and all other persons whom it might concern, demanding the particulars of their estate and interest in such lands and premises and of the claims made by them in respect thereof, which notice stated the particulars of the lands and premises (a plan of which was annexed to it), and that the company were willing to treat for the purchase and as to the compensation to be made to the said parties for the damage by reason of the execution of their works; that the lands and premises specified in the notice were a part only of the said manufactory and premises called the Lambeth Starch Manufactory, and that the said J. H. Coward, E. Cancellor, and T. B. Illidge, were willing and able to sell their estate and interest in the whole of the manufactory and premises, whereof the company had notice on the 4th of June 1846, and within twenty-one days after the service of the said notice by them, and were then required to purchase the estate and interest of the said parties in the whole of the said manufactory and premises; that the said parties had not agreed as to the amount of compensation, the amount of which as claimed exceeded 50*l.* and amounted to 8,000*l.* for the purchase of the said estate and interest of the said J. H. Coward, E. Cancellor, and T. B. Illidge, in the said manufactory, and 35,000*l.* for damage sustained by them; and that the claimants had required the company to issue their warrant for a special jury, which they had neglected to do.

The return by the company stated that J. H. Coward and E. Cancellor were lessees of all the lands, &c. mentioned in the notice of the claimants of the 4th of June 1846, under a lease for a term expiring by effluxion of time on the 24th of June 1847, but that the said J. H. Coward, E. Cancellor, and T. B. Illidge were not at the date of the company's notice, nor at any time since, jointly interested in the said lands and premises for a greater estate or interest than as tenants from year to year; that the lands, &c. in the said writ mentioned, and which the company had been required to purchase, consisted of a dwelling-house, with offices attached thereto, and a counting-house, cart-sheds, stables, coach-house, several yards and sheds, two large gardens, a greenhouse, and premises formerly occupied as piggeries and slaughter-house, together with a building of one story used for the manufacture of starch, with a mill or engine-house and drying-room, and warehouses attached thereto; that both the said gardens, which constitute a large part of the said premises, were, at the date of the said notice, and thence hitherto, absolutely unused either as a manufactory or for any other purpose; that the said piggeries and greenhouse were, from disuse, in a state of extreme dilapidation and decay, and neither they nor the slaughter-house had been used in the manufacture of starch or any other manufacture, nor are they or any part of them essential or necessary to the carrying on of any manufacture. The return then set out the notice given by the company on the 14th of May 1846: which, after stating that the company required to purchase the messuages, &c. mentioned in the schedule thereto, and were ready and willing to treat for the purchase of all and any the estate of the claimants, J. H. Coward and E. Cancellor, therein, and as to the compensation to be made for the damage to be sustained by them, required from the claimants, and each and every of them, the particulars of their estate and interest in such messuages, and of the claims made by them, and each and every of them in respect thereof.

The schedule to the notice was as follows:—

No. on deposited Plan of the Work.	Owner or reputed Owner.	Lessee or reputed Lessee.	Present or late Occupier.	Description of Property.	Situation.
577	Thomas Lett and Mrs. Sarah Randall	Yourselves.	Yourselves.	So much of the Ground, Stabling, Coach-house, Factory, and Sheds as are coloured Red on the Plan hereunto annexed.	Princes Street, Vauxhall.

The return also set out the notice served on the company by the said J. H. Coward, E. Cancellor and T. B. Illidge on the 4th of June 1846, which stated that the said parties were able and willing to sell and convey to the said company all their estate and interest in the whole of those premises comprised in the schedule and plan annexed to the notice of the said company, as well so much of the said premises as was coloured red in the said plan, and which the said company required to purchase, as also all and singular the warehouses, &c., and other premises contained within the boundary line of the said plan, and described in the said plan; &c., which said several premises were part and parcel of the said first-mentioned premises in the said plan coloured red; and they made a claim of 8,000*l.* for the purchase-money of their estate and interest in the whole of the above-mentioned premises, and 35,000*l.* for damage. The return then proceeded to state that the company thereupon abandoned all intention of purchasing the estate of the said J. H. Coward, E. Cancellor, and T. B. Illidge (if any), or the said estate and interest of the said J. H. Coward, and E. Cancellor, in the said premises ; and that the whole of the said parties are still in peaceable possession of the whole of the said premises, and will so remain without any disturbance by the company until the expiration of their estate and interest therein.

The prosecutors traversed part of the return, and alleged that the said J. H. Coward, E. Cancellor, and T. B. Illidge were jointly interested in the lands and premises in the writ mentioned for a greater estate and interest than as tenants from year to year, and demurred to the residue. The grounds assigned for the demurrer were, that the return amounted to an argumentative traverse of the allegation in the writ, that the premises therein mentioned were all one whole manufactory and premises, called "The Lambeth Starch Manufactory"; and also that the return did not shew that the premises therein supposed to be not part of the said manufactory were not part of the lands and premises the particulars whereof were stated in the notice of the company of the 14th of May 1846, and which the company themselves required to purchase ; and for aught that appeared on the return, it might be that the additional premises which the said claimants required the company to take were part of the very building in which the manufacture of starch was carried on ; and that the return did not shew in what manner the company abandoned their intention of purchasing the estate and interest of the claimants, nor any consent by the claimants thereto, nor anything which would have legally exonerated the claimants from their liability to sell their estate and interest in the said lands and premises in the writ mentioned.

The company demurred to the plea on the ground that it tendered an immaterial issue, if the claimants did not intend to rely on some joint estate or interest in the said premises greater than a tenancy from year to year, as entitling them to compensation in respect of such joint estate or interest. That if the claimants relied on some joint estate or interest in all of them in the said lands and premises, as entitling them to compensation in respect thereof, the plea was bad, as not shewing what joint estate or interest in particular the said J. H. Coward, E. Cancellor, and T. B. Illidge claim to have in the said lands and premises, or in what respect it is a greater estate than a tenancy from year to year, or by what deed created, or how much of the same was unexpired at the time of giving the said notice by the company and the claimants respectively, or whether it was such an interest as entitled the claimants to have the compensation in respect thereof assessed by a jury ; and that the company were unable to traverse the legal effect of any deed, by virtue of which such joint estate or interest is claimed, or to traverse the title of the grantors, or to shew that the interest of the claimants was not such as entitled them to have the compensation in respect thereof assessed by a jury. That the plea is a departure from the writ, as in the writ compensation is claimed in respect of an unexpired term, under a lease of the 24th of June 1838, legally vested in J. H. Coward and E. Cancellor only, yet in the plea the compensation is claimed in respect of a joint estate or interest in the said J. H. Coward, E. Cancellor, and T. B. Illidge in the said lands and premises comprised in the said lease.

Martin (W. R. Cole with him), for the prosecutors (1), contended that the company having given notice of an intention to take part of the manufactory, were therefore compellable to take the whole. He also argued, that if the writ could not be sustained to the whole extent of its requirement, it might, at all events, go for that portion of the manufactory and premises in respect of which the company had given notice.

M. D. Hill (Burnie was with him), for the defendants, contended that the writ could not be supported, as there was nothing in sect. 92. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act which compelled a company to purchase the whole of any manufactory or building in respect of part of which they had given notice, though it enables the owner to refuse to sell less than the whole. And that a peremptory mandamus could not go for the part only which was specified in the company's notice, as there had been no default as to that which the company were always willing to purchase (2).

(1) Jan. 19 and 22, before Lord Denman, C.J. Patteson, J., Coleridge, J., and Wightman, J.

Judgment was now delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—[His Lordship stated the substance of the writ, the return, the plea, and the demurrers, and then proceeded]—The writ was objected to as bad, because it claims assessment for the value of the entire premises when the company have required a part only. The claim is founded on the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. But on examination of the sections which were supposed to give this right, namely, the 18th and 92nd, there is not the smallest pretence for an argument to that effect. Section 18. gives directions as to notice to be given by the company requiring lands, and provides that “every such notice shall state the particulars of the lands so required, and that the promoters of the undertaking are willing to treat for the purchase thereof, and as to the compensation to be made to all parties for the damage that may be sustained by them by reason of the execution of the works.” This had been done, as appears by the writ itself; and assuming, for the sake of the argument, that the prosecutor’s premises are one entire manufactory, the notice requires only a part. The other, section 93, enacts, “that no party shall at any time be required to sell or convey to the promoters of the undertaking a part only of any house or other building or manufactory if such party be willing and able to sell and convey the whole.” The writ states that the prosecutors were willing and able to sell and convey the whole, and gave notice, and required the company to take the whole. Now the 92nd section, though it protects the owners from being obliged to sell a part, does not contain any words making it obligatory on the company who only want a part, to take the whole, as some other acts of parliament do; and therefore the writ, which is founded entirely on such a supposed obligation on the part of the company, manifestly cannot be sustained. This simple point decides the case for the defendants, and shews that the writ must be quashed. We have to lament the waste of time that has occurred from the obscurity thrown about the case by the superfluous matter foisted into the record. The learned counsel for the prosecutors contended as a last resource that the mandamus might go for a part though it claims the whole. This is impossible for that reason, and also because no claim has ever been made in respect of a part.

(2) The following clauses of the act 8 Vict. c. 18. were relied on in the argument:—

Sect. 18. “When the promoters of the undertaking shall require to purchase or take any of the lands which by this or the special act, or any act incorporated therewith, they are authorized to purchase or take, they shall give notice thereof to all the parties interested in such lands, or to the parties enabled by this act to sell and convey or release the same, or such of the said parties as shall, after diligent inquiry, be known to the promoters of the undertaking, and by such notice shall demand from such parties the particulars of their estate and interest in such lands, and of the claims made by them in respect thereof; and every such notice shall state the particulars of the lands so required, and that the promoters of the undertaking are willing to treat for the purchase thereof, and as to the compensation to be made to all parties for the damage that may be sustained by them by reason of the execution of the works.”

Sect. 92. “And be it enacted, that no party shall, at any time, be required to sell or convey to the promoters of the undertaking a part only of any house or other building or manufactory, if any such party be willing and able to sell and convey the whole thereof.”

PARKE, B. now (June 19) delivered the judgment of the Court.—This case was argued before my Brothers Alderson, Rolfe, Platt, and Williams; my Brothers Cresswell and Coltman were here during part of the time, but gave no opinion. A writ of error has been brought on a judgment for the Crown, on a demurrer to a return to a writ of mandamus to admit W. H. Ashurst, an attorney of this court, an attorney of the mayor's court in the city of London. The question before us was, whether upon the facts admitted upon the demurrer to the return, the applicant, Mr. Ashurst, was entitled to be admitted, by virtue of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 78. s. 27, an attorney of the lord mayor's court, and whether the mandamus was in a correct form if he was so entitled. The Court have considered the very able arguments which were urged on both sides, and I believe are not entirely agreed in the view taken of the principal point which was under discussion, that is, whether the Court of Queen's Bench were right or not in the opinion they formed upon the construction of this act. But then a further question arose, whether the mandamus in its present form is sustainable, and we all agree that it is not. The objection to it is, that it does not state that the lord mayor's court is an inferior court of law, but only an inferior court, and it is only to inferior courts of law that attorneys of the superior courts of law are entitled to be admitted. The mandamus does not shew any obligation to admit to this court. This objection is fatal, unless the return, which admits it to be a court of law, cures the defect. On a plea, an admission of that nature would have that effect, though the plea should be bad; but it was argued, that in a mandamus the judgment is, that the return be quashed: and if that be the case, it is the same as if no return were made. The judgment in this case is, however, not that the return is to be quashed, but that it is invalid in law; but a peremptory mandamus is always awarded, and that form being used it must be the same as the one originally awarded, otherwise the defendant would have a right to make a new return to it. The peremptory mandamus would, therefore, upon the face of it be equally bad, and derives no benefit from the admission in the previous return. We think, therefore, no peremptory mandamus ought to go in the present form; and, consequently, the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench awarding such mandamus ought to be reversed. It is now perfectly settled law that after the return to a mandamus objections may be taken to the form of the writ—The King v. the Margate Pier Company (1) and The Queen v. Powell (2). The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench must be reversed upon this ground. This matter does not appear to have been considered in the Queen's Bench at all.

An overseer is not compellable to grant a certificate that a person is the real resident holder and occupier of a house under the provisions of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61.

To a mandamus commanding the overseer to give such certificate to T. H., he returned that he had no evidence that T. H. was the real resident holder and occupier, and that he had reason to believe that T. H. was not the real resident holder, &c., because he was rated jointly with T. D. To this return there was a plea, that when the certificate was demanded, the defendant (the overseer) well knew that T. H. was the real holder and occupier. The jury having found a verdict for the Crown:—Held, on motion for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment, first, that the defendant could not be made responsible on the facts as they appeared on the pleadings, if he judged wrong but honestly; secondly, that, at all events, the judgment ought to be arrested for the insufficiency of the writ.

Mandamus tested the 8th of May 1845, to F. Kensington and J. Forster, the overseers of the parish of St. Andrew Hubbard, in the city of London, reciting that T. J. S. Hamper, for some time past, viz. since the month of September 1844, had been and still was the real resident holder and occupier of a dwelling-house, situate in the parish of St. Andrew Hubbard aforesaid, in the said city of London, being No. 19, Eastcheap, in the said parish, and that the said dwelling-house, with the premises occupied by the said T. Hamper therewith, whereof the said Thomas Hamper, during all the time aforesaid, hath been and is such real resident holder and occupier as aforesaid, were during all the time aforesaid, and still are rated to and in the name of the said Thomas Hamper in one sum, to the rate for the relief of the poor of the said parish, on a rent or annual value of 40*l.* per annum. The writ averred, that F. Kensington and J. Forster had been all the time aforesaid, and still were, overseers of the said parish; that the said T. Hamper had oftentimes since he became and whilst he was such real resident holder and occupier, &c., and whilst the said dwelling-house and premises were so rated as aforesaid, demanded of them and each of them, as and whilst they were such overseers, &c., a certificate in writing from one of them, as such overseers, certifying that he, the said Thomas Hamper, is the real resident holder and occupier of the dwelling-house and premises aforesaid, and also certifying the true rent or annual value at which the said dwelling-house, with the premises occupied therewith, is rated in one rating to the poor's rate, according to the last sum or rate made and allowed in the said parish for the relief of the poor, according to the form of the statute, &c., in order and for the purpose that he, the said T. Hamper, might apply for and obtain a licence to sell beer and cider by retail, to be drunk and consumed on his said premises, and that the said F. Kensington and J. Forster had wholly refused to give such certificate. The writ then commanded them that they or one of them should give to the said T. Hamper a certificate in writing, certifying, &c., according to the form and effect of the said statute, or shew cause to the contrary.

Return by F. Kensington, (30th of May 1845,) that he did not know, nor had the within-named T. Hamper, or any other person at any time furnished him with evidence that the said T. Hamper is the real resident holder and occupier of the within-mentioned dwelling-house and premises, situate at No. 19, Eastcheap, in the parish of St. Andrew Hubbard, in the city of London, and that he had reason to believe that the said T. Hamper is not the real resident holder and occupier of the said dwelling-house and premises, within the true intent and meaning of the within-mentioned statute, for that in and by the last rate made and allowed in and for the said parish for the relief of the poor thereof the said dwelling-house and premises are rated to and in the names of one Isaac Day and the said T. Hamper, and not in the name of the said T. Hamper alone; that the words "Day, carman, 19, Basteheap," are conspicuously placed in three several places on the outside of the dwelling-house; that the name of the said T. Hamper does not appear on the said dwelling-house, wherefore, &c.

Return by T. Foster, "that I am not nor was I on the 8th of May 1845, being the teste of the within writ, nor have I at any time from the teste of the said writ hitherto been an overseer of the said parish of St. Andrew Hubbard, in the city of London, as by the said writ is supposed, wherefore it does not appertain to me to give to T. Hamper within named the certificate within mentioned, as by the said writ I am commanded."

Plea, that the said F. Kensington did at the said several times when the said certificate was demanded of him by the said T. Hamper as in the said writ mentioned, well know and was furnished with sufficient evidence; to wit, by the said T. Hamper, that he, the said T. Hamper, was during all the said time in the said writ in that behalf mentioned the real resident holder and occupier of the said dwelling-house and premises, situate, &c. within the true intent, &c., modo et forma. Issue thereon.

At the trial, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the Sittings in London, after Michaelmas term, 1845, it appeared, that in 1843 one Isaac Day being the owner of the premises in question, demised them to Hamper at a yearly rent of 70*l*. for the purpose of his establishing a beer-shop, but that certain baskets and other property belonging to Day were kept in one of the rooms over which his name was painted, and he had also a counting-house on the premises, of which he had the exclusive use.

It was objected that it ought to have been proved that T. Hamper was the sole resident owner of the premises, and also that the statute did not make it imperative on the overseer to give a certificate.

The Lord Chief Justice directed the jury, that if Hamper who paid an entire rent for the premises had a bonâ fide intention to occupy them, he was the resident owner within the meaning of the statute, and that he might at any time have withdrawn permission from Day to occupy a part, and that it was not necessary that the person applying for a certificate should be the occupier of the whole house, and he left it to them to say, first, whether the prosecutor was bonâ fide the owner and occupier of the premises at the time he applied for the certificate; secondly, whether the defendant Kensington knew it. The jury having returned a verdict for the Crown,

Whitehurst, in the following Hilary term, obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, or to arrest the judgment on the ground of the insufficiency of the writ, or for judgment for the defendant Kensington non obstante veredicto.

Cockburn and E. James shewed cause. —First, as to the question of misdirection, which goes to the fact, whether or not Hamper was the real resident holder and occupier within the meaning of the statute; he was the tenant of the whole premises and paid the entire rent. If a burglary had been committed on the premises, the dwelling-house must have been laid in the indictment as the dwelling-house of Hamper, as the permission to Day to occupy it was confined to the daytime. The occupation of Hamper would have been sufficient, even if the act of parliament had used the words "sole occupier"; but it is sufficient if his occupation is such as would render him liable for use and occupation. Secondly, the overseer is compellable by mandamus to grant the certificate. There is no penalty provided by the statute for refusing to grant a certificate as to the holding and occupying, though by the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 85. s. 8. a penalty is imposed on persons granting or making use of any false certificate; and by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61. s. 5 (1), an overseer refusing to certify as to

(1) 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61. s. 2. enacts, "That every person who shall apply to be licensed to retail beer or cider shall produce to the proper officer of Excise authorized to grant such licences a certificate in writing from an overseer of the township, parish, or place in which he shall reside, certifying that such applicant is the real resident holder and occupier of the said house, and also certifying the true rent or annual value at which such house, with the premises occupied therewith, is rated in one rating to the poor-rates, according to the last sum or rate made and allowed in such township, parish, or place for the relief of the poor; and every such certificate shall be deposited and left with the proper officer of Excise by whom such licence shall be the rating, subjects the overseer to a penalty. Lastly, it is contended that the issue raised is immaterial, as the plea alleges that Kensington knew that Hamper was the real resident occupier at the time the certificate was applied for, whilst the return states that in the last poor-rate he was rated jointly with Day, and assigns that as a reason for the defendant's belief that Hamper was not the real resident occupier; but the plea raises the true question, namely, whether when the defendant refused the certificate he knew that Hamper was entitled to it—The King v. Round (2). The immaterial averment was put on the record by the defendant himself, and he cannot have judgment non obstante veredicto—Round v. Vaughan (3). The overseer is not to be the judge whether he will grant a certificate or not.

Whitehurst and J. Henderson, contra.—Day let all but one room to Hamper, and the latter could not, therefore, be called the real occupier of the whole house. When the object as well as the nature of the provisions of the acts regulating the sale of beer are considered, it is obvious that the person applying for a licence should have the exclusive controul of the premises. A certificate was first required by the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 85. (which was passed to amend the 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 64.) That act provided that a person applying for a licence should produce the certificate of six inhabitants as to his character, as well as the certificate of the overseer. The 3 & 4 granted; and a duplicate thereof shall be deposited and left with the clerk of the peace for the county, riding, or city within which such township, parish, or place is situate."

Sect. 5. enacts, "That every overseer of the poor who shall refuse to grant a certificate of the rating or assessment of any rated house and premises, when demanded, or of any person having claimed to be rated in respect of any newly-erected house not yet rated, or who shall falsely certify any house to be rated, when the same was not duly rated at the time of the making and allowance of the last rate made and allowed for the relief of the poor, and every overseer or other person who shall falsely certify any person to be the real resident holder and occupier of any house contrary to the fact, or falsely certify the rent or annual value at which any dwelling-house and premises shall now or will be rated, or shall grant any certificate which shall in any other respect be wilfully false, shall forfeit 20*l*."

(2) 4 Ad. & El. 139.

(3) 1 Bing. N.C. 767; s.c. 4 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 239.

Vict. c. 61. further provides that the person applying for a licence shall be the real occupier.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—I put it to the jury to say whether Hamper was substantially the occupier.]

[WIGHTMAN, J.—He might be so, though he let off a part.]

Day was not a mere lodger, but he had reserved to himself the exclusive occupation of a portion of the premises. If Hamper is the real occupier here, he would be equally so though Day had reserved more than half of the rooms in the house. Soldiers might be billeted over the whole house, and it might be visited by the police at all hours. Hamper was not an occupier within the Settlement Acts—The King v. the Inhabitants of Tonbridge (4), The King v. the Inhabitants of St. Nicholas, Rochester (5), The King v. the Inhabitants of St. Nicholas, Colchester (6). The issue found is also immaterial; the defendant tendered an issue, and the prosecutor, if he objected to it, should have demurred; but if he did not demur, he was bound to traverse in the terms in which it is alleged. It would have been a good return to shew that at the time of making it the prosecutor was not in a situation to apply for a certificate or the overseer to grant it—The King v. Round, The King v. Payn (7), The Queen v. Hopkins (8). The return also shews good grounds for a belief by the overseer that Hamper was not the occupier within the meaning of the statute. If what he states is true—and it is not denied—he would incur a penalty under sect. 5. by certifying, as the certificate would, in his belief, be false. Besides, there being a good return on the record, which is neither traversed nor avoided, the defendant is entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto—The Queen v. the Governors of Darlington School (9). The most important question, and which is raised by the motion in arrest of judgment, is, whether the overseers are bound to certify in any case. The granting of a certificate is matter of discretion. If it were maliciously withheld perhaps an action would lie, but the Court will not interfere by mandamus. In extra-parochial places two inhabitant householders are empowered to certify—(s. 4.) If the overseer is compellable to certify in this case, such householders would be so also.

The judgment of the Court (11) was subsequently (July 1) delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This was a mandamus to two overseers of the parish of St. Andrew Hubbard, to certify that the prosecutor was the real resident occupier of a house within his parish, in order to his obtaining a victualler's licence. The return led to various issues, which were tried at Guildhall. A rule for a new trial has been obtained for misdirection.

At the trial of the issues that grew out of the return of Kensington, stating that he did not know, and was furnished with no evidence, that Hamper, the prosecutor, was the real resident holder and occupier of the house in question, and that he had reason to believe that Hamper was not the real resident holder and occupier thereof, within the true intent and meaning of the statute, for that, in the poor-rate, the said house is rated in the joint names of one Isaac Day and Hamper, and for that the words "Day, carman, 19, Eastcheap," are conspicuously placed in several places on the outside of the said house, and the name of "Hamper" does not appear on the said house, "wherefore I am not able to give the certificate within mentioned, as in the writ I am commanded;"—the facts here stated were proved; and further, that the prosecutor had let off part of his house to Day, who had the entire controul of that part, and carried on his trade there; and then the counsel for Kensington contended, that Hamper clearly was not the real resident occupier within the act, which requires the victualler to have the exclusive possession of his own house at all hours, in order to give opportunity for the exercise of the power of visitation, which it confers on the police and magistrates. Accordingly, he complained of misdirection on my part, in telling the jury to consider whether the prosecutor was the substantial occupier under the circumstances proved. The jury found that he was such occupier.

But, supposing that ruling and the verdict were right, there was an issue in the terms of the plea, whether the defendant knew the prosecutor to be the true resident occupier of the house. If he is to be considered such upon the facts stated upon the true construction of the law, it does not follow that the defendant believed the evidence of those facts, and much less that he drew that inference. If he judged wrong, but honestly, can he be made responsible, as knowing the contrary of what he thought?

These observations, joined to a careful examination of the several acts, lead us to doubt seriously whether the overseer is compellable to certify. The licence required by the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 85. is not to be granted to any person without the certificate of six rated inhabitants, and one overseer, who is bound under a penalty to certify that those six are rated, if such be the fact; but the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, deeming it advisable to amend that law, provides that no such licence shall be granted to any but the real resident occupier of a house, paying a certain rent, and producing the certificate of an overseer of the parish that he is the real resident occupier of his house. Now, as the six rated inhabitants had clearly an option to grant or withhold their certificate, it is argued that the overseer applied to was intended to have the like discretion. This notion is strengthened, by observing, that whereas the former act required a certificate of rating, which must be known officially to the overseer, and imposed a penalty for refusing it, the present act requires a certificate of facts which the overseer has no special means of knowing, and no means of compelling witnesses to attend to prove, and which are, in some respects, matter of opinion; and he is subject to no penalty for refusing. These considerations have induced the Court to think the act does not compel the overseer to grant the certificate; and if so, the judgment ought to be arrested for the insufficiency of the writ.

(11) Lord Denman, C.J., Patteson, J., Coleridge, J. and Wightman, J.

The other defendant merely returned that he was not in office at the time of the date of the said writ; and that return does not appear to have been further noticed in the pleadings.

Compensation—Battersea Park—9 & 10 Vict. c. 38.—Prohibition.

Under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 38. (being the Act for making Battersea Park) the Commissioners of Woods and Forests gave notice to C. that they required three pieces of land, described in the schedule to the act as the property and in the occupation of C. There being a dispute as to the amount of compensation, the commissioners, under section 23, issued their warrant for summoning a jury to ascertain what recompence should be made to C. for the value of the lands, &c. therein mentioned (describing them fully as in the schedule), and of the estate and interest of the said C. therein. By section 27. the jury are to assess the value of the fee simple, and then to apportion *the values of respective interests therein; and by section 45. persons in possession are to be deemed entitled until the contrary is shewn. At the trial the claimant called several witnesses to the value of the land, who assessed it at 7,000*l.* On the part of the commissioners no witness was called; but an adverse right to part of the land in question was set up, as existing either in the Crown or the city of London, because it was situated between high and low water marks of the river Thames. The jury were directed to estimate not simply the value of the land taken and described in the notice and warrant, but the value of the land and of the claimant's estate and interest in it with reference to the question of his title to the part to which it was suggested he was not entitled. The jury, under these circumstances, gave their verdict for 750*l., which was the proved value of the residue only of the land:—Held, that the duty of the jury was only to estimate the value of the property taken, and the estate and interest, if it appeared to be divided among several persons; and that they had no power to decide whether the title was in the claimant; and a prohibition to restrain the recording of the verdict was granted.

Montagu Chambers had, in a former term, obtained a rule, calling upon the sheriff of Surrey and the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to restrain them from entering and recording the assessment and verdict of the jury, in the matter of the compensation of Charles Chabot, for three pieces of land taken to form Battersea Park, under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 38, and numbered respectively 63, 64, and 78. in the schedule thereto, and the judgment thereon, and from further proceeding for the purpose of using, acting upon, or enforcing, or otherwise making available the same assessment, verdict, or judgment.

The facts upon which the rule was founded were as follows:—In 1835 Mr. Chabot purchased from Earl Spencer the fee simple of the pieces of land in question, for the sum of 120*l.* The land so purchased consisted of 2 acres 1 rood 38 perches, abutting on the Thames, with a river frontage of 520 feet, and of a strip of meadow land, running inland from the other land, and containing 2 roods 12 perches. Mr. Chabot had been from that time in the occupation of all the said land, and no claim had been ever made thereto by any other person. On the part abutting on the river, Mr. Chabot had deposited large quantities of earth and rubbish for the purpose of converting it into a wharf. In October 1846 the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests gave Mr. Chabot notice of their intention to take for the purposes of the above-mentioned act the land in question, and required him to state the particulars of the estate, share, interest, or charge which he claimed to be entitled to, or authorized to receive satisfaction for, in respect of the said land: Mr. Chabot, accordingly, sent in a claim of a sum of 10,212*l.* for his land, containing 3 acres 10 perches, stating that the whole was freehold and in his own possession. The commissioners having declined to give the sum so claimed, on the 3rd of November 1847 made Mr. Chabot the offer of a nominal sum, and on the 16th of the same month, in pursuance of section 28. of the act, issued their precept to the sheriff of Surrey, directing him to impanel a jury for the purpose of inquiring into and ascertaining what recompence should be made to Mr. Chabot for the value of the lands, &c. therein mentioned, and of the estate and interest of the said C. Chabot therein, that is to say, [describing the parcels as in the schedule to the act, and stating them to contain 3 acres and 10 perches, and as all in the occupation of the claimant,] and to assess the sum of money to be paid to him for the purchase of such lands, &c., or of such his estate and interest therein, and also for any injury or damage whatsoever, that might affect the said C. Chabot, or which he might sustain for or on account of the taking of such lands, &c. for the purposes of the act. Notice of the inquiry was duly given to the claimant, and used the same terms as those in the precept.

At the trial, before the assessor to the sheriff of Surrey, the claimant examined several witnesses to the value of the land, who assessed it at various sums, from 7,117*l.* upwards. The claimant's purchase from Lord Spencer was also proved. The Attorney General, who appeared as counsel for the commissioners, called no witnesses, nor did he attempt to disprove the value as proved by the claimant, but set up a claim to the portions numbered 63. and 64. as belonging to the Crown, and contended that the soil thereof being situate between high and low water mark, belonged either to the Crown or to the corporation of the city of London, and not to Mr. Chabot, and referred to the preamble of the act, with regard to the disputed rights of the Crown and City, and shewing that Mr. Chabot had bought a doubtful title. The Recorder, who was also of counsel for the commissioners, confirmed the Attorney General's argument, by stating, from his own knowledge, that the corporation claimed the land in question as part of the soil between high and low water. The assessor told the jury that there appeared to him to be some little difficulty as to that part between the embankment and the river, and that when a question turned on such a nice point he regretted that there was no further evidence; and further stated, that if the said land was within the high water mark, the claimant had no right to use it as a wharf. The foreman of the jury thereupon asked, if the depositing of the soil made any difference in point of law, to which the assessor said, I think not. The portion of the land claimed by the Attorney General for the Crown or the corporation contained 2 acres 1 rood 10 perches, which would leave as the property of the claimant 3 roods only, instead of 3 acres 10 perches, the quantity described in the precept as that for which the jury were to assess compensation. No notice had been given to the claimant that his title to the whole of the land mentioned in the precept would be questioned, and he was consequently unprepared with evidence to meet the claim made by the Attorney General. The assessor directed the jury to find the value of the said lands, &c., and of the estate and interest of Mr. Chabot therein, and the jury therefore gave a verdict for 750*l.* only. In the evidence given by the claimant the surveyor had estimated the piece of land running inland from the dock at the value of 743*l.* 15*s.*, so that the verdict was consistent with the jury having given compensation for that portion only, excluding from their consideration the value of the piece of land abutting on the Thames. Immediately on the verdict being pronounced, the counsel for the claimant objected that the jury ought to find separately, first, the value of the land as described in the precept; and secondly, the value of the claimant's estate and interest therein, with which the assessor refused to comply. The assessor was then requested to ask the jury whether they had considered in their verdict that the Crown had any interest in the soil so claimed as part of the Thames, which he also refused to do.

Sir J. Jervis (Attorney General) and Welsby shewed cause (1).—First, prohibition will not lie to the sheriff, who acts merely ministerially in such a case as this.

[PATTESON, J. referred to section 30. directing the verdict to be recorded by the clerk of the peace.]

Then there has been no excess of jurisdiction. All the proceedings were regular, and the question was properly left to the jury. It would produce infinite mischief if every disappointed claimant were to apply for a prohibition. They referred to Com. Dig. 'Prohibition,' (A).

Lush (Montagu Chambers was with him), in support of the rule.—First, prohibition will lie, as the sheriff sits in a judicial capacity. Prohibitions have been issued to Commissioners of Excise, to courts-martial, to Justices at petty sessions, if they have exceeded their jurisdiction.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—Is there excess of jurisdiction here?]

Yes; the jury are to inquire what is the value of the land, or if the claim made be for less than the fee, what is the value of the claimant's interest. The jury have no right to inquire whether the claimant can make a good title. The warrant to the sheriff is radically defective.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—You are too late to raise that objection; you should have applied on the issuing of the warrant.]

Doe d. Hutchinson v. the Manchester, Bury and Rossendale Railway Company (2) is directly in point. Looking to this act of parliament, the presumption is, that the claimant being in possession has the interest which he claimed. The onus of rebutting that presumption lies on the commissioners. Here the verdict of the jury was plainly founded both on the value of the land and of the claimant's interest therein. The commissioners are estopped from saying that this is Crown land, as they treat with the claimant for the purchase of it, and describe it in their notice as being his. The Queen v. the Sheffield and Manchester Railway Company (3) decides that this Court will interfere to stay the entry of the verdict.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—Is a certiorari taken away by this act?]

On moving for the rule the Court intimated that a certiorari was not the proper course. Besides, that could only issue for a defect apparent on the face of the proceedings, which does not exist here.

[The Attorney General referred to The Queen v. Bolton (4), as shewing that affidavits might be used to shew want of jurisdiction.]

[PATTESON, J.—That only applies to a total want of jurisdiction. Here there is a general jurisdiction over the subject; the complaint is, that the jurisdiction is exceeded.]

The judgment was now delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—The Commissioners of Woods and Forests having required certain property of Mr. Charles Chabot, for Battersea Park, which they are empowered by act of parliament to form, and having disagreed with him as to the amount of his compensation, issued their warrant for summoning a jury before a sheriff, to determine its value. The property consisted of three pieces of land, numbered 63, 64, and 78. in the schedule to the act, and there described as the property and in the occupation of Mr. Charles Chabot. The claim was for the same three parcels, with their several dimensions; the warrant summoned the jury "to ascertain what recompence and satisfaction shall be made to Charles Chabot for the value of the lands, tenements and hereditaments hereinafter mentioned, and of the estate and interest of the said Charles Chabot therein;" and then fully described the three parcels scheduled. The notice of trial used the same language, which must also be presumed to have formed part of the oath of the jury. The claimant called numerous witnesses to the value of his land, none of whom rated it lower than 7,800*l*. On the part of the commissioners no witness was called, and the jury found a verdict for 750*l*. The matter is brought before this Court on a complaint that the jury were directed to estimate, not the value of the land taken and described, but the value of the land, and of the claimant's estate and interest in it, with an intimation that he was not, or might not be entitled to the fee simple or to the land itself, because, being land between high and low water marks, it belonged either to the Crown by virtue of its prerogative, or to the city of London, as conservators of the River Thames in that part: and those parties were said to be contending in Chancery for the land so situated, comprehending, though not specifying Nos. 63. and 64. The jury having been pressed by this argument, pronounced the verdict, "Under all the circumstances of the case, we find our verdict for 750*l*." The circumstances thus alluded to were the doubts whether the claimant could make a perfect title to the property. The claimant's counsel repeatedly urged the learned assessor to ask, whether they awarded the full value of the property as belonging to him, but it was not thought right to permit them, though willing, to answer that question. The assessor appears to have thought he was bound to direct the verdict to be given conjointly for the value of the tenements and the claimant's estate and interest, or rather for that value reduced by so much estate and interest as any other person possessed adverse to the claimant.

Now, they had no materials for making that reduction, or deciding whether the Crown or the city had the whole estate and interest in the premises, or none at all. They must have made a rough guess at the depreciation that any doubt thrown on the title might produce. But the duty of the jury was to estimate the value of the property taken, and the estate and interest as it appears to be divided among several persons, the person in possession being deemed entitled to the whole interest until the contrary be shewn (sec. 45), and the case of doubtful titles being provided for

(sec. 44,) quite independently of the jury's assessment. Perhaps the commissioners are estopped from denying Charles Chabot's ownership after their own act had affirmed it, and the title by purchase from Lord Spencer was fully proved, subject only to the question, whether there was not elsewhere a title paramount either in the Crown or the City. The jury, therefore, have manifestly taken into their account of compensation the estate and interest of Charles Chabot in the property in some sense inconsistent with a valuation of the three parcels of land which alone they were sworn to make; and as their verdict is to be recorded and deposited with the clerk of the peace (sec. 30), and is made final, binding and conclusive (sec. 23), the claimant is well warranted in asking for our writ of prohibition against those further proceedings which would have the effect of binding his interests for ever.

Pleading—Payment—Satisfaction of Debt and Costs.

Where after action brought the debt is paid and accepted in satisfaction, and costs are offered but refused, the damage is merely nominal independently of the costs, and the plaintiff therefore cannot proceed for the costs.

To an action on a cheque for 25l. there was a plea of payment of 60l., after action brought, in satisfaction of the debt, damages, and costs. It was proved that after action brought the defendant paid the amount of the cheque, and offered to pay any costs, which offer the plaintiff refused, saying that he would pay them himself:—Held, that the defendant was entitled to a verdict on the plea.

Assumpsit on a banker's cheque for 25l., dated the 25th of June 1845, payable to bearer, drawn by the defendant.

Plea—that the defendant, after the commencement of the suit, paid the plaintiff, and the plaintiff accepted a large sum, to wit, 60l. in satisfaction of the promise and damages, and of the costs then incurred.

Replication, traversing payment and acceptance.

It appeared at the trial, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the Sittings in London after Michaelmas term, 1846, that the cheque having been dishonoured, a writ was issued on the 28th of June at the suit of the plaintiff, and that the defendant being ignorant of that fact, afterwards called on him and paid the 25l. and offered him 1l. to pay any expenses. This the plaintiff refused, saying that whatever the expenses were, he would settle them himself. The jury, under the learned Judge's direction, returned a verdict for the defendant; leave being reserved for the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for nominal damages. A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly, or for a new trial,

Lush shewed cause (Dec. 6, 1847).—The real question is, whether it is not competent to a plaintiff, after action brought, to forego the costs; and whether he is not bound by an agreement to do so. This is not like an agreement to pay a less sum in satisfaction of a larger, which might be perhaps contended to be void—Cumber v. Wane (1). At the time the 25l. was paid, neither party was aware of the amount of the costs; and the money was intended to be paid, to avoid dispute. In Sibree v. Tripp (2), the law laid down in Cumber v. Wane was much considered. That law is not to be extended to the case of a claim for nominal damages after payment of the full amount of the actual debt—Beaumont v. Greathead (3), Horner v. Denham (4).

[PATTESON, J.—On the face of the pleadings it would appear that more has been paid than was due.]

Yes: the plaintiff does not seek to enter judgment non obstante veredicto. In Wilkinson v. Byers (5) it was held that a cross action might be maintained on an agreement to take a fixed sum, and give up the costs after action brought for an unliquidated demand. And an agreement to take a specified sum when the result of a suit is doubtful, is a good consideration for a promise to pay that sum—Longridge v. Dorville (6).

Simons, contra. — First, the plea was not proved, as the 25l. was not paid in satisfaction of the debt, damages, and costs. Nothing was said about the costs at the time of the payment. Secondly, the agreement, if it had been proved, would not have been binding. This was not a case of liquidated damages, but a debt certain, and there was no consideration, as in Wilkinson v. Byers, for giving up the costs. The plaintiff is entitled to a verdict for nominal damages—Down v. Hatcher (7), Wright v. Acres (8). (He then offered to enter a stet processus, on which the Court suspended their judgment.)

LORD DENMAN, C.J. subsequently (July 12) delivered the judgment of the Court (9). —This was an action upon a cheque for 25l. Plea, payment of 60l. in satisfaction of debt, damages, and costs, after action brought. It appeared by the evidence that the defendant, after the action was commenced, paid the debt, 25*l.*, and offered 1*l.* for any expenses, which the plaintiff refused, saying that he would pay the expenses himself. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, liberty being reserved for the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him, with nominal damages, if the Court should be of opinion that, notwithstanding the acceptance by the plaintiff of 25*l.* in satisfaction of the debt, damages, and costs, he was entitled to the verdict upon the pleadings.

We are of opinion that the verdict is right, and that the plea was substantially proved. The debt was paid and accepted, and the damage was merely nominal, independently of the costs. The case of Beaumont v. Greathead is an authority to shew that after acceptance of the debt in satisfaction, the plaintiff cannot proceed for nominal damages; and, as he would not be entitled to proceed for costs only, independently of some damage, we think that the verdict for the defendant is sustainable, and that the rule must be discharged.

Mandamus—Crown—Commissioners of Woods and Forests—Notice to take Lands—Compensation—9 & 10 Vict. c. 38.

By the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 38. the Commissioners of Woods and Forests are authorized to treat for and purchase lands for the purpose of forming Battersea Park. Where notice of their intention to take lands had been given, but there had been no actual taking,—Held, that a mandamus would lie to compel the Commissioners to issue their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury to assess compensation.

The fact of the Commissioners having no funds is matter of return to the mandamus.

This was a rule, which had been obtained, calling upon the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue directed to them, commanding them to issue their warrant to the sheriff of Surrey for the purpose of summoning a jury to assess compensation to Mr. Budge, under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 38, for land required by the Commissioners for the purpose of forming Battersea Park. The affidavits on which the rule was founded were not material to the only point on which a decision was given.

*Sir J. Jervis (Attorney General) and Welsby shewed cause (1).—A mandamus will not lie to the Crown, as must be the case if this rule be made absolute. In the case of Carmichael Smith—The Queen v. the Lords of the Treasury (2), there was a specific appropriation of money, which does not occur here. A mandamus has been refused in the case of a copyholder of a royal manor applying for admission, though he had an inchoate right of property, and the manor was vested in the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and not immediately in the Sovereign—The Queen v. the Steward of the Manor of Richmond (3). pensation will only lie where a bill for specific performance could be sustained in case the value were agreed upon—The Queen v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (4). By this act the Commissioners have five years within which they may take this land, and there is nothing to shew that they will not do all that is required within that time. Section 15. requires them to give six months' notice of their intention to take lands, and they have never taken possession.

[COLERIDGE, J.—That cannot prevent a mandamus issuing to them after the six months.]

Sir F. Thesiger, in support of the rule.—If a mandamus does not lie in such a case as the present, the only remedy will be by monstrans de droit, or a petition of right, to which the Court will be reluctant to drive a party. This is a duty cast on the Commissioners by the statute, which contemplates suits being brought against them. Then, assuming that the writ is not objectionable on this ground, it will lie, as the effect of the notice and subsequent proceedings is to create a contract in equity between the owner and the Commissioners, who are by section 19. authorized to treat for the purchase of lands. On this ground, therefore, the mandamus will lie—The King v. the Hungerford Market Company (5), Doo v. the London and Croydon Railway Company (6), Stone v. the Commercial Railway Company (7), and it is immaterial, so far as the right to the writ is concerned, whether the Commissioners have funds or not.

Cur. ado. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—In this case cause was shewn against a mandamus to issue a warrant for assessing compensation under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 38. for land, which being in their schedule, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have given notice to take towards forming Battersea Park, that this writ lies not: first, because it would be directly addressed to Her Majesty, and could not be enforced. But we think that this is otherwise, and that the Commissioners are public officers invested with public duties, which may affect the rights of private persons; but not without making just compensation to them, which it describes the proper means of enforcing. The Queen v. the Steward of Richmond Manor was quoted. In that case it was objected that the Queen was not lady of the manor, which vested in the Commissioners of Woods and Forests; and we thought it was so vested only for the purpose of management, the property being still in Her Majesty, and that, consequently, the writ would have been addressed to her individually, which could not be. The second objection, that the Commissioners had not actually taken possession of the prosecutor's land, but had done no more than serve him with a notice of intention so to do, we think untenable, having often held, agreeably to the justice of the case, that this notice, which prevents the owner from doing what he pleases with his own land, is equivalent to an actual taking, and entitles him to compensation.

The other matters urged against the rule are to be returned to the mandamus if available. The rule is for a mandamus to take steps for assessing the amount of compensation, not to pay it.

WHITAKER v. HARROLD.

A declaration in covenant for rent set out an indenture of the year 1820, by which, after the recital of a mortgage deed of 1818, containing an assignment by Y. of certain premises to J. E. S, for the residue of a term of 5,000 years, subject to redemption on payment by Y. to J. E. S. of 1,200*l.*, with interest, J. E. S. demised the premises to R. L. for a term at the request of Y, he, the said R. L. covenanting for himself, his assigns, &c., to pay the rent during the term demised, and the continuance of the recited mortgage to J. E. S, and after payment and satisfaction of the mortgage to Y, his executors, &c. It was then stated that in 1821 J. E. S. assigned to G. H. S, subject to R. L.'s lease; and that G. H. S. assigned one moiety to the plaintiff on the 15th of December 1843, and the other on the 18th of February 1835; that R. L.'s term became vested in the defendant, and that after the defendant became possessed of the residue of such term (to wit), on the 25th of March 1844, two years' rent became in arrear to the plaintiff.

Plea, that before the rent became due J. E. S. was paid and satisfied the principal and interest due on the mortgage out of monies arising from the sale of part of the premises; and that J. E. S. by indenture acknowledged the payment out of such monies, and released Y. from all claims, &c. —On special demurrer the Court of Queen's Bench held the plea bad for duplicity, and the declaration good.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber affirmed the judgment, and held that the plea was bad for duplicity; and also for not sufficiently shewing that the mortgage debt was discharged, and the estate exonerated.

Also that the covenant in the declaration to pay Y, &c. until payment and satisfaction of the mortgage ran with the land, and did not become a covenant in gross till the happening of the event. That the payment of the mortgage money was a condition in defeasance, which ought to have been pleaded by the defendant; that it sufficiently appeared in the declaration that the rent became due after the assignments to the plaintiff, because on demurrer the dates of the assignments must be taken to be true, and that on the 25th of March 1844 the plaintiff was entitled to half a year's entire rent, and a moiety of the other year and a half year's rent; and that the Court below having power to assess the damages, the declaration was good.

Error from the Court of Queen's Bench.

Covenant. The declaration (which is stated at length in the report of Harrold v. Whitaker (1)) was for the recovery of two years' rent of 18*l.* 18*s.* per year, amounting to 37*l.* 16*s.*, which rent was reserved by an indenture of demise, dated the 17th of August 1820, made between Benjamin Yeoman of the first part, and James Eyre Salmon of the second part, and Robert Lee of the third part, and which indenture recited an indenture of assignment and mortgage, dated the 5th of August 1818, and made between Yeoman of the first part, certain persons therein named of the second and third parts, and the said J. E. Salmon of the fourth part, whereby the premises therein mentioned to have been demised were amongst other premises assigned to the said J. E. Salmon, his executors, administrators and assigns, for the residue of a term of 5,000 years, mentioned to have been created as therein set forth, subject to redemption on payment by the said B. Yeoman to the said J. E. Salmon of 1,200*l.*, with interest; and after such recital the said Salmon by such indenture did at the request of Yeoman lease and demise the premises therein described, for the term therein mentioned, to the said Robert Lee, he, the said Robert Lee, yielding and paying during the term demised, and during the continuance of the recited mortgage, to the said Salmon, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and after payment and satisfaction of the said mortgage, unto the said Yeoman, his executors, &c., the yearly rent of 18*l.* 18*s.*, by equal portions quarterly, as therein mentioned ; and in which indenture of demise was contained a covenant on the part of the lessee, the said Robert Lee, to pay the said rent in manner as the same was reserved and made payable by the said indenture ; and the declaration then set out two indentures of assignment, dated the 6th of February 1821, and by each of which indentures Salmon assigned a moiety of the premises comprised in the mortgage, subject to the lease granted to Lee, to one George Hicks Seymour. The declaration also set forth an indenture, dated the 15th of December 1843, by which Seymour assigned to the plaintiff one of the moieties which had been assigned to him by Salmon in the mortgaged premises, and further set forth an indenture, dated the 18th of February 1835, by which Seymour assigned to the plaintiff the other moiety of the said premises. And it was averred that by these assignments the plaintiff had become possessed of and entitled to the entirety of the demised premises for the residue of the term of 5,000 years, subject to the term which had been so granted and demised to the said Robert Lee, and the residue of the said term so granted and demised to the said Robert Lee had by assignment legally come to and become vested in the defendant. And it was further averred, that after the defendant became possessed of the residue of the term (to wit, on the 25th of March 1844), two years' rent became in arrear and unpaid to the plaintiff, contrary to the covenant, and so the defendant, although often requested, hath not kept the covenant, but hath broken the same.

To this declaration the defendant pleaded that, before the alleged arrears of rent became due, and after the mortgage debt of 1,200*l.* and interest had become due, and before the commencement of this action, to wit, &c. the said Salmon was paid and satisfied all the principal money and interest due under and by virtue of the mortgage, by and out of monies arising from the sale of part of the premises comprised in the mortgage, and equal to the amount of the said mortgage debt and interest; and the plea further alleged, that by a certain indenture therein described and set forth the said Salmon acknowledged that he had been paid the whole of the said mortgage debt, interest, and monies due to him upon the mortgage out of monies arising from the sale of part of the premises comprised in the said mortgage, and that all the mortgage debt, interest, and monies due to him under and by virtue of the said mortgage had been paid off and satisfied, and the said Salmon did thereby release and discharge the said Yeoman from all claims and demands of him, the said Salmon, under and by virtue of the said mortgage; and the plea concluded with a verification.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred specially, assigning, among many other causes, that the plea was double, by first stating a payment to Salmon, and then an alleged acknowledgment and release by him of the mortgage debt and interest; and the demurrer also assigned for cause that the mode in which the deed was pleaded was uncertain and ambiguous. Upon the argument, in the Court of Queen's Bench, the then defendant, and now plaintiff in error, contended that the plea was good, and also that the declaration was bad on various grounds. The Court of Queen's Bench held the plea to be double and bad, and the declaration to be good, and gave judgment for the plaintiff; whereupon a writ of error was brought in this court (2).

Peacock (June 15, 1847), for the plaintiff in error (the defendant below).—The plea is good. The first objection made to it is, that it does not sufficiently confess and avoid the cause of action. But surely it acknowledges the deed upon which the action is founded, and shews that before the rent became due, the reversion had been assigned over. It admits the rent to be due, but denies that the plaintiff is the proper person to receive it, and it therefore does not amount to riens in arrear, and is a sufficient confession and avoidance. It is said in the second place, that the plea does not give the plaintiff colour; but the plaintiff's colour is contained in the declaration. It is next said, that the plea is defective for not shewing that the premises had been redeemed; that there had been a legal termination of the mortgage, and that raises the question, whether under the words of the reddendum, it was necessary that there should be a reconveyance of the term. It is submitted, that it is quite sufficient to shew that the mortgage had been paid off, and that the mortgagee had released. Then it is said, that the plea is double, because it states payment of the mortgage money, and also a release; but the former part is only inducement to the release. The plea would not have been sufficient if it had stated the payment only. The release made the defence perfect. There are several cases which shew that payment in accord and satisfaction is no answer to a claim under a deed, but that there must be a release under seal—Blake's case (3), Com. Dig. tit. 'Pleader,' 2 Wils. 29, 30. The principal question as to the goodness of the plea arises upon the reservation of the rent. If the rent was to be paid to the mortgagee till the mortgage was paid off, then the plea is good; but if it was payable till the premises were reconveyed, it is bad.

[PARKE, B.—The plea does not aver by whom the payment was made; and if you rely on the release, it does not appear when it was executed. It might have been executed just before the plea.]

When a date is material, on demurrer it must be assumed to be true, although laid under a videlicet—Nightingale v. Wilcoxon (4); and it therefore sufficiently appears on the plea that the deed was executed before the rent became due—see the notes in Dakin's case (5), Ring v. Roxborough (6), White v. Wilson (7), Giles v. Bourne (8), Down v. Hatcher (9). Supposing the plea to be bad on the ground that the rent was payable till reconveyance, still the declaration cannot be supported. The covenant was a joint covenant in gross, and the mortgagor and the mortgagee should have joined. What was the meaning of the parties with regard to the duration of the time during which the rent was to be paid? If it was payable to the mortgagee till reconveyance, it was only rent payable to the assignee of the reversion, and there was no necessity for a special covenant to pay Yeoman.

[MAULE, J.—It may be that a reconveyance would not put the party in the place of assignee, as the reversion might merge in the fee.]

This was either a joint covenant in gross from the first, or became so after the payment of the mortgage money. It is unnecessary to cite Sorsbie v. Park (10) and Bradburne v. Botfield (11) to shew that where there is a joint interest the action ought to be joint, even although the interest be several. The rent was to go to Salmon and his assigns till payment and satisfaction.

[MAULE, J.—The words in the reddendum are "during the continuance" of the mortgage and "after payment and satisfaction." It may be said that the "continuance" is to explain the satisfaction, or the "satisfaction" to explain the continuance. Should you not then go to the statement of the title?]

If the reddendum was to be construed with reference to the title, then the ordinary covenant would have been used. The intention of the parties was that the covenant should run with the land while Salmon and his assigns were entitled to the rent, and afterwards that it should be a covenant in gross with Yeoman when he was entitled in equity. If the dates in the declaration cannot be considered as material, there is no sufficient averment that the rent became due after the assignment to the plaintiff. It was said in the court below that the statement that the rent became due to the plaintiff was sufficient, but it is submitted, that no such averment can be implied from those words occurring in the breach in the declaration—see Fryer v. Coombs (12). The defendant, being merely assignee of the lease, cannot be liable on any covenant not running with the land. It lay upon the plaintiff to aver that the mortgage was continuing. The presumption of fact was not sufficient.

Butt (23rd June), for the defendant in error.—It is said that the mortgagor and the mortgagee should have joined in this action: but the mortgage conveyed the legal estate to the mortgagee, which remained in him till reconveyance. The construction attempted to be given to the reddendum on the other side is, that by its terms the rent was to be paid to the mortgagee while the mortgage debt remained unpaid and no longer; but that would be doing violence to the language of the reddendum, and construing the covenant as not making the rent payable to the owner of the legal estate. The covenant must be read along with the reddendum. At no period could the mortgagor and the mortgagee join. While the legal estate remained in the mortgagee, he alone could sue. The case of Bradburne v. Botfield is not applicable, and Anderson v. Martindale (13) is distinguishable. In that case there was a joint covenant with two for the benefit of one of them; and the covenant applied to one subject-matter, one period of time, and one person during the whole time. This covenant is similar to one for the payment of two several annuities. In Withers v. Bircham (14) two separate annuities were granted, and the interest was held to be several. It can make no difference in the present case how the mortgages was to apply the rent. A reservation of rent to a stranger who is party to a lease is not void—Co. Litt. s. 345. It was next objected, that the declaration did not aver that the mortgage was continuing.

It escaped the observation of the Court that the declaration shews the continuance of the mortgagee's estate, for the term is stated to have been unexpired at the time of action brought. Fryer v. Coombs is distinguishable from this case. The distinction is between a certain particular estate and an uncertain one. Here the particular estate for a certain term of years is shewn to be in existence. See Thursby v. Plant (15). Dayrell v. Hoare (16) also is distinguishable in this respect. It is a clear rule of pleading that conditions in defeasance must be averred to have happened by the party wishing to take advantage of them—Brooke

v. Spong (17). As to the plea: in the first place, it does not shew that the payment and the release took place before the rent became due. The substantial objection to the plea is that it does not shew a reconveyance. It is consistent with the plea that the mortgage continued. It does not shew by whom the debt was paid; and it is double, because it states payment in satisfaction and then a release. It amounts to riens in arrear, which is not a good plea in covenant. For these reasons the plea is bad on demurrer.

Peacock, in reply.

WILDE, C.J. now (Dec. 3,) delivered the judgment of the Court.—[After stating the pleadings he proceeded:]—On the argument of the writ of error before us, it was contended, on the part of the defendant in error, that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was erroneous in holding the plea to be bad, on the ground of its being double; and that it was not bad in any other respect; secondly, that if the plea were bad, the declaration was bad in substance. We are of opinion that the plea is bad, and the declaration is good: and consequently the judgment of the Queen's Bench must be affirmed. As to the plea, the Court of Queen's Bench held that it was double, and that such duplicity was well pointed out as cause of special demurrer. The duplicity consists in relying, first, on the payment of the mortgage as matter in pais, and then on the release of the mortgage debt; and this duplicity is pointed out among the causes of special demurrer. But for the plaintiff in error it was argued, that the payment without a release was insufficient, and that, therefore, the debt being due by specialty, the payment and release together constituted complete payment. The foundation of this argument was, that the mortgage debt was covenanted to be paid. But it is a sufficient answer to this argument that on the pleadings it does not appear, and it cannot be assumed that there was a covenant to pay the mortgage debt on any certain day, or at any time, and therefore there is an entire absence of the foundation of the argument, and we are of opinion that the Court of Queen's Bench rightly held the plea double, and therefore bad. Further, we think that if the plea were not bad for duplicity, it is bad for not shewing distinctly that the original mortgage debt was discharged, and the estate exonerated therefrom. It is consistent with the plea that Salmon may have assigned the mortgage to another, and may have been paid by the assignee the amount of it in consideration of the assignment, and that the payment may have been made by the assignee, by selling a portion of the estate purchased by him; and besides, the release may have been made by Salmon after the assignment to Seymour, when it could have no effect on Seymour's vested interest, which could only be defeated by the actual payment of the mortgage, not by its release, for he was entitled to the rent until payment and satisfaction of the mortgage in point of fact, not until Salmon should release it. For these reasons we think the plea bad.

On the part of the plaintiff in error it was then contended, that the declaration was bad for three reasons: first, that the covenant to pay the rent was a covenant in gross; secondly, that the continuance of the mortgage was not averred; and thirdly, that it did not appear that the rent sued for became due after the assignment of the reversion to the plaintiff. We agree with the Court of Queen's Bench in the construction of the covenant, and think it is a covenant to pay to the lessor and his assigns until payment and satisfaction of the mortgage debt; for the covenant runs with the land, and does not become a covenant in gross until that event happens. Secondly, we think that as the estate in the reversion and the right to sue on the covenant commenced on the execution of the lease, the payment of the mortgage money was a condition subsequent, operating in defeasance of the covenant, and should therefore have been pleaded by the defendant—Brook v. Spong. The declaration therefore is in this respect sufficient. The last objection was, that it did not appear that the rent became due after the assignment to the plaintiff. The Court of Queen's Bench held that the averment of its being due and in arrear to the plaintiff was sufficient on general demurrer. The judgment of Patteson, J., in the case of

Fryer v. Coombs, raises a doubt whether it was so; but if it was not, the declaration may be supported upon the ground on which the counsel for the plaintiff in error relied, in answer to one of the objections to the plea, namely, that dates, when material, though laid under a videlicet, are on demurrer to be assumed to be correct, and the dates of the assignments of the two moieties of the premises to the plaintiff, may therefore be taken to be the true dates, though under a videlicet, if they are essential to the plaintiff's case, according to the doctrine of Bayley, J., in the case of Nightingale v. Wilcoxon. Assuming the dates to be correct, the assignment of one moiety was made by Seymour to the plaintiff on the 18th of February 1835, and the other on the 15th of December 1843. The rent was payable on the 29th of September and the 25th of March, and two years were due ending on the 25th of March 1844, which is a material date, and must be assumed to be true on demurrer, so that the plaintiff was, upon the supposition of the truth of the dates, entitled to half-a-year's entire rent on the 25th of March of 1844, and a moiety of the remaining year and a half.

It may be that, on this supposition, the Court of Queen's Bench, which may assess damages on a demurrer or judgment by default without the intervention of a jury, have awarded too much damage, but this being a matter in the discretion of the Court, cannot be inquired into on a writ of error. This objection, therefore, cannot prevail, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench must be affirmed.

An information under the 33 Geo. 3. c. 52. s. 62. alleged that the defendant being a British subject, and exercising an office in the East Indies, and residing there, un- lawfully did receive from a certain person called Sevajee Rajah a certain sum of money, to wit, &c., as a gift and present :—Held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, first, that the offence was sufficiently described, as the statute prohibited a receipt of any gifts whatever. Secondly, that it was not necessary to allege for whose use the money was received (Platt, B. dubitante). Thirdly, that it was not necessary to aver that the money was received extorsively, or under colour of the defendant's office.

Held also, that the provisions of 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 64. s. 21, curing defects by verdict, apply to all informations and indictments triable in England, whether the offences were committed abroad or not.

The information charged the receipt of a certain number of rupees. The jury found the value of each rupee at the time of the receipt. The Court passed judgment, imposing a fine upon each count, and a forfeiture of the value of the gift, adopting the value of a rupee as found by the jury, and sentence of imprisonment until the fine and forfeiture were paid :—Held, that under the 33 Geo. 3. c. 52. s. 63, where money was received, it was not necessary to give the defendant the option of returning the gift or the value ; and that the information and judgment were therefore right.

Held also, that the proper time to estimate the value was at the time of the receipt, and not of the conviction.

Held also, that the Court had power to pass sentence of imprisonment until the forfeiture was paid.

June 27. } BENDALL.

Bankruptcy—Insolvent Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116.—Pleading—Petition and Final Order for Protection—Jurisdiction where Petitioner has no Assets—Pleading General Plea of Final Order.

The Court of Bankruptcy has jurisdiction to entertain a petition for protection from process, and to grant to the petitioner a final order for protection and distribution, although at the time of presenting such petition and granting such final order, the petitioner has no assets.

The general plea shewing that such final order was granted to the defendant is good, without setting out any special preliminary averments for the purpose of shewing that the defendant was entitled to take the benefit of the act.

Assumpsit by the indorsee against the acceptor of a bill of exchange.

Plea—That after the accruing of the said cause of action in the said declaration mentioned, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the first day of January, A.D. 1844, a petition for the protection of the defendant from process was duly and according to the form of the statute made and passed in the session of parliament holden in the fifth and sixth years of the reign of our Lady Victoria the Queen, and entitled 'An Act for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors,' presented by the defendant to her said Majesty's Court of Bankruptcy, and thereupon afterwards on the 4th day of May, A.D. 1844, being a day before the commencement of this suit, a final order for protection and distribution was made in the matter of the said petition by Edward Holroyd, Esq., a commissioner of the said Court of Bankruptcy duly authorized in that behalf. And the defendant further says that the said cause of action in the declaration mentioned accrued before the date of the filing of the said petition in the said Court of Bankruptcy. Verification.

Replication—That at the time of the giving of such notice as is required by the said act by the defendant of his intention to present the said petition, and at the time when the said petition was presented by the defendant to the said Court of Bankruptcy as aforesaid, the defendant owed divers just and lawful debts, and was justly and lawfully indebted in divers sums of money to divers persons, amounting in the whole to a large sum, to wit, 200*l.*; yet the defendant had not, at the said time of the giving of the said notice, or at the time when the said petition was so presented by the defendant, or at any time afterwards, before or at the time of the making the said order, any property or debts owing to him or any estate or effects for payment of the defendant's just and lawful debts, or any part thereof, within the meaning of the said act of parliament, or that could or might be distributed amongst the creditors of the defendant according to the true intent and meaning of the said act. Verification.

Rejoinder—That at the time when the said petition was so presented, the defendant had a certain amount, to wit, the amount of 2*l.* 15*s.* then due to him, the defendant, from one Thomas Pearson, which said debt, at the time when the said petition was so presented, was an estate of the defendant according to the true intent and meaning of the said act. And of this the defendant puts himself upon the country, &c. To this there was a similiter.

At the trial, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the sittings in London, after Michaelmas term, 1847, the plaintiff had a verdict.

Knowles (13th of January 1848) moved for and obtained a rule to arrest the judgment on the ground that the replication was no answer to the plea.

Ogle (27th of June 1848) shewed cause.—The point that arises in this case is, whether an insolvent, who has no assets to distribute, can take advantage of the provisions of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. A difference of opinion exists on this point amongst the Commissioners of Bankrupts; the majority, however, holding that insolvents cannot take advantage of this bankrupt law unless they have assets to distribute. The final order is to be an order for protection and distribution. If there be no assets, of what is there to be distribution? By the preamble and the first section of the act it is provided that a person not being a trader may present a petition to the Court of Bankruptcy for protection from process, which petition shall have annexed to it a schedule of the petitioner's debts, with the names of his creditors, and also of the nature and amount of his property and of the debts owing to him. The section then goes on to provide that on a petition being so presented it shall then be lawful for the Judge or Commissioner to grant the petitioner protection from process. It therefore appears that a petition with a schedule an-nexed containing a statement of the property of the petitioner, is a condition precedent to the granting such protection. By sec. 7, the whole estate of the petitioner, present and future, is vested in the official assignee and the assignee appointed by the creditors. It would have been idle to have provided for the appointment of assignees and the vesting of the property in all cases, if it had been contemplated that the statute was providing for cases in which the petitioner had no property. By sect. 13. of the act, the Commissioners are empowered to make rules for carrying the act into operation. These rules have been promulgated, and they none of them contemplate that the act would be resorted to by any other parties than by petitioners who have some property to distribute. Unless this be the proper construction of the act, great inconvenience will arise, and the act will be the means of relieving from final process persons who have acted in the most fraudulent manner, the Commissioners not having the same power to punish as is given by the general insolvent acts. On looking at the subsequent statute, the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 102, which is a statute to amend this act, the legislature appears to consider that the construction now contended for is the true construction of the act. Then, secondly, the plea is a bad plea. By this act traders owing less than 300*l.* may take advantage of this act. But what is there in this plea to shew that the defendant was not a trader owing 10,000*l.*?

A defendant must shew jurisdiction before he can use the plea.

[ERLE, J.—What would be the use of the legislature giving a general plea if a defendant were obliged to set out all those preliminary averments that would be necessary if no general plea were given? How many times has this plea been held good?]

Cowch, who appeared to support the rule, was not called on.

LORD DENMAN, C. J.—I have seldom heard a case argued which presented less doubt than the present one. The replication is clearly bad.

PATTON, J.—The meaning of the general clauses of the act, in my opinion, is this—that the estate of the insolvent, if there be any, is to be vested as directed by the act; but the having such estate does not appear to me to be necessary to entitle a person to the benefits of the act. As to the plea, it is sufficient to say, that it is, at all events, good after pleading over.

COLERIDGE, J.—The machinery given for the vesting and distribution of assets was necessary in all cases, for although there be no present property, there may be future property. It has been contended that we should encourage fraud if we held that petitioners could take advantage of the provisions of this act, who have no property to distribute. But why is this so? It does not appear to me a necessary conclusion. The Commissioner is not bound to grant the final order—he is to examine into the facts of the case, and may then exercise his discretion whether he will grant or refuse the final order. Why should relief be refused because there are no assets—the case which in all others it seems most required?

ERLE, J.—The words of the statute are, “any person not being a trader,” and “any person being such trader, but owing less than 300*l.*,” may obtain protection. Mr. Ogle calls upon this Court to put into the statute these words, “provided such persons have assets to distribute.” There is no such exception in the act, and the replication is therefore bad.

In an action on a charter-party, which purported to be made by A. B., “owner of the ship Ann,” &c., it is not competent to give parol evidence that A. B. acted not as owner, but as agent for the real owner in making the charter-party.

Assumpsit on a charter-party.

At the trial, before Wightman, J., at the Durham Summer Assizes, 1847, the charter-party was put in evidence, which was signed not by the plaintiff but by C. J. Humble, and commenced as follows:—“It is this day mutually agreed between C. J. Humble, Esq., owner of the good ship or vessel, called the Ann,” &c. C. J. Humble, who was the son of the plaintiff, was called as a witness, and it was proposed to ask him whether he did not enter into the charter-party as agent of his mother, the plaintiff, and whether she was not the real owner. This was objected to as being a contradiction of the charter-party; but the objection was overruled, and the witness then stated that he had made the contract on behalf of the plaintiff. The plaintiff had a verdict for 141*l.*; and in the following term a rule nisi for a new trial having been obtained on the ground that the above evidence was inadmissible,—

Knowles and F. Robinson shewed cause (May 15).—The objection is, that this evidence was improperly received, as it contradicts a written document. But it has always been permitted to shew by parol evidence whether a party was acting as agent or not—Wilson v. Hart (1). It makes no difference that the witness is described as owner on the face of the document, for he would be taken to be so if nothing were said about it. The rule prohibiting the admission of parol evidence to vary a written contract is not applicable to matters like this of mere description. The real party to a contract may come in and sue subject to two qualifications: first, that the contract is not under seal, as in Appleton v. Binks (2); secondly, as in Higgins v. Senior (4), that the agent, if sued, cannot discharge himself by such evidence. In that case, Parke, B. said, "There is no doubt that where such an agreement is made it is competent to shew that one or both of the contracting parties were agents for other persons, and acted as such agents in making the contract, so as to give the benefit of the contract on the one hand, and charge with liability, on the other, the unnamed principals, and this, whether the agreement be or be not required to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds; and this evidence in no way contradicts the written agreement." So it is submitted here the evidence was admissible to give the benefit of the contract to the plaintiff, the real owner.

[ERLE, J.—Your argument would go to this, that a party entering into a contract in his own name may turn round and say he was acting as agent for some man of straw. Is there any authority for that where an objection was taken to the principal coming in to sue in such a case?]

[PATTESON, J.—Mr. Smith, in his note to Thomson v. Davenport (5), certainly lays down the proposition so; and that is in accordance with Sims v. Bond (6)].

[WIGHTMAN, J. referred to Skinner v. Stocks (7). Actions on policies of insurance may be brought in the name of the principal or agent.]

Smith's Merc. Law, 134, Story on Agency, p. 373, Bateman v. Phillips (8), The Duke of Norfolk v. Worthy (9), and Cothay v. Fennell (10), were cited. The only case apparently against the plaintiff is Bickerton v. Burrell (11). There, however, is this distinction in that case, that the party had stated that he was acting as an agent, and therefore he was held estopped from afterwards setting up that he was a principal. The word "owner," being merely descriptive, has not the same effect.

Watson and Pashley, in support of the rule (May 29).—All the cases cited by the other side are consistent with the proposition, that evidence to vary, add to, or take from a positive written agreement cannot be admitted. In The Duke of Norfolk v. Worthy the agent did not represent himself as owner of the estate; and moreover the action was not brought on the agreement, but for money had and received, founded on a rescission of the contract.

[PATTESON, J.—Could Hunter have sued Grace Humble on this contract made for her by her son?]

It is submitted not. What Holroyd, J. says, in Bickerton v. Burrell, is very strong in favour of the defendant. Cornfoot v. Fowke (12) was also cited.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—In Lucas v. De la Cour (13), in an action by several partners evidence of conversations with one of the plaintiffs on the subject of the contract, and in which he stated the goods to be his property, was held to be admissible. Lord Ellenborough's remark there applies very closely to this case: "If one partner makes a contract in his individual capacity, and the other partners are willing to take the benefit of it, they must be content to do so according to the mode in which the contract was made."]

Here, too, there is a warranty of the ship, and that cannot be contradicted by parol evidence—Walton v. Shelley (14). In Greenleaf on Evidence, it is said, "Where one signed a premium note in his own name, parol evidence was held inadmissible to shew that he signed it as agent of another, on whose property he had caused insurances to be effected by the plaintiff at the owner's request." The Courts are very cautious in not deviating from the general rule in mercantile instruments—Adams v. Wordley (15), Hollier v. Eyre (16), Vinery v. the Bedford Commercial Company (17), Graves v. the Boston Company (18).

LORD DENMAN, C. J.—At first I treated this according to the rule, that a principal may generally come in and take the benefit of a contract made by his agent; but when a party appoints another to act for him, and the person so appointed contracts in his own name, the principal cannot afterwards come in and declare that the contract was for his benefit. The language of Lord Ellenborough, in Lucas v. De la Cour, is very just, and must rule the present case.

PATTESON, J.—This question turns entirely on the terms of the written contract. If it had merely named C. J. Humble as the contracting party without saying more, it would have been ambiguous, and evidence to explain it would have been receivable. But he calls himself "owner," and thereby binds himself as principal: it is very like Lucas v. De la Cour. In Robson v. Drummond one of the plaintiffs was a dormant partner, and the acting partner with whom the contract was made had transferred all his interest in the partnership and in the contract in question to the dormant partner, and it was held that the action would not lie, because a contract entered into by one in his own name cannot be transferred to a third party. So here, the right of suing on this contract made by C. J. Humble, as owner, cannot be cast by the evidence on the plaintiff. The general principle is quite clear and untouched by our decision, that where there is nothing to define the character of the contracting party, he may be shewn to be agent merely so as to cast the right of suing on the real principal (18).

WIGHTMAN, J.—I thought Skinner v. Stocks, and that class of cases, decided the present when it was at Nisi Prius; but there the contracting party gave himself no special description, and therefore it was not generally inconsistent with the written contract to shew that the party was only an agent. Here the witness expressly states himself to be owner, and that brings the case within Lucas v. De la Cour and the other authorities cited by Mr. Pashley as having been decided in the American courts.

LORD DENMAN, C. J. added—Robson v. Drummond is rather different; but Parke, B. there says, You have a right until the end of the contract to the judgment of the

The shares were delivered, and had fallen in price between the time of the sale and the delivery. The plaintiff not being able to pay at the time of delivery the vendor demanded the shares back from the plaintiff, who gave them back to the vendor, who sold them at the then market price, and called upon the plaintiff according to the usage of the Stock Exchange at Leeds, to pay the difference, which he did. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the sum so paid from the defendant as money paid to his use, as he must be taken to be cognizant of the usage of the Stock Exchange, which his broker attended.*

Assumpsit for money paid, and for commission.

At the trial, before Alderson, B., at the Spring assizes for Yorkshire, 1846, it appeared that the plaintiff, who was a share-broker at Leeds, and who had been employed on previous occasions by the defendant, received an order on the 1st of September 1845, to buy for him ten shares in the Huddersfield and Manchester Railway. The plaintiff accordingly bought ten shares in the above railway, and sent the following advice to the defendant:—"3rd September, —Bought for Mr. Stables ten shares in the Huddersfield and Manchester Railway, at 28*l.* per share; commission 5*s.* per share; payable on delivery." Before the following account day, the vendor delivered the scrip for ten shares, which had fallen 8*l.* 10*s.* per share since the purchase, and the defendant not being able to pay the contract price, the vendor's broker demanded the shares back from the plaintiff, who delivered them to him, and they were sold by him at the then market price, the difference being 85*l.* The plaintiff was, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange at Leeds, called upon by the broker of the vendor to pay him the difference, which he accordingly did, and the action was brought to recover the sum so paid by him, as well as his commission on the original purchase. It was objected that the 85*l.* not having been paid by the defendant's authority, he was not bound to repay it, and that at all events an action for money paid was not maintainable.

The learned Judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for 2*l.* 10*s.*, the amount of the commission, but directed a verdict for the defendant on the count for money paid, leave being reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for the full amount.

A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly,

Watson and Pashley shewed cause (1). There was no authority or request by the defendant, that the plaintiff should pay the amount of the difference; and if the contract, as here, is in the name of the principal, no liability is cast on the broker, as between him and the vendor—Trueman v. Loder (2).

[PATTESON, J.—The bought note sent to the defendant is one thing; you cannot infer from thence that the name of the defendant was communicated to the vendor of the shares at the time of sale.]

That was to be extracted from the evidence. Secondly, the custom was improperly received in evidence. There were two stock exchanges at Leeds. The custom of holding the broker responsible only existed at one of them, and there was no proof that the defendant knew of such a custom. In Bayliffe v. Butterworth (3), it was assumed that the contract was made at the exchange.

[PATTESON, J.—It is not clear in this case that any notice was given to him that the shares would be sold.]

There was an option in the seller either to claim the whole purchase-money, as if the shares had been taken by the purchaser, or to claim the difference on the re-sale; and if there is an option, notice is necessary. The defendant is not to be left to his cross action against the plaintiff for not giving him notice, if the plaintiff having himself had notice failed to communicate it to the defendant.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—You would argue that the loss was incurred entirely through the fault of the plaintiff?]

Yes.

[PATTESON, J.—If the shares fell before notice was given to the plaintiff, the plaintiff could not give notice to the defendant; it all arises from the defendant not providing the plaintiff with means to take up the scrip.]

In Scott v. Irving (4), it was held that a principal is not bound by a custom among brokers of which he is not cognizant. That case was not referred to in Bayliffe v. Butterworth.

among share-brokers. Must not the defendant be taken to be cognizant of the custom of the market to which his agent goes? and a general authority to buy might indeed authorize the broker to buy in the particular market.]

Lastly, the action for money paid will not lie; the defendant did not assent to the payment—Moore v. Pyrke (5), Bowley v. Bell (6), Davies v. Humphries (7).

Baines and T. F. Ellis, contra.—In Bowley v. Bell there was an express order to the broker not to pay; and the circumstances were, in other respects, peculiar. Here the obligation to pay, on the part of the plaintiff, raises an implied promise by the defendant to repay him—Brittain v. Lloyd (8). The defendant had broken his contract before the sale was made; and the payment was made in consequence of that breach of contract.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—The principal difficulty in your case is, that you did not give the defendant notice that the scrip would be sold. Had you done so the defendant might have paid the difference.]

The notice to the broker is notice to the defendant—Sutton v. Tatham (9). The principal objection made at the trial was, that the action should have been special; and it is not disputed that the defendant authorized the plaintiff to contract in his (the defendant's) name.

The judgment of the Court was subsequently (July 12), delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This was an action of assumpsit, for money paid and for commission. At the trial, it appeared that the plaintiff, a sharebroker at Leeds, bought for the defendant, and by his directions, ten shares in the Huddersfield and Manchester Railway, at 28*l.* a share, to be paid on delivery of scrip. The defendant not being ready to pay when the scrip was delivered to the plaintiff, the vendors demanded the money or the scrip of the plaintiff, who delivered the scrip back, which had fallen in price; and, according to the custom of the Stock Exchange at Leeds the vendors sold the shares for the then market price, and called upon the plaintiff to pay the difference, which he did, according to the usage. The present action was brought to recover the money so paid, amounting to 85*l.*, and also commission upon the original purchase. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 2*l.* 10*s.* in respect of the commission; but under the direction of the learned Judge, who was disposed to think that an action for money paid was not maintainable, found a verdict for the defendant upon the count for money paid, with liberty for the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict upon that count for 85*l.* damages, in case the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount paid by him for loss upon the transaction, and that it was recoverable under the count for money paid. The case of Bayliffe v. Betterworth is not, we think, distinguishable in principle from the present. It was there held by the Court of Exchequer, under circumstances very similar to those in the present case, that an action for money paid was maintainable by a sharebroker against his principal, where the former was, by the custom of the share-market in which he dealt, obliged to make good deficiencies occasioned by the default of his principal; and that the latter must be considered as dealing with his broker according to the usage of the market in which he deals; and that a contract according to such usage was equivalent to a request to the broker to pay the deficiency, if the principal failed to do so himself. That decision is in accordance, as far as the circumstances are parallel, with the case of Sutton v. Tatham. We are, therefore, of opinion that the rule should be made absolute to enter a verdict for the plaintiff on the count for money paid, for 85*l.*

Beer Acts—11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 64.—4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 85.—Conviction—Jurisdiction—Statement of Offence—Limitation—Particularity—Duplicity—Penalty—Costs.

By the 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 64. s. 13. a penalty is imposed on beer sellers licensed under that act, who shall permit drunkenness or disorderly conduct in their houses, not exceeding for the first offence 5l., and for the second such offence 10l. By section 15. all penalties under the act are to be recovered before two Justices in petty sessions, and are to be sued for within three calendar months. By section 85. a general form of conviction is given. By the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 85. this act was amended, and licences were to be granted for the sale of beer, &c. to be consumed on the premises or not, but all the provisions, penalties, &c. of the 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 64. were to apply to persons licensed under the subsequent act.

A conviction stated that W, of the parish of Ashford, in the county of K, was convicted by two Justices in and for the county of K, acting in petty sessions in and for the division of Ashford in the said county, for that he, being a seller of beer licensed to sell the same by retail to be consumed on the premises, under the provisions of the statutes in such case made and provided, did at the parish of Ashford aforesaid, permit drunkenness and other disorderly conduct in the house mentioned in such licence, and situate in the said parish of Ashford, against the tenour of such licence granted under the provisions of the said statutes, and contrary to the form of the said statutes, whereby the said W. had forfeited 10l.; this being adjudged to be his second offence against the provisions of the aforesaid statutes to permit the general sale of beer, &c. by retail in England; and the Justices thereby awarded one moiety of the penalty, after deducting the costs of the conviction, to the informer, and the other moiety, after deducting the costs as aforesaid, to the treasurer of the county.—Held, first, that the conviction need not be by two Justices of the division within which the licensed house was situate, but that if it were necessary it appeared from the conviction that they were so.

Secondly, that it was unnecessary to allege that the conviction took place within three calendar months after the offence.

Thirdly, that the offence was properly stated to be contrary to the form of the statutes.

Fourthly, that the conviction need not state the names of the persons permitted to be drunk or allege that they were unknown.

Fifthly, that the offence charged to have been committed was not double.

Sixthly, that it was unnecessary to set out the licence in the conviction.

Seventhly, that the conviction was not bad for not ascertaining the costs.

Lastly, that the conviction need not be on parchment.

Witness—Order and Commission to examine—1 Will. 4. c. 22. s. 4.

A Judge's order for a commission to examine witnesses need not contain the names of the commissioners, as they are to be ascertained by subsequent arrangement between the parties.

Such a commission is not a writ, nor has it the incidents of one, and therefore it need not be tested in term time.

Assumpsit for freight.

Pleas—Non assumpsit, set-off, and other pleas.

At the trial, before Alderson, B., at the Spring assizes for York 1847, it appeared that the action was brought to recover 360l. 10s. 9d., in respect of freight earned by the ship Triton, on a voyage from Valparaiso to London; and the defendant sought to avail himself, under the plea of set-off, of various advances alleged to have been made by him above the sum of 250l., which was admitted to have been paid under the terms of the charter-party. An order was made by Williams, J., for examination of witnesses, named in the order, at Valparaiso, in Chili, on behalf of the de-applies to the particular writs mentioned in it.

LONG DENMAN, C. J.—I think that a commission to examine witnesses is not a writ, and that there is nothing to lead us to attach the incidents of any known writ to such a document. As to the second point, I think the names of the commissioners need not be mentioned in the order. Here the plaintiff had an opportunity of objecting, and did object to some of them; after this had been done, it cannot be said that he is now to be allowed to object that they were not named.

PATTESON, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute 3 Will. 4. c. 22. provides for three things. First, for a mandamus to the Judges of the colonies and other places under the British dominion in foreign parts, extending the provisions of 13 Geo. 3. c. 63. s. 4; and such a mandamus is clearly a writ; secondly, by s. 4. it empowers the Courts or the Judges in every action depending in the court, to order the examination on oath of any witnesses within the jurisdiction of the Court, before the Master or Prothonotary, or any persons to be named in such order; and thirdly, in the same section, the Court or Judge may order a commission to issue for the examination of witnesses by interrogatories or otherwise. If the Court were to order a commission to issue in the first instance, that might contain the names of the commissioners; but when an order is made at chambers for a commission it would not be possible to ascertain at the time of making it who are the most proper parties to be named as commissioners. It is true that the order might direct the commissioners to be named by the parties, or in any other manner; but the statute does not require them to be named in the order. As to the other objection, I do not think a commission can be in strictness called a writ. The 4th section of the statute only uses the term "commission," and I do not say that any test is necessary; it might simply purport to be "by the Court."

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is contended that this commission is a writ, because it contains the formal incidents of one, and that it is therefore improperly tested; the argument being derived from the ancient well-known writs, which could only issue in term time, and though they really issue in vacation, still they are only recognized as having issued in term, and are so tested. But this is a proceeding under a modern act of parliament, which gives power to the Court or a Judge to issue a commission. If any Judge may issue it in vacation, it would be quite an anomaly to require it to be tested in term. It is difficult indeed to say that anything in the nature of a test is necessary. As to the objection that the names of the commissioners are not inserted in the order, my Brother Patteson has already remarked that the statute does not require them to be mentioned, and in practice it never is done.

1849. } LILLY V. HARVEY.

County Court—Jurisdiction—Claim of Title to Land—Duty of Judge—Prohibition.

Under the 58th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. the jurisdiction of the county court is not ousted by a mere claim of title, unless such claim appears upon the pleadings. Upon a parol claim it is the duty of the Judge to inquire and decide whether the title really is in question; but his decision is not final, for if the superior Court be satisfied that the title did come in question, a prohibition will be granted.

A plaint was brought in the Cambridge County Court by the plaintiff against the defendant for use and occupation of certain premises at Bourne, in the county of Cambridge. When the plaint came on to be heard, the defendant took an objection to the jurisdiction of the Court on the ground that he believed himself to be the owner of the property. By the direction of the Judge he was sworn, and on examination he stated that the premises were in his belief his own, and that he had bought them at an auction. No evidence of his title was adduced, and the Judge proceeded to hear the case, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. A rule had been obtained, calling on the Judge of the county court and the plaintiff to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue, commanding them not to proceed further in the suit.

Burham shewed cause (June 7).—The rule must be discharged, as the course pursued was the proper one, and the Judge has already decided that there was no title in question. The Court before whom the claim is made must inquire as to the bona fides of the claim, and a mere allegation without evidence will not oust their jurisdiction. Similar cases have arisen under statutes as to proceedings before Justices. Under the Malicious Trespass Act, 7 & 8 Geo. 4. s. 30, it is not sufficient that the accused party says he acted under a reasonable supposition of right; but they must inquire and decide upon the circumstances whether he did so act—The Queen v. Dodson (1). So under the 53 Geo. 3. c. 127, a statement of a party called upon to pay church-rates that he disputes the rate is not alone sufficient—The King v. Wrottesley (2). In that case a caveat had even been entered, but the jurisdiction of the Justices was not taken away. Here the Judge has examined into the circumstances, and his decision must be conclusive. He referred to Brittain v. Kinnaird (3). The facts fully support the decision of the Judge.

The Court called upon

Naylor, to support the rule.—The cases cited were under different acts of parliament.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—They seem to me to shew that it is not enough for a man merely to say, I claim the premises as owner, but he must shew some reasonable ground to satisfy the Judge, as against the plaintiff; and if the Judge should in fact be wrong in his decision, and the Court be satisfied that the title did come in question, a prohibition would go.]

In the old county court the jurisdiction was ousted as soon as a plea or cognizance shewing title was pleaded—Timiswood v. Pattison (4). Here it must be presumed there was bona fides, for the party deliberately swore that he believed himself to be the owner, and his affidavits now repeat the claim.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—In a note to Mr. Udall's work on the County Courts, the cases upon the Irish acts are referred to, and the inference drawn is, that the facts of each case must be investigated by evidence to see whether the right is bona fide in question.]

The claim is sufficient, as it was not intended to give jurisdiction in these cases; and if the Judge below is to decide the question, he can always extend his jurisdiction.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—But what title is shewn upon your affidavits?]

The defendant swears it is his. The title need not be proved. He referred to In re Gwynne v. Knight (5).

Judgment was on a subsequent day (June 15) delivered by—

WIGHTMAN, J.—The question in this case was, whether the title to an hereditament came in question so as to take the case out of the jurisdiction of the county court under the proviso in the 58th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. The demand was for use and occupation, and the defendant objected to the jurisdiction of the county court upon the ground that he claimed the premises as his own, and that consequently the title was in question. The Judge of the county court examined the defendant upon oath, who stated that he believed the premises were his, and that he had purchased them at a sale by auction. The Judge, however, went on with the case, and decided in favour of the plaintiff, being of opinion that the title did not really come in question; and upon examination of the affidavits, I am of opinion that there was not any real ground for the objection, and that the question of title was not raised bond fide by the defendant. The defendant did not pretend to have had any conveyance of the premises, or to have paid for them, or to have had possession, &c. On the other hand, it appeared that the plaintiff had been in possession of the premises, and in receipt of the rents and profits for upwards of twenty-five years; that he had a conveyance of them, and had paid the purchase-money; and that the defendant in 1843 took the premises of the plaintiff as tenant, at a rent of 30*l.* a year, which was paid down to November 1846. It also appeared that, in June 1847, the plaintiff distrained the goods of the defendant for the arrear, which were sold without replevin; that on a subsequent occasion, when it was a question whether the defendant had not taken the premises of the plaintiff jointly with his son, the defendant swore that he alone took the premises of the plaintiff. It appeared upon these facts that the defendant had no ground for bringing the title into question, and that it was not really in question in the case. It was, however, contended for the defendant that it was enough for him to state upon oath that he believed the premises were his to bring the case within the proviso, and to take it out of the jurisdiction of the county court, and that the Judge had no authority to inquire further. It appears to me that if the Judge has authority to ascertain whether the title really is in question, it is very difficult to define the limit to which his inquiry may go. It can hardly be intended by the statute that the mere assertion of the defendant that he claims title, or that it is in question, will suffice to take away the jurisdiction: the Judge must be satisfied that it is in question, and for that purpose must have authority to inquire into so much of the case as is necessary to satisfy him upon that point. Where there are special pleadings, and the question is raised upon them, the Judge can go no further; but where the question is not raised upon the pleadings, but is merely suggested by the defendant, the Judge must inquire into the circumstances before he can be satisfied that title does come in question. If he is wrong, and assumes jurisdiction when the title really is in question, the defendant, upon making that appear to the superior Court, would be entitled to a prohibition. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances. The cases that have been decided upon the 53 Geo. 3. c. 127. s. 7. are authorities for this view of the case. The terms of the provisions in the two statutes are not the same—but the point in question is common to both. In The King v. the Chapel Wardens of Milnrow (6), and The King v. Wrottesley, it was considered that the Justices in a case under the 53 Geo. 3. must be satisfied that there is a bond fide intention to dispute the rate before they are bound to stop. If, notwithstanding reasonable evidence that the title is really in question, the Judge of the inferior court still goes on, his assumption of jurisdiction may be superseded by a prohibition; but in the present case it appears to me that the Judge of the county court was right, and that title did not really come into question in the case. The rule, therefore, will be discharged.

They, therefore, in the exercise of their discretion, directed the verdict to stand for the plaintiff.*

Assumpsit, for goods sold and delivered.
Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Wilde, C.J., at the Summer Assizes at Bristol, 1847, it appeared that the plaintiff was the captain of a Bristol trader; and that the defendant, who resided in London, was a dealer in wild and foreign animals, and birds. The plaintiff brought two leopards to Bristol by his ship, and they were placed in the Zoological Gardens there for the purpose of being sold. The defendant heard of them through a person of the name of Gregory, and being at Bristol, an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant that the defendant should purchase them for 30*l*. It was proved that the plaintiff, the defendant and Gregory went together to the ship, and that 5*l*. was paid in part of the purchase-money. The three then went together to the Zoological Gardens, where the leopards were handed over to Gregory, and were taken by him to his house, to be kept till Cowley should pay the remainder of the purchase-money, and fetch them away. Cowley then set off for London, saying that he should return in three days. He did not return till after the expiration of that period, and during his absence both the animals died.

It was contended, for the defendant, that, as the plaintiff had a lien on the animals till the remainder of the 30*l*. was paid, there could not be said to have been a delivery, and that the action for goods sold and delivered would not lie. The jury found, on the question being put to them by the Chief Justice, that 5*l*. was paid to complete the bargain; and a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 25*l*., leave being reserved for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit if the facts proved did not support an action for goods sold and delivered. In Michaelmas term, 1847,— Kinglake, Serj. moved accordingly, and referred to Maberly v. Shepherd (1), Boulter v. Arnott (2), Goodall v. Skelton (3), and Bladey v. Parker (4). A rule nisi having been granted to enter a nonsuit, or for a new trial,— Prideaux shewed cause.—The delivery to Gregory was a delivery to the defendant, and at all events it became so after the time limited for the return of Cowley from London—Salter v. Woollams (5). On the evidence, either Gregory was not the plaintiff's agent, or if he was, he was equally the agent of the defendant—Boulton v. Arnott. In Goodall v. Skelton there was no proof of a delivery.

[COLERIDGE, J.—The defendant treats this as a ready-money transaction.]

The 5*l*. was expressly found to be paid to complete the bargain; and the parting with the possession did away with the lien.

Prize, in support of the rule.—There is no period at which it can be said that the property passed to the defendant. The plaintiff might have maintained trespass or trover, if they had been taken from Gregory's custody. By the civil law no property in goods sold passed to the buyer till delivery. This cannot be done without the consent of both parties at Nisi Prius; and either party, if not satisfied that this course will do justice according to law, is bound to withhold his consent, and require the facts to be ascertained by the proper tribunal—the jury. If the facts found leave the case imperfect, and in consequence a new trial takes place, the process carefully employed for saving expense will have the effect of driving the parties to a new and increased expenditure, and prolonged litigation, with all its inconveniences and evils. What the Judge reports, the parties to have agreed to must bind them; and in this case the learned Lord Chief Justice informs us, that, having taken the jury's opinion upon a single fact, that of payment, he directed a verdict for the plaintiff, giving leave to the defendant, by consent of the plaintiff, to move for a nonsuit, "if the facts proved did not support goods sold and delivered." We have heard them largely and learnedly discussed, and cannot arrive at a clear conviction on the law arising on these facts, because they are ambiguous. They would support that count, if they led the jury to one conclusion on the intention of the parties, but not otherwise.

There are strong reasons urged on both sides of this question; and we cannot avoid exercising a discretion in the case.

We cannot enter a nonsuit, because there are facts which would support the count for goods sold. We would grant a new trial to ascertain the intention; but it is obvious that, if we do so, the plaintiff will apply for and obtain leave to amend his declaration by inserting a count for goods bargained and sold, which, as all agree, would be proved by the evidence produced by the plaintiff at the trial. We should be loath to make a rule absolute which would make the expense incurred useless, and could only produce the same result as the jury have already arrived at with a great additional expense to both parties. We do not see that the proof fails; and therefore we are of opinion that the verdict must stand. We are aware that the defendant will thus lose an advantage, to which he might possibly have been found entitled in the state of things that existed at the trial, but this is in consequence of his not taking the proper means to secure it, which we do not regret, as it is wholly independent of the merits, and, indeed, would give him a triumph over the justice of the case through a trivial slip of the pleader.

In the matter of the arbitration between THE EAST AND WEST INDIA DOCKS AND BIRMINGHAM JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY and BRADSHAW.

Railway—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—8 Vict. c. 18.—Arbitration—Award—Umpire.

Where a claim for compensation is referred to arbitration under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, the award need not assess the price of the land taken and the damage separately.

The arbitrators awarded a sum for the fee simple in possession of the claimant's land, and also for the immediate possession thereof:—Held, unobjectionable, though it appeared that there was an existing lease of part of the land, the claimant having used the same terms in his notice of claim.

The Court will not entertain an objection that the award is contrary to the evidence.

Where two arbitrators have been appointed by the parties, the appointment of an umpire by the Board of Trade, more than twenty-one days after the appointment of the last arbitrator, is valid.

The three months within which the umpire is bound to make his award are to be calculated from the time when the duty devolves upon him.

This was a rule, calling upon the above-named railway company to shew cause why the award or umpirage made between these parties should not be set aside, on the following grounds:—First, that the award was not warranted by the submission, the price to be paid for the land, for compensation for the damage by severance, and for other injuries sustained by the claimant being assessed in one sum of 2,560*l.*; whereas the sum to be paid for the land, the sum to be paid as compensation for severance, and the sum to be paid for other injuries, should each have been assessed and awarded separately. Secondly, that the award was not according to, nor warranted by, the claim upon which the umpire professed to adjudicate, in this, that the umpire has awarded a sum for the value of the land and for the immediate possession thereof; whereas, it appeared by the claim and the proceedings, that the claimant had not possession, and could not give such immediate possession, but that part of the land was in the occupation of J. Baum under a lease expiring in 1850, and that other part of the land so to be taken was in the occupation of J. Low as tenant thereof. Thirdly, that the umpire had exceeded his authority in awarding a sum of money to be paid (inter alia) for the immediate possession of the said land. Fourthly, that the umpire received evidence and statements not upon oath. Fifthly, that he decided contrary to all the evidence before him. Sixthly, that the declarations of the arbitrators and umpire respectively were not made in due time. Seventhly, that the umpire was not properly and legally appointed, and that the award was made after the umpire's authority had ceased. Eighthly, that the award was not certain nor final. Ninthly, that the Board of Trade had no authority to appoint an umpire.

The following were the facts on which the rule was founded:—William Bradshaw being possessed of the fee simple of an estate at Hackney Wick, consisting of a manor house, out-buildings, and twenty-five acres of land, on the 3rd of November 1846 received a notice from the secretary of the above-named company that they were willing to treat for his estate and interest in the land and premises described in the notice, and calling upon him for the particulars of his estate and interest therein. On the 21st of December 1846, the following claim, signed by Mr. Bradshaw, was sent to the company for the land described in the notice (being a portion of ten acres which would be wholly destroyed for building purposes), and for injury and damage to the residue of the ten acres by reason of severance, the sum of 17,325*l.*, subject to a deduction for the value of the land destroyed for building purposes which might not be required by the company. He also claimed, as the value of the manor house, garden, and out-buildings described in the notice, and in the occupation of J. Baum, 1,500*l.*, and for the stabling, out-buildings, and yard, also described in the notice, 750*l.*, and also claimed to be paid for any injury or damage he might otherwise sustain, and all costs, &c. to be incurred by reason of the company taking the land, and in addition, compensation for being dispossessed of his estate. Mr. Bradshaw also stated in his claim that he desired to have it settled by arbitration under section 23rd of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. On the 25th of March 1847, a notice was served on the claimant that the company had, on the 23rd of March, appointed Mr. F. Fuller as their arbitrator, and requesting the claimant to appoint another; and he accordingly, on the 6th of April 1847, duly appointed Mr. Gadsden to act as arbitrator on his behalf. The notice given to the company of this appointment stated "that the matter required to be referred to arbitration was as follows—viz. to settle the amount of compensation to be paid to me by the said company, for the fee simple in possession of and in the land, farm-house, yard, and cow-shed in the occupation of J. Low; the manor house, garden and out-buildings, the stabling, out-buildings, and yard in the occupation of J. Baum (which said manor house, &c. are subject to a lease thereof granted to the said J. Baum for a term of years which will expire at Michaelmas 1850, at a yearly rent of 38*l.*); all which said premises are described or referred to in my aforesaid claim; and for injury and damage by reason of the severance of my said land, and for all other injury, damage, costs, charges, and expenses mentioned and detailed in my said claim." In consequence of the arbitrators not having appointed any umpire, the two parties joined in an application to the Board of Trade to appoint an umpire. But before the 29th of April Mr. Bradshaw requested them to appoint a barrister, as many points of law were likely to arise on the reference. The company afterwards made a separate request to the arbitrators to appoint an umpire; and, they having neglected to do so for seven days, made another application to the Board of Trade, who, on the 17th of May 1847, appointed Mr. Powell (who was clerk to the Waterloo Branch Company and a surveyor) as umpire. On the 27th of May the two arbitrators and the umpire made the declarations as required by section 33 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. On the same day, the arbitrators and umpire went over the estate, accompanied by the surveyor and other persons brought there by the company, and also by the claimant's surveyor. It was alleged in the affidavits, on behalf of the claimant, that after having viewed the premises, the umpire asked many questions, and heard observations made by persons who were not examined at the hearing, although remonstrated with, on the ground that it was unfair to the claimant for him to hear evidence not on oath, or to permit remarks to be made to his prejudice, and that the arbitrators and umpire ought, like a jury, merely to have the land shewn them by a surveyor on each side without any observations being made by either party (1). On the 5th of June 1847, the parties attended before the arbitrators and umpire, when witnesses were called for the claimant, who estimated his damages at 8,664*l.* for the land and premises required by the company, and the general damages by severance, subject to the lessee's and tenant's interest therein, the company having declined to take the whole ten acres mentioned in the claim, but confining themselves to two acres, ten perches, and the buildings. The hearing was postponed until the 9th of June, when the case of the claimant closed, and the company did not call any witnesses. On the 26th of July 1847, an award made by Mr. Powell, the umpire, was received by the claimant, assessing the compensation at 2,560*l.* The award stated that this sum was given by way of compensation for the absolute purchase of the fee simple in possession, free from incumbrances (except the tithe commutation rent-charge) of the lands taken, and also for the immediate possession thereof, and also for all damage by reason of severing or otherwise injuriously affecting the lands of the claimant.

Sir J. Jervis (Attorney General), Sir F. Kelly, and Cowling, shewed cause (2).—There is a preliminary objection to this rule. The award of the umpire has not been made a rule of court, but only the submission to the two arbitrators. There is, therefore, no proper submission to the umpire before the

(1) The affidavits in answer explained that the observations and questions related only to the situation and character of the land and not to the value.

(2) May 4, before Lord Denman, C.J., Patteson, J., Wightman, J., and Erle, J.

Court. Section 36. enables the parties to make the submission a rule of court.

[WIGHTMAN, J.—It is clear that we have jurisdiction, as the act directs an umpire to be appointed on the original submission.]

Then as to the merits : first, it is objected that the damage by severance is not assessed separately ; but it does not appear that there is any such damage ; and besides, in the case of arbitration, no such separate finding is required. Section 49. applies only to the verdict of a jury, not to an award. This clause has also been held to be only directory—Corrigall v. the London and Blackwall Railway Company (3), In re the London and Greenwich Railway Company (4). Section 34. treats the sum to be awarded as one single sum. Secondly, it is said the award is not warranted by the claim, as Mr. Bradshaw has not immediate possession of the estate. This is answered by the claim itself, which does not shew that Baum and Low have more than tenancies at will. Besides, if Baum is tenant till 1850, the company cannot take possession without paying him ; and the claimant cannot object that he has compensation for more than he is entitled to, and it is nowhere alleged that he cannot give immediate possession. Section 37. cures all errors of form in the award. The third objection is included in the second. There is no ground shewn for the fourth and fifth objections, and the affidavits of the company quite answer them.

[PATTESON, J.—Nothing was said about the award being contrary to the evidence when the rule was moved for ; if there had, I should not have allowed it.]

Sixthly, the declarations were made in due time. The umpire clearly did so ; and the other two persons never acted as arbitrators for any other purpose than to enable the Board of Trade to appoint an umpire. The seventh and ninth objections raise the question as to the power of the Board of Trade to appoint an umpire. The arbitrators having made no declaration, amounted to a refusal by them to act, so as to give the Board of Trade authority under section 28. Section 23. will be relied on ; but the three months within which the award is to be made runs from the date of the appointment of the umpire or arbitrator, as the case may be ; that is the time when the duty of making the award is cast upon them. It was stated when this rule was moved for, that Patteson, J. had decided that the time ran from the appointment of the last arbitrator.

[PATTESON, J.—My note of that case, In re the Great North of England Railway Company (5), shews that the award was made by the umpire more than three months after his appointment. It was not shewn that the appointment was brought to his notice more than three months before the award ; but I thought that made no difference.]

This very point has been expressly decided in Skerratt v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (6), by the Lord Chancellor, who held that the time ran from the appointment of the umpire.

[PATTESON, J.—One point made in moving for the rule was, that twenty-one days having expired since the last arbitrator was appointed, the submission fell to the ground, and no umpire could be appointed.]

That is founded on section 31 ; but here the arbitrators have refused to act : and besides, the application by the claimant to appoint an umpire with the knowledge of the facts, waives any such objection. Doe d. Turnbull v. Brown (7), and Cock v. Gent (8) were cited. Lastly, there is no objection to the finality of the award.

Butt and Hugh Hill, in support of the rule.—As to the first point, the arbitrators are to discharge the same duties as a jury, and, therefore, ought to assess the sums in the same manner. Then as to Baum's lease, it clearly appears on the affidavit that he has a right to possession till 1850, and the award is, therefore, erroneous. Next, the umpire had no lawful authority to act, nor had the Board of Trade any power to appoint him. After the lapse of twenty-one days, the power of the arbitrators to award had ceased. By section 27. an umpire may be appointed by the arbitrators before they enter upon the matters referred to them, to decide "on any such matters on which they shall differ"; and by section 28. in case of their refusal or neglect, for seven days after request, to appoint an umpire, the Board of Trade is empowered to appoint; and his decision as to matters "on which the arbitrators shall differ" shall be final. Those clauses suppose that there are arbitrators in existence who are capable of deciding, but who differ in their opinions as to the matters referred. The fact that the parties have attended the umpire, does not get rid of the objection that he had no authority or jurisdiction whatever. Consent cannot give jurisdiction. Lastly, the umpire has admitted statements not made on oath. This is not denied on the affidavits.

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—No collusion or improper conduct is charged: in fact, what you call receiving evidence not on oath, was not receiving evidence at all, but talking about some of the matters referred.]

The Court will not draw any line as to the degree of importance of the information received by the umpire—Dobson v. Groves (9).

[LORD DENMAN, C.J.—That was quite a different case.]

Judgment was now delivered by—

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—In this case several objections were made against the award of the umpire. First, that one sum was awarded for damage and price, instead of a separate sum on each account. The answer is, that in respect of arbitration, there is no requirement in the statute for separate assessments; and that in respect of verdicts upon inquiries, such requirements as are in s. 49. of the present statute are directory, and not conditional—In re London and Greenwich Railway Company, Corrigan v. London and Blackwall Railway Company. Secondly and thirdly, that the award assumes the claimant to be in possession. The answer is, that such assumption if actually made is in his favour and to his advantage, and therefore no matter of complaint for him. But it does not appear clearly that any such assumption was made. The expression "fee simple in possession" in the claim is used in contradistinction to "fee simple in reversion or remainder." The compensation given can only be taken to be in respect of what was claimed; and if the tenants have any claim in respect of the actual possession of the land, their remedy is against the company, and not against the owner of the fee. Fourthly, fifthly and eighthly, that the umpire received statements not on oath, and that he decided contrary to the evidence, and that the award is not final. But the proof of these assertions fails, and with respect to the fifth objection, even if the decision had been contrary to the evidence, that would not be any ground for the interference of this Court. As to the ninth, sixth and seventh objections against the appointment of an umpire by the Board of Trade, the time of his declaration and the time of making his award, the facts appear to be, that the company appointed their arbitrator on the 23rd of March 1847, and the claimant his on the 6th of April; these arbitrators did not appoint an umpire or enter on the matters referred, and both parties before the 29th of April joined in applying to the Board of Trade to appoint an umpire. On the 29th of April the claimant objected to the appointment of any umpire not a barrister. The company afterwards made a request to the arbitrators, and after seven days another application to the Board of Trade, who, on the 17th of May appointed a surveyor to be the umpire; and he made his declaration on the 27th of May, and his award on the 26th of July.

Upon these facts the objections are, that the appointment of an umpire must be completed within twenty-one days, and the award of the umpire made within three months after the appointment of the arbitrators; that their appointment was complete on the 6th of April, and that consequently the appointment of the umpire on the 17th of May, and the making of the award on the 26th of July, were too late. But it appears to us, that the powers given for arbitration continue for three months after the arbitrators are appointed, and are determined then only by sect. 23. enacting that the question shall be settled by a jury, if, when the matter shall have been referred to arbitration, the arbitrators or their umpire shall for three months have failed to make their or his award, or if no final award shall be made. That the 31st section, providing that the umpire shall determine where neither of the arbitrators refuses or neglects to act, and they fail for twenty-one days from their appointment to make their award, operates only to take from the arbitrators the power of making an award, and to vest that power in the umpire, but not to render void the submission to arbitration, and the other powers incidental thereto, such as the appointment of an umpire. The statute contemplates three cases where a single arbitrator is to award, and in each of those cases he has three months for the purpose, viz., where a single arbitrator is originally appointed under s. 25, or a vacancy is left unsupplied under s. 26, or one of the two refuses or neglects to act under s. 30. It is to be observed, that the umpire cannot be brought into action in either of these cases. Then s. 31. provides for two arbitrators acting and failing to award; if they so fail for twenty-one days, and do not extend their time, the power to award is taken from them and vested in such umpire as is duly appointed under the other provisions of the statute, which are not affected by this section. The incapacity to make an award has no effect upon the power given to the arbitrators under s. 27, and to the Board of Trade on their default under s. 28. to appoint a new umpire in case of the death or failure of the first; and we see no reason why the same incapacity to award should have any effect upon the powers given for appointing the original umpire. If the construction contended for by the claimant is correct, it might happen that at the end of twenty-one days the power to award might cease, and the power to resort to a jury still be suspended for the residue of three months, which would be a delay without purpose. On these grounds, we have come to the conclusion, that the appointment of the umpire was valid. There appears no foundation for the objection, that the umpire did not make his declaration in time, as he was appointed on the 17th of May, and made it on the 27th, before he entered on the matters referred. The remaining objection is, that the award of the umpire is too late, there being more than three months between the appointment of the arbitrators and his award. But we find it decided in Ex parte Skerratt v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company that the three months for the umpire commences from the duty devolving upon him. In this decision we fully concur, and as this award of the umpire was made within three months from the duty devolving upon him, and indeed within three months from his appointment, it is not too late. The rule, therefore, must be discharged with costs.

1848. } MASON v. LAMBERT.
July 12. }

Clergy—Dilapidations, Repair of—Ecclesiastical Livings.

A perpetual curate (not removable at the will of the donor or patron) possessed of a house and lands in right of his curacy, is bound to keep the same in repair. Therefore, an action for dilapidations is maintainable by the new incumbent against his predecessor in the curacy for leaving such house or lands out of repair.

Case. The declaration stated that by the law and custom of England hitherto used and approved of, all and singular the rectors, vicars, and other incumbents of ecclesiastical livings and benefices in this kingdom, not being incumbents removable at the will or pleasure of the patrons or donors of such livings and benefices, whereunto do belong any house or houses or other buildings, are bound and ought to repair, support, and sustain all and singular the houses and other buildings of and belonging to their respective rectories, vicarages, or other ecclesiastical livings or benefices, and to leave the same so repaired, supported, and sustained to their successors. That the curacy of Mar- rick, in the county of York, is a perpetual curacy and ecclesiastical living, and perpetual cure and benefice, whereunto do belong a house and certain, to wit, twenty other buildings, and the said curacy is within the diocese of the Bishop of Ripon. That the incumbent for the time being of the said curacy is not removable at the will or pleasure of the patron or donor thereof.

That the defendant heretofore, to wit, on the 1st of January A.D. 1840, was duly nominated and licensed to the said curacy, and then became and was and thenceforth down to the time next hereinafter mentioned, continued to be and was the true and lawful curate and incumbent of the said curacy, and the said defendant during all that time was seised in right of the said curacy, of and in a certain messuage, to wit, a house called Bank House, and of and in divers, to wit, twenty other buildings, and of and in divers, to wit, five gardens, and of and in divers, to wit, fifty acres of land, situate, lying, and being in the parish of Gunton, in the said county of York. And the said defendant, being such curate and incumbent, and so seised as aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, on the 1st of January 1847, freely, and in due form of law, resigned the said curacy to Francis Morley, who then was, and ever since has been, and still is, the true and lawful patron and donor of the said curacy. And the said Francis Morley afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, accepted the said resignation, and thereupon, to wit, on the same day and year last aforesaid, the said Francis Morley then being the true and lawful patron, and having the donation of the said curacy, in due form of law nominated the said plaintiff to be curate of the said curacy; and the said plaintiff being so duly nominated to the said curacy, was afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid duly licensed by the Right Reverend Father in God, Charles Thomas Lord Bishop of Ripon, to perform the office of curate of the said curacy. And the said plaintiff thereby and by means aforesaid, then and there became and was, and ever since has been, and still is, the curate and incumbent of the said curacy, and the next successor of the said defendant of and to the same. And the plaintiff in fact saith, that at the time of the resignation by the said defendant of the said curacy as aforesaid, the said messuage and buildings and the fences of the said gardens and lands were, and that the same still are, out of repair and greatly dilapidated, ruinous, broken, and in great decay for want of due repairing thereof, and that the same were so left by the said defendant out of repair and greatly dilapidated, ruinous, broken,

To this declaration there was a special demurrer and joinder therein; but the argument was restricted to the general question of liability to keep in repair.

Addison (27th of June), for the defendant, contended that there was no authority to shew that a perpetual curate, as such, was liable to an action for dilapidations at the suit of his successor. The action for dilapidations is sustainable by the common law of England. Perpetual curates originated after the time of memory; their liability, therefore, could not arise by immemorial custom. At common law curates had no successors, and were not corporations. Where there is a perpetual curate the repair of the church devolves on the lay rector, as pointed out by Coleridge, J., in giving his judgment in Doe d. Richardson v. Thomas (1). A perpetual curate is not seised in right of his church: a perpetual curate is neither instituted nor inducted, which are necessary to confer the temporalities. This declaration, indeed, avers that the defendant was seised, but that is put as a conclusion of law, for it is not shewn how he was seised. A perpetual curacy is not a living or benefice. The impropiator is to be sued, which prevents any inconvenience. The impropiator is the owner of the rectory; the curate his curate, but not removable.

The argument on both sides is much abridged, on account of its being so fully gone into in the judgment of the Court.

The following books and cases were cited:—Gibson's Codex, 819, 2 Burn's Ecc. Law, 55, b, Duke of Portland v. Bingham (2), Browne v. Ramsden (3), Price v. Pratt (4), 1 Burn's Eccl. Law, tit. 'Benefice,' 155, 2 Burn's Eccl. Law, tit. 'Curate.' The Constitution of Othobon, A.D. 1268, 2 Burn's Eccl. Law, tit. 'Donative,' 223, 1 Gibson's Codex, 715.

Manisty, for the plaintiff.—It is not necessary to shew that the liability existed before the time of legal memory. Vicarages, themselves, are generally within memory. All spiritual persons holding lands not removable at will, are liable to repair. If the benefice were created within memory, the custom would attach. But little can be inferred from curates not being mentioned in the provincial constitutions in express terms, for although not so mentioned, "prebends" are liable to repairs. The important constitution is that of Othobon, A.D. 1268. The words used are "Universi clerici." Curates are included under those general words. If it be denied that the estate was held in right of the incumbency, the defendant should so plead, and raise the question that he was not seised. The declaration states that the perpetual curacy was a benefice to which a house belongs; therefore this living must have been made a corporation in some way. There is no reason why a different law should be applicable to perpetual curacies than is applicable to rectories and vicarages.—He cited, besides the authorities above referred to, Digge's Person's Counsellor (5), 2 Burn's Eccl. Law, 149, Lyndwood's Glossary, 112, 13 Edm. c. 10; Wise v. Metcalfe (6), The Attorney General v. Breton (7), 1 Geo. 1. sess. 2. c. 10. s. 4, Radcliffe v. D'Oyly (8), Bird v. Rolph (9).

Addison, in reply.—If the liability of the perpetual curate depend on the fact that the curacy has been augmented, then that fact should have been averred. A traverse of the seisin in this declaration would be rather a traverse of a conclusion of law than of fact. As to the liability of a vicar, that is not a parallel case, as the vicarage endowment is something carried out of rectorial estate. The endowment was, at one time, a part of the rectory. The argument that this is not a beneficed living has not been touched.

LORD DENMAN, C.J. now (July 12) delivered the judgment of the Court.—In this case the plaintiff is the present holder of the perpetual curacy of Marrek, the defendant his next immediate predecessor; and the action is brought to recover damages for dilapidations. The declaration is demurred to specially; but the main question on the argument was whether the law of dilapidations applies in regard to a benefice, if this may be so called, of the description and with the incidents which are particularly stated in this declaration. The curacy is described as a perpetual curacy, and an ecclesiastical living, "whereunto do belong a house and certain buildings," and the incumbent is not removable at the will of the patron. The defendant became curate by the nomination of the patron, and was licensed to perform the office by the bishop of the diocese, and he ceased to be curate by resignation to the patron and donor. Further, it is alleged that the defendant, while incumbent, "was seised, in right of his curacy, of and in the house, buildings, and land in question." This allegation, however, is so much more a conclusion of law from the preceding statement of facts, than a mere fact, that it cannot be taken as admitted by the demurrer; and in one view of the case it may be of main importance to consider whether the allegation is warranted by the premises apparent in the declaration. The curacy is not stated to have been augmented by the Governors of the Queen Anne's Bounty, under 1 Geo. 1. sess. 3. c. 10.

In order to shew that the action would not lie under these circumstances, the nature of perpetual curacies and their probable commencement since the time of legal memory, the interest which the curate takes in any endowment of his church, and his incapacity of taking anything in succession, were much insisted on by the defendant, it being assumed rather than proved that some seisin of the church endowments in a corporate character was a necessary condition both to the maintenance of the action and the liability of the defendant. But upon consideration of the authorities cited, and of the principle on which the action is maintainable, in any case we think this assumption cannot be supported. The principle is stated by Willes, C.J., in the case of Sollers v. Lawrence (10), and whether against the predecessor in his lifetime, or his personal representative after his death, it is this, that the maintenance of the houses, buildings, and other premises belonging to the benefice is a duty which the law casts on the incumbent, because he enjoys the benefit. If he neglect to perform it he is guilty of no civil tort in his lifetime to any one—not to himself, of course, the present occupier—not to an unknown successor, in whom is no interest—not to the patron, in whom the common law recognizes no such personal interest in the lands, goods, and chattels of the church of which he is patron, that any action will lie for him against the incumbent for spoils or waste, actual or permissive. Further, if the incumbent were guilty of a tort, the action for it would have died with him, and would not have survived against his creditors at the time when this mode of proceeding was first sanctioned in the common law courts. It is true this last remark does not apply in a case between predecessor and successor, but it has never been suggested that the character or foundation of the action is different in this case from that in which it is brought against the executor. It is indeed an anomalous action, which did not obtain a settled allowance in our courts till after the case of Jones v. Hill (11), and no judgment would seem to be of less authority in itself than the one there pronounced. C. J. Pollexfen was strongly against it; the Court inclined to his opinion; it was ordered for further argument; then the Chief Justice and Ventris being dead, Powell and Rokesby gave judgment for the plaintiff. However, it is now unquestionably maintainable; but with reference to the question before us, it is proper to bear in mind these circumstances, and also that, although it is usual to commence the declaration with a recital of the custom, as if it were some special custom, casting the obligation of repair on incumbents, it is clear that the custom so alleged is the common law of England—Wyse v. Metcalf, though a concurrent remedy against the executors has always existed for the succession in the Courts Christian—Fitz. N.B. 'Consultation,' 51 b. This also is important, because a different rule of interpretation will be applied to a custom parcel of the common law, and a special custom in derogation of it.

It is not difficult to suggest a reason why the precedents usually allege the custom in terms: the canonists, it is known, often usually speak of the common law with reference to ecclesiastical matters as a custom, as in the case of the liability of the parishioners to repair the body of the church; and as this action was conversant with ecclesiastical subjects, and probably grew out of and was modified by the canon law, its language may naturally enough have been adopted. It will not, then, be conclusive against this action if it were to be conceded, either that in the precedents, which is still the custom, perpetual curates appear not to have been mentioned, or that it is now brought for the first time. The latter circumstance existed in the case of a prebendary so late as 1788, when the case of Radcliffe v. D'Oyly was decided; and though stress was there laid, and naturally enough, on the fact, that prebendaries were named in the recital of the custom in ancient precedents, yet that was clearly not the only ground on which the judgment rested, and the Court attached little importance to the want of any previous instance. Indeed, wherever a Court is dealing with an action brought on the common law, it looks rather to the principle than the instance: ubi cedem ratio ibi idem jus. As to the language of the precedents, it is not to be assumed that the term "vicarii," which is always to be found in them, does not include a perpetual curate, if irremovable at the will of the rector, and endowed. We do not know how such a functionary could be better described than by the general term "vicarius;" and if the origin of the perpetual curacies and vicarages be considered historically, it would seem to be the very term which ought to be used. The shortest, and at the same time clearest, account of appropriations to which we can refer will be found in Sir W. Scott's judgment in The Duke of Portland v. Bingham. Under one species the curate was ad nutum removabilis, and the curacy without permanent endowment. This was a great grievance; and the ecclesiastical authorities struggled with the religious houses, in whose favour the abuse existed, to put it down. Not to refer to papal decrees on this subject, the language of our own legatine and provincial constitutions is clear to shew, that the person deputed to perform the spiritual duties of the cure was known only by the name of "vicarius," and that the present distinction of institution and induction, as necessary to a vicar, were not originally known. Thus, the constitution of Othoban, 52 Hen. 3. 1268, found in Gibson 715, is expressed thus: "Universi religiosi exempti Cistercienses et alii quicunque, qui ecclesias in propriis usus habent, si vicarii non sunt positi in eisdem, infra sex mensium spatium vicarios præsentare diocesanis, qui eos instituere debeant, non omittant: quibus sufficienter pro facultate ecclesiarum studeant religiosi assignare portionem; aliquin diocesani ex tunc id facere studeant diligenter." The word "instituere" here has not its present technical and limited meaning, as appears from the preamble, where, in reciting the grievance, it is said that some religious houses either left the appropriated church vicaria destitutam, or if by chance vicarium in ed instituerint gave him only a miserable and inadequate portion of the fruits. "Instituere," therefore, in this constitution, means only to appoint, not to perform the episcopal act of institution; and the curate whose miserable provision was sought to be remedied was called vicariss. In confirmation of this, we may notice from Gibson, 717, an extract from Extravagantes, l. i. t. 10. c. 2, in which Pope Clement III. complains of the religious houses, with regard to their appropriated churches, that they "vicarios in eis pro sua institunt et destituunt voluntate," where the meaning clearly is, "appoint and remove." When the legislature interposed in aid of the episcopal power to prevent the abuse, in 15 Ric. 2. c. 6, and 4. Hen. 4. c. 12, the words used to express curate and curacy were "vicar" and "vicarage." In the latter statute there is an express prohibition that any religious be in any way made vicar in any appropriate church; that is, that no one of the body, no monk of the house, should be sent as before from the house to discharge the duty as vicar, but that some secular person should be ordained vicar perpetual. Indeed, in the times of which we are speaking, the term "curatus" would have had in England, as it still has in Roman Catholic countries, a much wider meaning than that which a curate or perpetual curate now bears in England,--such a meaning as our liturgy still preserves in our church when it speaks of "bishops and curates." Whether, then, be the weight of the objection that perpetual curates are not in terms named in the precedents reciting the custom, it is not made out in fact, we think, that they are not impliedly included. Reverting, then, to what we have laid down as the principle on which the action is founded, the proper matter for inquiry is, not, agere, and solely whether, upon resignation or death of a perpetual curate, this action may be brought for dilapidations permitted, but also whether, during his incumbency, it was his duty to repair; whether he was then amenable to the same proceedings in the ecclesiastical court, to compel the repair, or punish the non-repair, as any rector or vicar. It would seem on principle that on the one hand we could hardly hold this action not maintainable, without also holding that he was not bound to repair during incumbency; for the action being founded on duty, to deny the action would seem to deny the duty; and on the other hand, if we should find that the perpetual curate has the same duty, et on him which a rector or vicar has, we arrive at the same foundation for the action in both cases. And it will be hard to resist the conclusion that when there is the same foundation and the same reason, the common law gives the same action.

This inquiry would naturally direct us to authorities in ecclesiastical law and practice in ecclesiastical courts; in them we should expect to find the clearest account of the duties of the clergy in this respect, and the most authoritative enforcement of them. But we must not be surprised if we should find these sources scanty in this particular matter, considering the original poverty of most perpetual curacies in the greater number of instances; the probability that in a very large proportion of instances, there was no residence house, nor endowment of land, and that a great number have passed into vicarages or presentable benefices in the course of time, by one or other of the modes which the common and statute law have provided for that purpose. Some information, however, may be gleaned from constitutions and decrees, which is the more valuable, as it seems that the duty was always founded on the perception of profits or the enjoyment of the buildings or lands. Thus, a constitution of Edward, 21 Hen. 3. 1255, to be found in Lynd. and 3 Tr. 27, and Gibson, 751, after providing for a deduction to be made from the ecclesiastical goods of a deceased rector who shall leave the church houses in decay, goes on thus, "Idem statuimus circa illos vicarios, quod, solvendo modicum pensionem omnes ecclesie habent proventus. Nam cum ad pensionem (that is, the reparations) teneantur, tunc portio deducta satis potest et debet inter debita computari." The Glossary of Lyndwood on "illos vicarios" is, "non ergo circa omnes sed illos dantur de quibus sequitur;" shewing that the duty arose out of and accompanied the ability and the enjoyment of means. Again, the constitution of Othobon, 32 Hen. 3. 1268, speaking of the avarice of those who, receiving much from their churches and benefices, neglected to repair or restore the houses belonging to them, directs that all clerks (universi clerici,) should repair and be admonished for that purpose by their bishops and archdeacons—Gibson, p. 751. And in a commission for Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, issued in 1402, to be found in Gibson 1469, "Satis nota est preceptoribus fructuum reparari, non solum jure civili et canonice dictat auctoritas, sed et sacri eloqui pagina instruit ac constitutiones nostre provinciales penali quadam adfectione disponunt." In all these instances, without making any distinction, maintenance and reparation of ecclesiastical buildings are treated as a duty growing out of occupation and enjoyment. The term "satis nota," used in this commission, is said from the language of legal instruments among the Romans, and imports that the occupier, as tenant, is to keep in proper repair. See Calvo's Lexicon Juridicum, and Facciolati, in verbo. The use of it, therefore, here is significant. It was said by Mr. Addison that the constitution of Othobon, before referred to, cast the duty on the appropriator, but that is a misunderstanding of the passage to be found in Gibson, p. 715, which applies not to the houses of the curate or vicar, but the old rectorial mansion, in which bishops or other superiors visiting officially had been and were still to be received. The Injunctions of Edw. 4. 1547, which directed that a fifth part of the revenue of benefices should be devoted to the repair of churches, chapels, or mansions belonging to them were directed to all proprietors, parsons, vicars, and clerks: vicars by this time had become a more limited term, and therefore perhaps the general word "clerks" was added. It appears to us upon the whole of this reasoning and these authorities, that the case of a perpetual curate who is not removable by his patron, and to whose curacy buildings or lands belong, is brought within the principle on which the action for dilapidations is maintainable if he holds such buildings or lands of such curate and as annexed to his curacy; and this is, we think, the conclusion fairly to be drawn from the facts stated in the declaration. If the buildings and lands belong to the curacy, his interest in them is in right of the curacy, and if he cannot be removed from the curacy at the will of the grantor, he has a freehold interest, and may properly allege that he is seised. The case of Brown v. Ramsden, cited by Mr. Addison, is entirely reconcileable with this view. There a vicar alleged himself to be seised of lands in right of his vicarage, whereas they appeared to be copyhold lands held by the Master and Fellows of Trinity College in trust to receive and pay over the rents and profits, after discharging certain outgoings, to the vicar. Of course the allegation was not proved. The case of the Curate of Orpington (12) proceeded entirely on the assumption that the curate was removable at the will of the patron. Nor is it needful for the plaintiff to allege how he became seised of the buildings and lands, any more than it would be for a vicar, for there is nothing in the legal character of a perpetual curacy as such which any more excludes an endowment in tithes or land at its first creation than in that of a vicar. In both cases the licence of the ordinary was necessary, in the first instance, to the creation, and the licence ought, in every case, to have been clogged with the condition of a competent allowance for the maintenance of him who was to perform the spiritual service of the church. Of course it might in one case as well as the other have stipulated for an endowment by a portion of the glebe land and a dwelling. In the absence of any specific statement of the manner how seised, we think the legal construction of the allegation is, that the curacy was lawfully endowed of the buildings and lands by the original ordinance and licence for creating it.

We think, therefore, our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

MICHAELMAS TERM, 11 VICTORIÆ.

1847. } In the matter of MARY JANE
Nov. 4. } DALY.

Baron and Feme—Acknowledgment by married woman, abroad—Certificate.

An acknowledgment by a married woman was taken before Commissioners in India, pursuant to the provisions of 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74, and an affidavit to that effect was sworn before a magistrate having competent authority. A person describing himself as "Major General" certified that the affidavit had been so sworn, and that the authority was competent, and stated that there was no notary at the place. On affidavits of the General's handwriting and rank, the Court held the certificate sufficient.

On the 17th of May 1847, Williams, J. granted a special commission under the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74, to four officers of Her Majesty's 84th regiment of foot, to take the acknowledgment of Mary Jane, the wife of Barnard Daly, drum-major of the regiment, to a deed of conveyance. At the time when the commission issued, the regiment was at Madras; but when it arrived in India, the regiment had moved to Secunderabad, which is distant 300 miles from Madras. The acknowledgment was taken before two of the commissioners, who duly signed the certificate; and one of them, C. Franklin, made the usual affidavit of having taken the acknowledgment, which was sworn at Secunderabad before James Robertson, one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace and superintendent of police for the cantonment of Secunderabad. The affidavit was also taken in the presence of Lovell Benjamin Lovell, Major-General commanding the Hyderabad subsidiary force, who signed a certificate that C. Franklin was sworn in his presence to the truth of the affidavit, before the said J. Robertson, also that J. Robertson was a Justice of the Peace for the cantonment, and as such qualified to administer oaths, and that the names of C. Franklin and J. Robertson, subscribed to the affidavit, were of their handwritings respectively. In signing this certificate, General Lovell described himself as "Major-General commanding the Hyderabad subsidiary force, where there is no notary."

The commission and the certificate having been returned to England, an application was made at the acknowledgment office to file the certificate; but it was refused, on the ground that there was no evidence that there was no notary within a reasonable distance of Secunderabad.

Channell, Serj. (Nov. 4.) moved that the officer of the Court should be directed to receive the acknowledgment.

WILDE, C.J.—The reason for requiring a certificate in cases of this sort is, to preserve the necessary decree of security as to the validity of the acknowledgment. The Court, as it cannot have the means of satisfying itself of the competency of the person professing to act, upon the face of the instrument itself, adopts the certificate by a notary, whose office is of a universal character, that the party administering the oath was competent to do so, according to the laws of the country in which he acted. A difficulty arises when there is no notary in the place where the acknowledgment is taken. In the present case, that which is offered as a substitute is the certificate of a person described as acting in the capacity of major-general in the army. The position and rank of such a person affords a greater security and sanction than those of a notary; but on the present occasion there is no affidavit that the certificate in question is signed in the handwriting of the officer whose name it bears, or that he holds the rank which he professes to hold. The Court, therefore, acting in support of the rule which it has laid down, but adopting a new instance of discretion, can hardly hold the document now before it sufficient; but on proof, by affidavit, of the handwriting of the General, and that he holds the rank in question, the acknowledgment may be received by the officer of the court (1).

1846. } CLIFT AND ANOTHER v.
Feb. 4; } SCHWABE, ADMINISTRATOR,
June 16.* } TRIX, &c.

Life Insurance—Policy, Construction of —“Commit Suicide”—Responsible Moral Agent.

To an action upon a policy of insurance effected by S. on his own life, expressed to be subject to a condition that the policy should be void if the assured should commit suicide, or die by duelling or the hands of justice, the defendants (the insurance office) pleaded that S. did commit suicide. It was proved that S. died by reason of having taken sulphuric acid voluntarily, and for the purpose of killing himself, being at the time of unsound mind.

The Judge directed the jury that to find for the defendants, the jury must be satisfied “that S. died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act so as to be a responsible moral agent.”

On a bill of exceptions it was held, in the Exchequer Chamber (by Parke, B., Alderson, B., Patteson, J., and Rolfe, B.), that the direction, as to the necessity of S. being a responsible moral agent, and capable of distinguishing between right and wrong was erroneous, the terms in the policy, “commit suicide,” including all cases of voluntary self-destruction, whether felonious or not (dissentientibus Pollock, C.B. and Wightman, J.)

Error from the Court of Common Pleas.

Assumpsit, by the plaintiff below, as administratrix of Louis Schwabe, deceased, on policies of insurance, granted by the defendants below, as directors of the Argus Assurance Company, to the said Louis Schwabe, upon his own life. The policy, as set out in the declaration, contained the usual proviso that it should be subject to the several conditions and regulations thereupon indorsed, so far as the same were applicable, in the same manner as if the same respectively were repeated and incorporated in the policy. The conditions and regulations were then set out, of which it is only necessary to state the following:—“Second, Policies will become void if the parties whose lives have been assured shall die on the high seas, except in passing in decked vessels or in steam-boats from one part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to another part of the same kingdom, and to and from the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, and Man; and also in time of peace in king's ships, and packet or passage vessels, or steam-boats, from or to any part of Great Britain, to or from any part of the continent situate between Hamburg and Bordeaux, both inclusive, or shall go beyond the limits of Europe, or being or becoming military or naval men shall be called into actual service, unless in each case of going upon the seas

(1) Affidavits to this effect having been subsequently filed, the Court, on the motion of Channell, Serj., directed that the acknowledgment should be received by the proper officer.

* The publication of this case has been unavoidably delayed.

or beyond the limits of Europe, or into actual service, permission shall have been granted by the board of directors, and such premium or premiums on account of the extra risk be paid as shall be required by the board of directors. Sixth, Every policy effected by a person on his or her own life shall be void if such person shall commit suicide, or die by duelling or by the hands of justice; but if any policy effected by a person on his or her own life shall afterwards be actually assigned to any person or persons by way of mortgage, or for the benefit of any creditor or creditors, or charged with any sum or sums for the benefit of any mortgagee or mortgagees, or creditor or creditors, and the person on whose life the assurance shall have been effected shall commit suicide, or die by duelling or by the hands of justice, then the policy so assigned or charged shall not be void to the extent of the principal sum or sums and interest secured by the assignment or charge; or if any policy effected by any person on his or her own life shall afterwards be absolutely assigned to a purchaser for valuable consideration in any transaction (except that of settlement upon or after marriage or any other occasion), and the person on whose life the assurance shall have been effected, shall commit suicide, or die by duelling or by the hands of justice, then the policy so assigned shall continue in full force notwithstanding such suicide or death." Averment of mutual promises, payment of the premiums down to 1844, and that while the policies were in force, to wit, on the 11th of January 1845, the said L. Schwabe died, and that the plaintiff was his administratrix.

The defendants below pleaded, that after the making of the said several policies and the said promises in the declaration mentioned respectively, to wit, &c., the said Louis Schwabe did commit suicide, whereby the said policies respectively became void. The replication traversed this allegation, upon which issue was joined.

The cause was tried, at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1845, before Cresswell, J., when a bill of exceptions was tendered to the ruling of the learned Judge, which in substance stated, that the defendants gave evidence in support of the above issue, that the assured, L. Schwabe, on the 10th of January 1845, voluntarily took and swallowed a quantity of sulphuric acid, sufficient to occasion death, for the purpose of killing himself, and that he died on the following day by reason of the taking and swallowing of such acid as aforesaid; and the same witnesses, on cross-examination, gave evidence tending to shew that the said L. Schwabe, at the time when he took the sulphuric acid, was of unsound mind. The learned Judge directed the jury, "that in order to find the said issue for the defendants, it was necessary that the jury should be satisfied that L. Schwabe died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act that he was doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent. That the burthen of proof, as to his dying by his own voluntary act, was on the defendants; but, that being established, the jury must assume that he was of sane mind and a responsible moral agent, unless the contrary should appear in evidence." The counsel for the defendants excepted to the above ruling, and insisted that the jury ought to have been directed, as matter of law, that if the said L. Schwabe voluntarily took the sulphuric acid for the purpose of destroying life, being conscious of the probable consequences of the act, and having at the time of so taking it sufficient mind to will to destroy life, he had committed suicide within the meaning of the sixth condition of the policies. The jury found their verdict for the plaintiff below, with 5,140*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.* damages.

Judgment having been signed for the plaintiff below, a writ of error was brought by the defendants below, which was now (Feb. 4,) argued (1) by—

Sir F. Kelly (Solicitor General), for the plaintiffs in error (2).—The question raised

(1) Before Pollock, C.B., Parke, B., Alderson, B., Patteson, J., Rolfe, B., Coleridge, J., and Wightman, J.

(2) The following were the points stated by the plaintiffs in error :—"That according to the true construction of the expression in the sixth condition, 'shall commit suicide,' if the assured by his own voluntary act put himself to death, intending at the time of committing the act to cause his own death, and being conscious that such would be the probable effect of the means employed by him for that purpose, the condition attached, and the several policies became forfeited, although at the time of so killing himself he might be of unsound mind and by the present writ of error is one of great importance, and with the exception of Borradaile v. Hunter (3), and the cases there referred to, one upon which there is no precise authority. But that case need not be decisive of this question, as the words in the policy were there different from those in the present case; and the real point to be considered must be what is the meaning of the clause in the conditions of this office. The words "commit suicide" have no fixed legal meaning attached to them, and they must therefore be construed according to their ordinary acceptation among mankind, and with reference to the intention of the parties using them. "Murder" has received a known and fixed definition; but "suicide" is analogous to "homicide," and is the act of taking away life, which may be felonious or not, according to circumstances—3 Inst. 54. Applying that view to the present case, the question arises, whether one who puts an end to his own life, being at the time conscious of what is going on, so as to be aware that the act done will destroy life and intending to do so, but is under the influence of a high and overpowering excitement, can be said to commit suicide within the terms of this policy. And it is contended, that such ought to be the construction of this condition.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—In some offices, after such a clause as the present there is inserted another to the effect, that if the assured dies by suicide not being felo de se, the society may allow the amount due on the policy immediately before the death occurred.]

That is in favour of the larger sense of the word.

[ALDERSON, B.—The question is, whether the word means more than an intentional incapable by reason of such unsoundness of mind of distinguishing between right and wrong, and that the jury ought to have been directed accordingly.

The defendant's points were:—That the charge of the learned Judge was correct and sufficient and proper for the direction of the jury, and that if the deceased died by his own voluntary act, being then of insane mind and unable to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act that he was doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent, he did not commit suicide avoiding the policies according to the provisos in that behalf therein respectively contained.

(3) 5 Man. & Gr. 639; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 225.

act of killing, or whether the idea of moral responsibility ought to be included.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Borradaile v. Hunter was a very different case from the present: there, many things were found by the jury; but here, we must take it on the Judge's charge.]

In that case, the jury negatived the fact of the assured being a responsible moral agent, and found that he was not capable of judging between right and wrong; and these are the very words adopted by the Judge in the present case. The argument of the plaintiffs in error is, that the being a responsible moral agent, with a capacity of judging between right and wrong, does not affect the present question, which is solely, did the assured do the act voluntarily and with a knowledge that it would destroy life?

[POLLOCK, C.B.—How can one who is not a responsible moral agent be said to do anything as his own act? or how can intention be predicated of any one who is not capable of judging between right and wrong?]

There is a difference between being a responsible agent and having the will under controul. In the present case, the party is responsible for these acts, because they are his own voluntary acts. The object of the office was to say, if you kill yourself we will not pay, and we will not inquire whether you killed yourself feloniously or not.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—If they had said that, it might be so.]

The expression used by Erskine, J., in Borradaile v. Hunter, "that the terms 'shall commit suicide' have been popularly understood and judicially considered as importing a criminal act of self-destruction, is not to be supported." Garrett v. Barclay, referred to in that case, is rather an authority against that position. In Kinnear v. Nicholson (4) the words were, "should die by his own hands," but it was agreed that the decision should abide the event of Kinnear v. Borradaile (4), where the words were "should commit suicide": the understanding therefore then was, that these two expressions were equivalent. Moreover, in the former of these two cases, the question was in fact decided by the verdict of the coroner's jury.

(4) Not reported, but cited in Borradaile v. Hunter.

[ALDERSON, B.—If insanity takes away the intention of the act, and makes it as if it were an accidental act, the argument from the words "die by his own act" will not help you. May not a man have a partial intention according as his will is only partially perverted?]

If he has will enough to intend to destroy his own life, and mind enough to know that the act which he does will produce that result, and he does the act with that intention and that will, it is enough to avoid this policy without entering into any question as to the amount of perversion of the will.

[ALDERSON, B.—"Voluntary self-destruction" is tautology. Self-destruction of itself implies an act of the will.]

It will be said on the other side that the word "commit" involves the idea of a criminal act; but that is not so; it means nothing more than doing the act with intention.

J. Henderson, for the defendant in error.—If "suicide" necessarily imports crime, it is not disputed on the other side that the learned Judge's charge was correct; it comes then to the question of what does the word mean in this policy? The word is one of modern introduction, and is not found in the Bible.

[PARKE, B.—There is no such word as "suicidium" in Facciolati or any other Latin dictionary that I know of.]

One of the earliest instances of its being used is by Lord Hale—Pleas of the Crown, vol. i. ch. 31. p. 411. "First of self-killing. Felo de se or suicide is where a man of age of discretion and compos mentis voluntarily kills himself:" there it is expressly used as synonymous with felo de se. Blackstone also, 4 Comm. p. 189, uses the word as importing self-murder.

[ALDERSON, B.—It is quite clear that "suicide" includes felo de se: the question is, whether it is confined to it.]

In Johnson's Dictionary, "suicide" is defined as "self-murder; the horrid crime of killing oneself." Then, the word "commit" being used with "suicide" imports the deliberate exercise of the will. It is the same thing as if the words were "shall commit the crime of suicide." It is observable, that the previous clauses of the policy include events dependent not merely on the intention of the assured: as "if he shall die on the high seas," "shall die by duelling or by the hands of justice;" but the word "commit" introduces the idea of an intention. As to the argument, that it is sufficient if the assured had mind enough to have an intention of destroying himself; there may be an intention not governed by reason, and the law means an intention influenced by the will.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The law recognizes no degrees of non-capacity; if a man is non compos, he is beyond its reach in all cases. How can you predicate that one man who is non compos may have a will and another not? We are in fact using terms which are not strictly applicable to the supposed case. How can a madman be said to have a will?]

[ALDERSON, B.—A madman is exempted from punishment because he has no controul over his will. Actio non facit reum nisi mens sit rea.]

In the civil law there is a distinction between furiosus and demens, but the law of England is different in this respect.

[PARKE, B.—Surely there are degrees of insanity.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—But there are no degrees of responsibility.]

In the summing up of Cresswell, J., in this case, he puts the test not merely of the deceased being able to distinguish between right and wrong, but adds, so as to cease to be a moral responsible agent. This arose from the opinion expressed by Tindal, C.J., in the answer given by the Judges to the questions proposed by the House of Lords in M'Naughten's case (5). It is therefore submitted, that the direction of the learned Judge at the trial was correct: if the office had intended to include all acts of self-destruction, it was their duty to have expressed that intention by clear words. This was a risk covered by the policy; it is as much an accident as if the deceased had died in consequence of a fall from his horse. Borradaile v. Hunter and The Amicable Society v. Bolland (6) bear out this view of the case.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of opinion, upon the best consideration I can give to this case, that the direction of the learned Judge to the jury upon the trial of the cause was right, and that the deceased Louis Schwabe did not, under the circumstances found by the jury, commit suicide within the meaning of the exception in the policy of assurance upon his life. The exception or proviso in the policy is in these terms: "Every policy effected by a person on his own life shall be void, if such person shall commit suicide, or die by duelling or the hands of justice." The defendants below pleaded that Schwabe, whose life was insured by himself, did commit suicide, which was denied by the plaintiff in the action. The evidence was that the deceased voluntarily took poison in sufficient quantity to cause death for the purpose of killing himself, but that he was when he took the poison of unsound mind. The learned Judge told the jury, that to find a verdict for the defendants below they must be satisfied that the deceased died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act that he was doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent. To this direction a bill of exceptions was tendered, it being contended on behalf of the defendants that it was sufficient to entitle them to a verdict, if the deceased had sufficient mind to intend to kill himself, and to know that the poison would probably have that effect, and that he took the poison with that intent, though he might be unable to distinguish between right and wrong, or to appreciate the nature and quality of the act he was doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent. The question, therefore, is, whether by the word "suicide" as used in the policy, a criminal killing of himself, such as could only be committed by a responsible moral agent, was intended; for if it was, the direction of the learned Judge and the verdict of the jury were right; otherwise not. The term "suicide" has no technical or legal meaning; it is derived from the Latin, but the compound word "suicidium" from which the English word is said to be derived, is not to be found in any Latin dictionary or glossary that I have met with. It is admitted that the word is not to be understood in the largest sense of which it is capable, as that would include an accidental or unintentional killing of himself. We must, therefore, consider the ordinary meaning of the word in the English language, and connect such ordinary meaning with the apparent object and intent of the proviso in the policy in which it occurs. In all the English books in which it occurs, legal or other, it is almost invariably used to denote a criminal act. In Johnson's Dictionary "suicide," when used as denoting an act, is said to mean "self-murder: the horrid crime of destroying oneself;" and when used as denoting a person is said to mean "a self-murderer." In Webster's Dictionary the same meaning is given, and so in Rees's Cyclopædia and in the Encyclopædia Britannica. Blackstone, in the 4th of his Commentaries, p. 189, uses the term "suicide" as meaning a felo de se. He says: "As the suicide is guilty of a double offence, one spiritual and the other temporal, the law has ranked it amongst the highest crimes." Innumerable instances might be given to shew that the word "suicide" is almost invariably used in the English language in a criminal sense, and that such is the meaning of the word in its general and ordinary acceptance. If that be so, is there anything in the policy or the terms of it to shew that it is used, in the proviso in question, not in the general and ordinary sense, but in another of which it is capable, though unusual? The word is used in a disqualifying proviso, by which, under certain circumstances, the insurance and the premiums paid are forfeited, and the benefit of the policy lost. The usual rule is to look strictly at the terms of such provisoes, and not to extend them beyond their ordinary meaning; but in the present case if the ordinary meaning of the term "suicide" were more uncertain than it seems to be, the terms used in the proviso itself in connexion with it tend to shew the sense in which the insurers, whose word it is, intended it should be used. The policy is to be void if the person "shall commit suicide, or die by duelling or by the hands of justice." The three excepted modes of death are classed together in one exception or proviso, and two of them are unquestionably the consequences of crime; and if the maxim noscitur à sociis applies, it strongly tends to shew that the third is used in a criminal sense also. In Borra-daile v. Hunter, which was cited upon the argument, Mr. Justice Erskine, who agreed with the majority of the Judges, says, as one of the grounds for his judgment in the case, "when I find the terms 'shall commit suicide,' that have been popularly understood, and judicially considered as importing a criminal act of self-destruction, changed for terms not hitherto so construed, it may, I think, be fairly inferred that the terms adopted were intended to embrace all cases of intentional self-destruction, unless it can be collected from the immediate context that the parties used them in a more limited sense." And the Lord Chief Justice Tindal, in his judgment in the same case, says: "If the exception had run in the terms 'shall die by suicide, or by the hands of justice, or in consequence of a duel,' surely no doubt could have arisen that a felonious suicide was intended thereby." I refer to these passages in the judgments of these learned Judges as shewing their understanding of the meaning of the term "suicide," when used in such an exception and in connexion with such other terms as occur in the present case. I forbear to speculate upon the probable object of the insurers in introducing such a proviso. It can hardly be because such modes of death as these excepted are events not to be calculated upon, for there is no doubt but that the probabilities of such events are as well calculable as any others; and moreover those modes of death are not excepted where the policies are upon the lives of others. It may be that the exception in case of suicide was introduced to meet the case of a person insuring his life with the intention of committing suicide in order to benefit his family, or it may be that the insurers were influenced by some higher motive, and wished to check such modes of death as those excepted. Either of these objects would seem to indicate that the word "suicide" was used in its ordinary sense, importing a crime. But as no satisfactory result can be drawn from such a speculation, it is better to judge of the case merely by the ordinary sense of the language used in connexion with the other terms which are used along with it. Upon the whole, then, it seems to me that there is nothing in this case to shew an intention on the part of the insurers to use the word "suicide" in a more extended sense than that which is ordinarily and popularly attributed to it, and that, on the contrary, the context shews that it was their intention to use it in the ordinary and popular sense, and that they have so used it, and consequently that the direction of the Judge was correct, and that the defendant in error is entitled to judgment.

ROLFE, B.—The question in this case is very short, Louis Schwabe, in the year 1836, insured his own life for 999*l.*, in an office of which the plaintiffs in error were the directors, liable to be sued for money becoming due on the policies of insurance. The policy, by which the 999*l.* was insured, contained a clause in these words, "Every policy effected by a person on his own life shall be void if such person shall commit suicide, or die by duelling or the hands of justice." Schwabe died in 1845, and the defendant in error obtained letters of administration, and then sued the plaintiffs in error in an action of assumpsit for the 999*l.* secured by the policy. The plaintiffs in error pleaded, that Louis Schwabe did commit suicide, whereby the policy became void. On this issue was joined. The issue was tried, before my Brother Cresswell, at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, last year; and, on the part of the plaintiffs in error, witnesses were called to prove that Schwabe's death was caused by his having voluntarily, and for the purpose of killing himself, swallowed a quantity of sulphuric acid; and the same witnesses also gave evidence tending to shew that at the time of his so swallowing the said sulphuric acid Louis Schwabe was of unsound mind. My Brother Cresswell, in summing up the case to the jury, told them that in order to find the issue for the plaintiffs in error, they must be satisfied that Schwabe died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act he was doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent. To this ruling the plaintiffs in error have excepted, and we have, therefore, to say whether that ruling was right, and this depends on the meaning of the words in the policy "shall commit suicide." If they mean shall destroy his own life under circumstances which will make him a felo de se, then the ruling was right; if they mean merely "shall intentionally kill himself," then the ruling was wrong. The word "suicide" is not, as it appears to me, a word of art, to which any legal meaning is to be affixed different from that which it is popularly understood to bear. The authorities referred to by the defendant in error, as shewing that "suicide" means the felonious taking away of a man's own life, do not at all bear out his proposition.

Lord Hale, indeed, in the 31st chapter of his Pleas of the Crown, vol. 1. p. 411, certainly speaks of felo de se and suicide as convertible terms, and defines both the one and the other as being where a man of the age of discretion, and compos mentis, voluntarily kills himself. But it appears to me plain, from the whole context of the passage in question, that Lord Hale did not understand that he was giving a definition of the term "suicide," except as it was often used to mean the same thing as felo de se; and this seems manifest from the fact, that what in the passage in question he calls "suicide" he, a few lines above, designates as homicidium sui ipsius. Now, there can be no doubt but that a man who takes away the life of another, commits homicide, even though the act was justifiable, or may have happened entirely per infortunium, and was, therefore, not criminal at all—see Hale, P.C. c. 39. And therefore, taking "suicide" as meaning the same thing as homicide of one's self, it seems to follow that in the opinion of Lord Hale, neither guilt nor moral responsibility is necessarily involved in its legal definition.

The passage to which we were referred in 4 Black. Com. 189, seems strongly to shew that "suicide" does not, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Blackstone, necessarily include the notion of moral responsibility. The learned commentator, after stating that the party who destroys himself is not felo de se unless he was in his senses, adds, that "coroners' juries are apt to push this principle too far, and to hold that the very act of suicide is evidence of insanity." It is plain that the word "suicide" is there used as designating the mere act of self-destruction, otherwise the passage would be insensible. The only other authority referred to, in which the word "suicide" occurs, is the recent case of Borradaile v. Hunter, which was an action, like this, on a policy of insurance, in which was a stipulation making it void, not, as in this case, if the party should commit suicide, but if he should die by his own hands. There a majority of the Court held that, the assured having intentionally destroyed himself, though he was at the time incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, the policy was void. Tindal, C.J. differed from the rest of the Court, and, at p. 668 of Man. & Gr., the following passage occurs:—"The expression 'dying by his own hand' is, in fact, no more than the translation into English of the word of Latin origin 'suicide;' but if the exception had run in the terms 'shall die by suicide,' or by the hands of justice, or in consequence of a duel, surely no doubt could have arisen that a felonious suicide was intended thereby." This, though it certainly shews that Lord Chief Justice Tindal would, from the context, have interpreted the word "suicide" in this policy as he did the words "die by his own hands," in Borradaile v. Hunter, as referring only to cases of self-destruction, perpetrated by persons of sound mind, yet shews also that he did not think that to be the necessary or natural meaning of the word "suicide" standing alone. The distinction between felonious suicide, and suicide not felonious, taken and observed on by the Chief Justice, seems conclusively to shew, that, in his opinion, suicide did not necessarily ex vi termini import a criminal act, and therefore the act of a responsible moral agent; and in the same case, near the bottom of p. 688, Mr. Justice Erskine speaks of criminal suicide, shewing that he took the same view of the meaning of the word "suicide" as was taken by the Lord Chief Justice. All these authorities seem to me to favour my interpretation of this word; but after all, our decision must rest entirely on what is the ordinary meaning of the term. In my opinion, every act of self-destruction is, in common language, described by the word "suicide," provided it is the intentional act of a party, knowing the probable consequence of what he is about. This is, I think, the ordinary meaning of the word, and I see nothing in the context enabling me to give it any but its ordinary signification. For these reasons, I think, there must be judgment for the plaintiff in error, and that a venire de novo must be awarded.

PATTESON, J. (5).—The sole question is, what is the true meaning of the words, "commit suicide," in the policy in question? It is argued, first, that these words have a technical meaning, and import a felony. No authority is cited for this position, no case in which the finding of a jury, that A. had "committed suicide," has been held equivalent to a finding that A. had murdered himself, or that A. was "felon of himself." I apprehend that the word "murdravit" was as necessary in a case of felo de se, as in the case of the murder of another person; and unless some records could be found, or some decisions of the courts, in which the word "suicide" has been held to have the same meaning as "self-murder," I am at a loss to know what ground there is for saying that the words "commit suicide" have any technical meaning. It is argued, secondly, that the words in their ordinary acceptance import felony. Now, the word "suicide," literally translated, means only "killing himself or herself." The circumstances attending the act manifestly cannot affect the literal meaning of the word. Reference is made to Hale's Pleas of the Crown, c. 31, where Lord Hale, in speaking of the different kinds of murder, speaks of suicide, felo de se. No doubt he does, but he is treating of criminal suicide only, and he nowhere intimates that the word "suicide" in itself imports criminal suicide. Johnson's Dictionary and Richardson's Dictionary are also referred to, but they are of very little weight, when the Court is considering what the parties to a contract mean by the words they have used. The word "commit" is said always to be used in a bad sense—be it so; but how does that prove that it communicates the quality of felonious to the word "suicide"? No suicide is good or meritorious; it must always be spoken of in a bad sense, however pitiable, or, one may hope, excusable, the circumstances of it may be. But it is argued, thirdly, which is the true question, that a felonious suicide only is pointed at by this policy, and that this appears by the words themselves and by the context. Now, the words themselves are large enough to embrace all self-destruction, as well as self-murder; not, indeed, as was admitted in Borradaile v. Hunter, to embrace cases of mere accident, or of insanity extending to unconsciousness of the act done, or of its physical consequences, because such cases, although comprehended in the very words themselves, cannot be considered to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties; but clearly embracing an act of self-destruction committed by a person who was aware of the probable consequence of the act, and intended that consequence to follow. The context in this case, as in that of Borradaile v. Hunter, is, "or die by duelling or the hands of justice," except that in that case the words were "die by his own hands, or by the hands of justice, or in consequence of a duel," so that the verb "die" applied to all the members of the sentence; whereas here the words "commit suicide" are complete as a sentence, without any word taken from the other part. I do not know that this makes any difference. It is true that the other two modes of death appear to be connected with felony; yet I apprehend that the actual felony is no part of the cause of exception from liability. If it were it would be competent to the plaintiffs to prove that the deceased, although dying by the hands of justice, was in truth innocent of the crime for which he suffered, in the same manner as it is, no doubt, competent to an executor to traverse an inquest of felo de se found upon view of the body of his testator by a coroner's jury; or that the deceased, although killed in a duel, had fired his pistol in the air, and never contemplated shooting at his opponent. Such defences would surely be excluded, for the words of the exception are express, "die by the hands of justice," whether justly or not, or "by duelling," whether it were felony or not. It seems, in truth, that the exception is not framed with reference to the commission of any felony or crime, but to guard against the time for payment of the sum insured being accelerated by the voluntary act of the party interested in the money. It is equally so accelerated by a voluntary act, if the deceased knew the consequences of his act, and intended them to follow, whether he were sane or under some delusion as to the moral quality of the act done. That the voluntary act of the party interested, and not the felony, is the thing contemplated by the exception, is further apparent from this circumstance, that the clause in the policy goes on to do away with the exception altogether where the deceased has parted with all interest, either for himself or his family, by assigning the policy, and when the deceased has mortgaged or charged it for the benefit of creditors, to do away with the exception to the extent of the sum secured; yet felony would be committed in those cases just as much as if the policy had not been assigned. I do not inquire into the reason of this qualification of the exception in the policy, whether it has any thing to do with the removal from the deceased of temptation to destroy himself, when he has parted with his interest, or not, or whether it is inserted as an inducement to those who want to raise money to effect policies at this office, or what other reason may be conjectured. It is sufficient for my purpose that it tends to shew that the contracting parties did not regard the commission of felony as such in their contract. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the words "commit suicide," mean only "kill himself;" and that the true question to be put to the jury is, that which was put by Mr. Justice Erskine, in Borradaile v. Hunter, whether the deceased knew the probable consequences of his act, and did that act voluntarily, intending such consequences to follow, and that no question should be put as to the act done being criminal or not. It follows then, in my opinion, the judgment must be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

(5) Coleridge, J. was absent, but it was understood that he concurred in opinion with the majority of the Judges.

ALDERSON, B.—I also am of opinion that there ought to be a venire de novo in this case; and I shall say but a very few words upon the points raised. The true principle governing cases of this sort seems to be very well laid down by Mr. Justice Maule, in Borradaile v. Hunter. The words in question seem to me in this case to have their proper construction, when taken as including all cases of voluntary self-destruction. They do not apply to cases in which the will is not exercised at all; as, where death results from accident or delirium; but where the self-destruction is voluntary, although the will may be perverted. It seems to me, therefore, that the argument arising out of the peculiar use of the word "suicide," in this contract, is fallacious; and that the word is often used in its most extended sense, that, namely, which has been assigned to it on behalf of the plaintiffs in error. For instance, to take so common a book as the Encyclopædia Britannica, under the head of "suicide," I find this observation: "The general causes of suicide are twofold—insanity and crime." So that the word "suicide" has often, in its ordinary acceptation in the English language, that enlarged sense; and it is not, therefore, to be confined to cases of criminal intention alone. Then reliance is placed upon the words in the company of which the word "suicide" is found in the policy—"death by duelling or by the hands of justice." I doubt, however, whether that argument carries the case much further. Suppose a person insured were to die in a duel, I do not conceive it would be competent to his representatives to say that he was insane at the time. Cases may easily be suggested, in which a duel might be fatal, and yet not felonious; such as a duel in the course of war or the like. The case, however, has been so fully gone into by those learned Judges who have immediately preceded me, that I shall do no more than express my concurrence with their judgments.

PARKE, B.—The question in this case may be very shortly stated. By the terms of the policy, all the conditions and regulations indorsed are incorporated in it; and one of these (the sixth) is, that every policy effected by a person on his own life shall be void, if such person shall commit suicide, or die by duelling or the hands of justice: and there is a plea, that the intestate did commit suicide.

On the trial, my Brother Cresswell told the jury, "that, in order to find the said issue for the defendants, it was necessary that the jury should be satisfied that Schwabe died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act that he was doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent; that the burthen of proof as to his dying by his own voluntary act was on the defendants, but that being established, the jury must assume that he was of sane mind, and a responsible moral agent, unless the contrary should appear in evidence. The question is, whether this direction was correct. I agree with the majority of the Judges who have preceded me, that part of the direction, viz. that as to the necessity of his being a responsible moral agent, was wrong; for I think that, according to the proper construction of this policy, if the intestate voluntarily killed himself, it was immaterial whether he was then sane or not. This being a written contract between the parties, the construction of it belongs to the Court; and the Court must adopt the usual rules, and construe the provisos or conditions, as well as the other parts of the instrument, according to the ordinary meaning of the language used: except that terms of art or technical words must be understood in their proper sense, unless the context controuls or alters their meaning: ancient words may be explained by contemporaneous usage; and words which have acquired a peculiar sense by usage in particular districts, occupations, or trades, must be read (the usage being found by the jury) in their acquired sense. Here, there is no occasion for any of these exceptions in construing this instrument. The two latter are inapplicable, and there is no ground for saying that the word "suicide" is a legal technical term or word of art. An inquisition stating that the deceased committed suicide would be clearly informal and bad. Nor have we a decision of any court on the meaning of these precise words, by which we should consider ourselves bound. The case of Borradaile v. Hunter certainly is not such; nor can the intimation of the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice Tindal, by way of illustration of his argument, as to the meaning of the expressions now under consideration, have the same effect as a decision.

The whole question resolves itself into an inquiry as to the sense of words used in the ordinary language of the present day, the instrument to be construed bearing date in the year 1836; and we are all perfectly competent to form an opinion upon such a subject, and need not refer to lexicographers, or authors, ancient or modern. If the case depended on the explanation given by dictionaries, the result, nevertheless, would be the same. Johnson, indeed, explains the word "suicide" by "self-murder: the horrid crime of destroying oneself," which, no doubt, it includes. Webster has both "self-murder" and "the act of designedly destroying one-self," and adds, "to constitute suicide, the person must be of years of discretion," and refers to Blackstone, inaccurately; for the passage in that author applies to persons being felo de se. Richardson, who states them to be words of modern formation, as "the slaying of himself, or self-murder." But the question does not depend upon the opinion of such authors; for, though they are authorities, they are not conclusive; the case turns on the meaning of the vernacular language which we now use; and I must own that I feel no doubt as to the import of the expression "commit suicide." In ordinary parlance every one would so speak of one who had purposely killed himself, whether from tedium of life, or transport of grief, or in a fit of temporary insanity. "To die by his own hands," or "to commit suicide," seems to me to be all one, and to apply to all cases of voluntary self-homicide; and I do not see any reason why a different sense from the ordinary one should be attributed to these words in this instrument; on the contrary, I see very good ground for believing that they are used in their ordinary sense, in order to avoid the consequence which would have followed the adoption of such words as "committing felony of himself," or "self-murder;" as it may be well supposed that juries would, in favour of the family of the deceased, take the same lax view of the evidence as coroners' juries generally do.

I think that the judgment ought to be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I regret that I differ from the majority of the Court who have already delivered their opinions; but as, after the fullest deliberation, I feel compelled to come to the conclusion that the direction of my Brother Cresswell to the jury at the trial, was correct in point of law, and that the plaintiff below is entitled to our judgment, it is my duty, with whatever reluctance and hesitation, to state my own view of the case, and the reasons upon which that conclusion is founded. The question, in point of form, has been so clearly stated already, that it is unnecessary to state it again; but, in substance, it is, what is the meaning of the words "commit suicide" in the policy in question? Does the expression mean and include that the party was compos mentis? that he was a responsible being, capable of distinguishing right from wrong,—as stated by my Brother Cresswell? or, is the expression applicable to a person who intentionally produces his own death (that is, uses the means of destruction, with a knowledge of the effects they will produce, and with the intention of producing them), but whose understanding, judgment, or will, is so perverted by disease that he has ceased to be responsible criminally for his conduct?—in short, who is insane (possibly) upon every other point but the physical effects of using a deadly weapon, or the result of applying adequate means to produce the destruction of life? In considering the question, everything turns on the meaning of the words as ordinarily occurring in the English language and in English authorities, and especially in books written on law or morals. Now, what is the meaning of the word "suicide," merely as an English word, according to the best authorities? Does it mean the killing of one's-self in the same way as "homicide" means simply the killing of a human being—whether by accident, negligence, or in self-defence? or, does it imply a criminal taking away of one's own life? The word is of modern origin; it does not occur in the Bible, or in any English author before the reign of Charles II.; probably not till after the reign of Anne. As far as I have been able to trace it, it first occurs as an English word in Hale's Pleas of the Crown. Hale was a Judge during the Commonwealth, and died in 1676. His work was published in 1736. It is not in Hawkins, first published in 1716; but it is to be found in Blackstone. These, as legal authorities, will be adverted to presently; but I wish to notice first the authorities not legal. The meaning assigned to the word by Johnson, in his Dictionary, is, "self-murder—the horrid crime of destroying one's self—a self-murderer;" and he gives no other signification. In Richardson's Dictionary it is, "the slayer of himself;"

also, "the slaying of himself, self-murder." In the Dictionnaire Universel of the French language, published in 1771, it is said that the word was introduced into the French language by the Abbé Desfontaines; and a quotation is given from his works, where it is manifestly used in the sense given to it by Johnson. Desfontaines was born in 1685, and died in 1745. In the year 1644 was published, with the works of John Donne (the poet), Dean of St. Paul's, who died in 1631, his "Βιαβάρος, a Declaration on that Paradox or Thesis that Self-homicide is not so naturally Sin that it may never be otherwise." The word "suicide" does not occur in this work; from which it may be presumed that it was not then in general use, and perhaps was not in use at all. In 1785, Archdeacon Paley published his work on The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy. The third chapter of book iv. is on "suicide." Throughout that chapter the word is used as denoting the act of a reasonable, moral, and responsible agent; and in no other sense. In 1790, Charles Moore, M.A., Rector of Cuxton, in Kent, published "A full Inquiry into the subject of Suicide; to which are added (as being closely connected with the subject) two Treatises on Duelling and Gaming." Page 4. contains the following passage:—"There are points, then, to be settled, and exceptions to be made, previous to a general charge of guilt on all who put a sudden end to their own lives. For, though every person who terminates his mortal existence by his own hand commits suicide, yet he does not therefore always commit murder, which alone constitutes its guilt. Some distinction is necessary in regard to a man's killing himself, as it would be had he killed another person; which latter he may do either inadvertently or legally, and therefore, in either case, innocently, and without the imputation of being the murderer of another. When a man kills himself inadvertently or involuntarily, it comes under the legal description of accidental death, or per infortunium; but, as to his doing it legally, the law allows of no such case. The only instance of innocence which it allows to the commission of voluntary suicide, is in the case of madness; when a man being deemed under no moral guidance, can be subject to no imputation of guilt on account of his behaviour to himself or others."

In the Encyclopædia Britannica, the explanation of the word "suicide," is "the crime of self-murder," or "the person who commits it." There is a treatise on law, in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, in which suicide is spoken of: it is in the second volume of Pure Sciences, 'On Offences against Self.' Speaking of the cases where society may interfere to prevent or punish, the writer says—"This observation applies to suicide, the greatest offence a man can commit against himself." These are all the lay authorities I think it necessary to refer to.

But there are legal authorities, which, if unopposed by other and greater authorities, I should deem binding and conclusive upon the subject, in a court of law. Hale, in the work already alluded to, defines felo de se or suicide to be "where a man of the age of discretion, and compos mentis, voluntarily kills himself, by stabbing, poison, or any other way." Judge Blackstone, in his Commentaries, first published in 1765-1768, uses the word in connexion with self-murder, and in the same sense as Hale. In Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, first published in 1760, it is said—"By the rubric before the burial office, persons who have laid violent hands upon themselves shall not have that office used at their interment. And the reason thereof given by the common law is, because they die in the commission of a mortal sin; and therefore this extendeth not to idiots, lunatics, or persons otherwise of insane mind, or children under the age of discretion or the like. So also not to those who do it involuntarily, as, where a man kills himself by accident; for, in such case, it is not their crime, but their very great misfortune." The 4 Geo. 2. c. 52. relates only to felo de se; but the editor says, "Suicides are to be buried in the churchyard at night, but no service is to be performed over them." In Jacob's Law Dictionary, in the edition of 1772, under title 'Suicide,' reference is made to title 'Self-murder,' where it is said that "self-murder is ranked amongst the highest crimes, being a peculiar species of felony—a felony committed on one's self. The party must be in his senses, else it is no crime. In this, as well as all other felonies, the offender must be of the age of discretion, and compos mentis: and, therefore, an infant killing himself, under the age of discretion, or a lunatic during his lunacy, cannot be a felo de se." Blackstone says, "Self-murder, the pretended heroism, but real cowardice, of the stoic philosophers, who destroyed themselves to avoid those evils which they had not fortitude to endure, though the attempting it seems to be countenanced by the civil law, yet was punished, by the Athenian law, with cutting off the hand which committed the desperate deed. And also the law of England wisely and religiously considers that no man hath a power to destroy life, but by commission from God, the author of it, and as the suicide is guilty of a double offence—one spiritual, in invading the prerogative of the Almighty, and rushing into his immediate presence uncalled for—the other temporal, against the king, who hath an interest in the preservation of all his subjects; the law has, therefore, ranked this among the highest crimes, making it a peculiar species of felony—a felony committed on one's self. A felo de se, therefore, is he that deliberately puts an end to his own existence, or commits any unlawful malicious act, the consequence of which is his own death: as if, in attempting to kill another, he runs upon his antagonist's sword; or, shooting at another, the gun bursts, and kills himself. The party must be of years of discretion, and in his senses, else it is no crime." It should seem, therefore, that the word has never been used by law writers, except in the sense of a criminal taking away of one's own life; at least, I am not aware of any instance in any law writer of its use in any other sense.

It may be presumed that the word is of legal introduction, and was perhaps first taken from the law writers by Archdeacon Paley. It has since become a word of general use: but I am not aware of any authority by which it can be shewn that it has lost the meaning to express which it was originally framed, or adopted from some other language. And I think it is clear that, although it may possibly sometimes admit, in modern times, of a more loose and vague interpretation, it certainly may mean self-destruction by a person compos mentis, and morally responsible for his acts; and the question is, whether that meaning is or is not what was intended by the parties to this contract.

Now, in this policy, I find it coupled with the word "commit;" the expression is, "commit suicide." The meaning of "commit" in Johnson (with reference to this use of the word) is "to perpetrate—to do a fault—to be guilty of a crime;" and "perpetrate" is, to commit, to act—always in an ill sense. There is no material difference in Richardson. If, therefore, it be admitted, as I think it must, that one meaning of "suicide" imports, not merely an act, but a criminal act, the use of the expression "commit suicide" is some, and I own I think a strong, reason for believing that the parties to this contract used the word in that sense. The sentence also in which it is found, may throw some light on the matter. It is coupled with death by duelling or by the hands of justice; and the condition is not, if the party shall die by suicide, but if he shall "commit suicide." I think this imports some deliberate criminal act, and not an act the result of insanity, which leaves him intelligence enough to know the means of death, but without any moral controul over his actions.

Again, does the nature of the instrument itself supply any argument either way? The object of such a policy is, generally, to make provision for the family of the insured; and he would naturally desire to include all risks. It is admitted, that he is protected, not only against the common chances of death by disease, but against accident, or mere negligence of the grossest kind. He may even be the immediate cause of his own death by a deadly weapon, provided he be so insane as to be utterly unconscious of what he is doing. But according to the argument for the defendants below, if he retains a glimmering of reason just enough to enable him to seek to produce death by competent means—it matters not whether he be lost to all moral sense, and for any other act or crime a complete madman;—his policy is forfeited. I own I cannot, from the nature of the contract, believe that this was what the parties intended. A man anxious to provide for his family would, among the possible calamities of life that might terminate it, anticipate madness as one; and, whether it prostrated his intellect altogether, or produced delusion, or destroyed only a part of his faculties, would make no difference. The language used in the agreement between the parties does not necessarily exclude this risk. I think, therefore, as against the office, the risk ought to be included.

Examining the question upon more general principles, I am induced to come to the same conclusion. In the eye of the law, with reference to crime, a man is either compos mentis and responsible, or he is non compos mentis and irresponsible. Physiologically, no doubt, it is otherwise: and the gradations are, perhaps, imperceptible, from the highest perfection of intellect to the darkest obscuration of the mind. But, in point of law, as soon as it is ascertained that a person (to use the language of my Brother Cresswell in directing the jury) has lost his sense of right and wrong, it matters not what else of the human faculties or capacities remain; he ceases to be a responsible agent; and, in my judgment, can no more commit suicide than he can commit murder.

Lastly, the view taken by the defendant's counsel appears to me to be opposed to all the principles of sound philosophy which can be applied to the subject. It is admitted, of course, that the office would be liable, if death ensued from any of the ordinary casualties of life, even resulting from the act of the party insured, provided the act were not done with the intention to kill. The act of a raving madman, or of a patient under the influence of a disease, is protected by the policy, if the consequences are not foreseen and intended. So, if insanity should produce delusion, and deprive a man of the use of the ordinary senses, and the party should mistake a deadly weapon for an instrument of music, and fancy he was playing upon it, when he was destroying his own life, this would not be committing suicide within the proviso of the policy. But, what if the delusion, instead of applying to a pistol, or other instrument of death, applied to the man himself? Suppose he believed he was Marcus Curtius, and ought to leap into a gulf? or that he was one of the Decii, and must sacrifice himself for the benefit of his country? or, what, if he fancied himself an apostle, and that it became his duty to die the death of a martyr? What sound philosophy is there in taking a distinction between a delusion about a pistol, and a delusion in respect of the man against whom it may be directed? or, what distinction, in point of good sense, can be taken between physical blindness, in consequence of which the party insured walks into a well, and intellectual or moral blindness, which, leaving him the use of his senses, and a knowledge of the physical consequences of his acts, has deprived him of all judgment which should controul and govern his acts, and of all sense to perceive their moral consequences? It may be said, that, when the delusion extends to the character, office, or condition of the party,—so that he mistakes his identity,—he does not mean to kill himself, and in such a case the office would be liable. But how far is this to be carried? Suppose, under a delusion, he believed he had committed a crime for which he ought to put himself to death, and that this was the result of insanity—is this a mistake of his identity? and how is a Judge to direct a jury so as to steer clear of the difficulties that would thus arise? In my opinion, such subtleties as these ought to find no place in the decision of such a question as the present, in which is involved (from the present extensive practice of life insurance) the peace, the happiness and security of thousands of families. Some simple, clear, and safe rule ought to be laid down as to a subject in which the public is so deeply interested. In my judgment, if death be the result of disease—whether by affecting the senses or the reason—the insurance office is liable under this policy. Whether the privation of reason be total or partial, whether it produce delusion of one kind or another—whether it affects sensation, apprehension, memory, judgment, or will, or any of the moral and intellectual powers which constitute our nature—if the act be not the act of a sane responsible creature, but is the result of any delusion or perversion, whether physical, intellectual, or moral, it is not the act of the man: and, to hold otherwise seems to me a departure from the simplicity of the law, and to be repugnant to sound philosophy, which is the spirit of all law, and on which all law ought to be founded. I will only add, that I have not adverted to the case of Borradaile v. Hunter, because the expression in that case—shall die by his own hand—is so different from the expression in this case—commit suicide—that the decision is no authority on the point arising here.

Judgment—Registration to bind Lands—Member of Banking Company.

The Court will not interfere to direct the senior Master to receive and register a memorandum for the purpose of binding real estate, pursuant to the provisions of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 19.

The Master received such a memorandum, the object of which was to bind the lands of a member of a banking Company by a judgment recovered against the public officer.

On the 11th of August 1847, John Ness recovered judgment in the Court of Exchequer, in an action brought against George Burdis, as one of the registered public officers of the North of England Joint Stock Banking Company, and at that time James Sanderson, of Berwick, was, as it appeared on affidavit, one of the members of the company named in the last general return made by the company to the Stamp Office, under the provisions of the 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. s. 4. Ness's attorney being desirous of charging Sanderson's real estate with this judgment, sent to the senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas a memorandum of the name, place of abode, and trade or profession of Sanderson, being the person whose estate was sought to be affected by the judgment, and of the Court and title of the cause in which the judgment had been obtained, and of the date thereof, and an account of the debt and costs thereby recovered, in order that the same might be registered by the senior Master pursuant to the provisions of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 19.

The Master refused to receive the memorandum without the sanction of the Court.

Manisty (Nov. 12) moved the Court for a direction to the senior Master to receive and register the memorandum. By the 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. s. 12. a judgment in an action at law against the public officer of a banking company renders the effects of every member of the co-partnership liable; and it is submitted that such a judgment operates as a judgment against every member. By the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 11. the sheriff is empowered to deliver execution of lands to a judgment creditor; and by section 13. judgment is to operate as a charge on all the real estate of the party against whom it is recovered. The 19th section provides that no judgment shall affect real estate unless and until a memorandum or minute such as that which has been presented in this case, be left with the senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas, who shall forthwith enter the same particulars in a book.

[MAULE, J.—The question is, whether the officer is not bound to register the memorandum forthwith. It would be extra-judicial to intimate an opinion to the officer as to his duty.]

WILDE, C.J.—I think we can make no order on this subject, as none which we could make would operate as a justification to the Master. We cannot now intimate an opinion on a matter which may hereafter come before us in a more serious form.

Application refused.

The senior Master of the Court subsequently received the proposed memorandum.

Prohibition — County Court — Jurisdiction.

The Judge of a County Court, notwithstanding an admission by the plaintiff that a plea of judgment recovered in another court for the same debt was true, gave judgment for the plaintiff.

This Court refused to grant a rule nisi for a prohibition, the question decided being within the jurisdiction of the Judge.

A summons was issued out of the county court for Cambridgeshire, at the suit of Toft, against Rayner, in an action for goods sold and delivered. Rayner appeared and pleaded that the plaintiff had already recovered judgment against him for the same debt in the borough court of Cambridge, and that execution had issued against his goods, and that they had been seized and sold. The pleadings in the county court being oral, the Judge asked the plaintiff whether the defendant's plea was true, and the plaintiff answered that it was true. The Judge, notwithstanding this admission, gave judgment for the plaintiff.

T. H. Naylor (Nov. 19) moved for a rule nisi for a prohibition.—The Judge of the county court had no jurisdiction. The matter was res judicata. Prohibition will lie after judgment—Gould v. Gapper (1).

[MAULE, J.—The difficulty is, that the defendant could not have moved for a prohibition as soon as the plea was pleaded.]

WILDE, C.J.—It seems to me that this was a matter within the jurisdiction of the Judge. He was obliged to decide whether the plea was a good or bad one; and we are not authorized to examine whether the judgment is good in law or not.

COLTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The cases in the spiritual courts are not by any means parallel to this. The Judges there do not act according to the common law.

MAULE, J.—This would have been a case for a writ of error, if that had not been taken away by the County Courts Act.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The ground of this motion is, that a Judge having jurisdiction has decided wrong, on a point of law. I am not sure, upon the statement before us, that the Judge has made a mistake.

Rule refused.

June 11. } RICKETTS v. BENNETT.

Mine—Company—Liability of Co-adventurers.

A, one of many co-adventurers in a mine, assumed the entire management of it, and, without the direction of his co-adventurers, opened an account with a banker in the name of the adventurers, and overdrew that account to a considerable amount. In assumpsit by the bankers against B. & F, two of A.'s co-adventurers in the mine for the balance of their account,—Held, that there was no implied authority to one adventurer from his co-adventurers in a mine to pledge their credit for money borrowed by him for the purposes of the mine.

This was an action of assumpsit, tried, before Platt, B., at the Cornwall Summer Assizes, 1846, to recover the sum of 3,618*l.*, the balance of a banking account. The declaration contained counts for money lent, for money paid, for work and labour, for commission, for interest, and on an account stated.

The defendants pleaded the general issue.

It appeared that the plaintiffs were bankers at Penzance, in Cornwall; the defendants, two of the adventurers in a mine, called the Wheal Providence Mine. A. Robinson, the manager of, and a co-adventurer in, the mine, opened an account with the bankers in September 1844, without the directions of the other shareholders, in the name of the "Wheal Providence Adventurers," and the account closed in the latter part of 1845, when the balance as above was found to be due to the plaintiffs. The mine was carried on upon the cost-book principle; it consisted of 128 shares, ninety-nine of which were purchased by one F. T. Robinson and his father A. Robinson, who thereupon took upon themselves respectively the offices of purser and manager, and kept the cost-book. The terms upon which the mining account was to be kept by the bank was discussed and agreed on by and between the plaintiffs and A. Robinson. The terms were, *that the bankers should advance money, and discount the ore notes of the Wheal Providence Mine at 4*l.* per cent., and an account was opened in* the bankers' books headed thus:—"Dr. Messrs. the Wheal Providence Adventurers in account with Ricketts & Co., Penzance, Cornwall." Cheques were drawn from time to time upon the bankers signed thus:—"For Wheal Providence Adventurers,

"Alexander Robinson."

The money paid for most of the cheques was expended on account and for the use of the mine: part of the advances had been appropriated to the payment of general dividends; but the proceeds of some of the cheques were applied by the Robinsons to their own private purposes. On the plaintiffs pressing for their balance at the close of the year 1845, A. Robinson ceased to manage the mine, and the other adventurers, when applied to, disclaimed all knowledge of the advances, and refused to recognize their liability to the plaintiffs. The learned Judge directed the jury that the mere character of a co-adventurer did not confer authority to borrow money so as to bind the other adventurers in a mine. He also left all the facts to the jury; who found that it could not be inferred from these, that authority to A. Robinson to borrow money was given or recognized by the other adventurers, and a verdict passed for the defendants.

Crowder had obtained a rule for a new trial, on the grounds that the Judge misdirected the jury, and that the verdict was against the evidence.

Butt, Kinglake, Serj., and Merivale shewed cause.—It was contended, on moving for this rule, that a mining company is an ordinary partnership, to which the usual incidents of partnership attached, and that each partner and co-adventurer has power to borrow money so as to bind his co-adventurers. The Judge denied that proposition, when urged by the plaintiff's counsel at the trial, and directed the jury that the mere relation of co-adventurers in a mining concern is not sufficient in point of law to confer upon each co-adventurer an authority to pledge the credit of his co-adventurers; and such ruling was quite correct. He also left all the facts to the jury; who found there was no authority, express or implied, conferred by the defendants upon Robinson to borrow money from the bankers, and therefore the Court will not disturb the verdict. That mining concerns are not ordinary cases of partnership, so as to authorize the other parties to draw bills, is established by Dickinson v. Valpy (1), or to borrow money, which is a much stronger exercise of authority, by Hawtayne v. Bourne (2), though such borrowing be for the necessary purposes of the mine. Besides, this mine was carried on on the cost-book principle, which is well understood, and it was proved before the jury that by the custom of such a mine borrowing is altogether forbidden; and the shares are transferred by a mere entry in the cost book. Such a mode of operation is very different from an ordinary partnership: it is more like a joint-stock company, and was excepted from the Joint Stock Companies Registration Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 103. s. 63, because its incidents were so perfectly well known and understood. The only remaining question is as to the verdict being against the evidence. A. Robinson was called, and his evidence negatived any express authority to borrow from the defendants. A. Robinson made the agreement with the bankers, drew all the cheques, and kept all the accounts: the defendants knew nothing of the accounts, and had nothing to do with the management of the mine. Nor is there any suggestion on the evidence that the bankers, to whom the plaintiffs were unknown, trusted to anything but the individual credit of the Robinsons. The fact of the cost book and the banker's pass book being kept in the room which had been entered on one or two occasions by the shareholders, was the only evidence from which a recognized or implied authority was to be inferred. It was not, however, shewn that the cost book or the pass book had been touched or even seen by the defendants; and if they had inspected the cost book the borrowing of money would not appear therein. The case was tried by a Cornish special jury well acquainted with the usual course of mining business, and nothing was withdrawn from their consideration. The fact of the defendants having twice received a small amount of dividends (though it turns out such dividends were paid out of the borrowed money), is strong to shew that they had no knowledge of the system pursued by their co-adventurer, whose conduct in so paying amounted to a deception, which it must be assumed they would not knowingly have sanctioned; and the very fact of receiving dividends which are represented to arise from the proceeds of the mine, negatives an implied authority to borrow for its support. The effect of the case of Tredwen v. Bourne (3) is, that though there may be special terms of carrying on the mine entered into between the adventurers inter se, such terms will not affect third parties without notice; but in that case, and also in Hawken v. Bourne (4), in both of which the defendant was held liable, there were letters from and acts of the defendant in evidence, shewing the interest and activity displayed by him in the management of the mine, and he was therefore held by his conduct to have authorized the directors to do what they did for his benefit; but there are no facts of that kind here, and in Tredwen v. Bourne, Parke, B. says: "If the case had stood merely on the fact of the defendant being a shareholder, I should have thought it was not sufficient;" and the only ground upon which this rule was granted was because the defendant was a co-adventurer. It was also proved that cheques were drawn for the private accommodation and use of the Robinsons, purporting to be for the purposes of the mine; and on that ground, even if one co-adventurer could bind the others, the defendant could not be fixed with this liability—Lloyd v. Freshfield (5). It was, no doubt, proved that the borrower was the manager of as well as a co-adventurer in the mine; but that relation does not, on legal principles, extend the liability of the co-adventurers for his acts, and as a question of fact it was fully and fairly laid before the jury.

Crowder, Channell, Serj. and Smirke, in support of the rule.—There are a great many facts admitted on both sides. That in ordinary trade partnerships, it may be presumed, that one partner may contract a loan on behalf of his co-partners; that it is usual in mining companies to open an account with a banker in the name of the firm; and that the great bulk of the money sought to be recovered in this case was expended upon the mine, or connected therewith. There is no very distinct authority as to the power of the partners in a mining partnership to borrow money; but it is said that as it has been decided they cannot draw bills of exchange—Dickinson v. Valpy, and the contracting of a loan is an operation of the same nature, therefore such an act is beyond their authority. But it has been decided in Tredwen v. Bourne and Hawken v. Bourne, that a partner in a mining concern can pledge the credit of the firm for goods necessary for the purposes of the mine; and there is no substantial difference between pledging credit for goods to be supplied, and for money borrowed to pay for them.

[WILDE, C.J.—Take the case of a botomry bond, would not that be bad if money were thereby raised to pay debts, but good if raised to get supplies? You might be willing to send your servant for 10*l.* worth of goods on credit, but you might not be willing to give him 10*l.* to get certain goods: an agency to get goods on credit is not the same as an agency to borrow money.]

It is submitted that the judgment of Littledale, J. in Dickinson v. Valpy goes too far; he there states that a mining company is not a regular trading company. But that the rules of partnership do apply to mining companies appears from the dictum of Parke, B. in Tredwen v. Bourne, from Ferday v. Wightwick (6), and from Crawshaw v. Maule (7).

MAULE, J.—Those cases in Chancery shew that there is a difference in mining partnerships from other kinds of partnership: in the latter, the death of one causes a dissolution of the partnership; in the former the share survives to the executor, who is intruded in invitum on his co-partners. Mines are not very unlike ships: the owners there may undertake a joint adventure, or give a joint authority to a managing owner; but the mere relation of co-part-owners would not make them liable.]

In ordinary trade partnerships each partner can borrow money for the firm. Ex parte Bland (8) was the case of a ship, and there the Lord Chancellor lays it down as a general proposition, that all the owners are liable, unless excluded by the terms of the contract. Sandilands v. Marsh (9) decides, that navy agents can borrow; and that case even goes further, and decides that a co-partner is liable on a guarantie, which is stronger than a loan. Insurance-brokers can borrow—Ex parte Bonbonus (10); and in Thicknesse v. Bromilow (11) it was assumed that one partner in a stone and slate mine could borrow and bind his co-partners. It is said that, because this is not a scrip mine, but one established on the cost-book principle, therefore the ordinary rules of partnership do not apply; but that principle does not affect this question: the cost-book is simply a book in which the accounts for and against each partner are regularly kept. It is submitted that these partnerships are like all other partnerships, the power of drawing bills of exchange excepted, and so far only is Dickinson v. Valpy an authority. But there are particular reasons for that exception. In all cases bills of exchange interfere with the rights of set-off, and if they get into the hands of third parties, no defence of fraud or want of consideration between the original parties can be set up; and the form of the bill was peculiar in Dickinson v. Valpy, making the mining company a bank of issue. There can be no kind of partnership to which the power of borrowing appears more naturally to attach than a mining partnership: their whole system is one of borrowing; they pay for everything by discounting their ore notes, as the ore cannot be realized immediately; and that is really a borrowing from, and a loan by, the discounter, on the security of such notes. The question of convenience, and the necessary state of the accounts in a mining concern, imports an authority to borrow. The learned Judge simply directed the jury that there was no authority in a co-adventurer to borrow money. The point should have been left to them as it was by Rolfe, B. in Tredwen v. Bourne: "If they were satisfied that the defendant was a shareholder, and knew of the concern being carried on by the directors and the parties in their employ, in the manner it was, he was liable."

[MAULE, J.—There is no complaint of non-leaving: the complaint is, that the jury were misdirected as to the power of a co-adventurer.]

[CRESSWELL, J.—"In the manner it was," there was no evidence of that here.]

The only difference in a cost-book mine from others is, that the shares can be more easily transferred; the liabilities of shareholders to third parties is the same as in a scrip mine, or other trading partnership. Cost-book mines are exempted from the provisions of the Joint Stock Registration Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, by the 63rd section, and are excepted because the ordinary rules of partnership are applicable to them. Then, on the evidence, A. Robinson was manager, as well as co-adventurer, and this was well known to the defendants; he opened an account with the plaintiffs, and borrowed money from them, which for the most part (2,500*l.* at the least) was expended on the mine; they have had the benefit of it, and to that extent, at least, must be held liable. The manager of a mine is chosen by the body of shareholders, and they are liable for his acts.

[WILDE, C.J.—Is it or is it not necessary that the manager should have power to borrow?—that is the question.]

It must have been known to them that the mining accounts were kept by a banker; such is the usual course of trade in mines, whether they be scrip mines or on the cost-book principle.

[MAULE, J.—It may be the manager had authority to open an account. A banker is like an iron chest. But had he authority to borrow money from him?]

They had received dividends by cheques on the agents of these bankers in London; they had access to the cost book and pass book of the bankers, and whether they inspected them or not they had ample means of knowledge, and that is sufficient to render them liable. The authority to borrow should have been inferred from the ordinary course of dealing, as in Whitehead v. Tuckett (12); and the facts here proved are even stronger than those in Tredwen v. Bourne and Hawken v. Bourne, wherein the defendant was held liable. The party who ordered the goods in those cases was the manager; so he is here, with the character of co-adventurer superadded. The plaintiffs are quite within the judgment of Parke, B. in that case, and that decision is very much in their favour:—"There was evidence that he was a complete partner with the directors in working the mines in the manner they were worked; and one partner, by virtue of that relation, is constituted a general agent for another as to all matters within the scope of the partnership dealings, and has communicated to him, by virtue of that relation, all authorities necessary for carrying on the partnership, and all such as are usually exercised by partners in that business in which they are engaged."

[MAULE, J.—The effect of that decision is to say the Judge did not misdirect the jury. The expressions of Parke B. are not to be strained to the fullest extent, but must be taken with reference to what he was then referring to.]

WILDE, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.—This was a motion for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection and of the verdict being against evidence. The facts of the case appear to be, that A. Robinson and his son were the owners of ninety-nine shares in the mine, the defendants of a small number, four or five each. A. Robinson, though not the pursuer of the mine, assumed the controul of the management, and continued doing so from the time of the purchase of his shares to the closing of the bankers' account. During this time he opened an account with the plaintiffs, who were bankers. He had a private account of his own at the bank, but he opened the account in question in the name of the adventurers. That account opens with borrowing 280*l.*, to pay the Helston bank a private account of Robinson & Son. At the time of the opening this account, he communicates with the manager of the bank that loans will be required, and that as they will be large he is only to pay 4*l.* per cent. interest upon them. It is then afterwards stated in the evidence that, because they are so large, the interest was increased to

5l. per cent. Money is advanced to Robinson to pay the dividends; but he does not at the time draw out the amount of his own dividend, but afterwards draws various sums, which he states in his evidence were for his dividend. The bank pay his cheques, and in the result the account is overdrawn to the amount claimed. The defendants received certain sums as dividends; but there was no notice to them that the payment was made out of borrowed money, nor that there was such an account as that in question at the bank: and when the fact is first communicated to them, they say that they had no notice. The plaintiffs' case was not very distinctly put at the trial, nor in the argument before us: it was not stated whether the plaintiffs insisted that the defendants were liable simply as being shareholders, or as being shareholders and partners with the manager. It is, however, material to distinguish between the two, and the only difficulty arises from the distinction not having been taken. First, then, as to the misdirection. The Judge told the jury that the defendants were not liable simply as co-adventurers, and, independently of all other circumstances, for money borrowed by a co-adventurer. This is a distinct point. The ruling, however, is not simply this, because the Judge says, "there may be an express authority, or one that is implied, arising from the other adventurer being the manager of the concern; and he then left it to the jury to say whether, by reason of Robinson being the manager, there was any implied authority. The misdirection applies only to the first part. What authority, then, is there for holding that it was a misdirection? In general trading concerns all partners are supposed to be equally in the management of the concern; and an authority to bind the co-partners to a very large extent is, therefore, implied. But is that so as to co-adventurers? By no means. It is well known that the fact is contrary, and that only certain individuals have the management. If, as a principle of law, one co-adventurer had the power, independently of management, to bind his co-adventurers, would it not be inconsistent with the carrying on of the mine? It can only be in consequence of having the management; and, if so, the authority results from the management, and not from being a co-adventurer. Any express authority was, in the present case, negatived by the evidence of Robinson. Every case that has been decided, when examined, shews that the ruling of the Judge on the present occasion was correct. In Dickinson v. Valpy, the question was, whether a co-adventurer was liable upon a bill of exchange, drawn and accepted by the directors of the mining company. How did the Court treat the question? Lord Tenterden says, "I am of opinion that the mere circumstance of the defendant having become a shareholder in a mining company does not, in point of law, make him answerable for bills drawn or accepted by those who took upon themselves to manage the concern." And Bayley, J. says, "In order to establish his liability, it ought to have been made out affirmatively, on the part of the plaintiff, that this was a company in which the directors were authorized to bind the other members by drawing and accepting bills. Now upon that point the only question which could be submitted to the jury was, whether companies instituted for similar purposes had constantly been in the habit of drawing and accepting bills; or whether it was absolutely necessary, for the purpose of carrying on the concern, that there should have been such a power. There was no evidence to warrant the Judge in leaving those questions to the jury. First, there was no evidence for them that such a power was usually vested in the directors of other companies, or that it was necessary for the purpose of carrying on such a concern. I think that such a power is not necessary for that purpose;" and then he says, "The directors may bind themselves personally, and pledge their own responsibility, but not that of the other members." And Littledale, J. says, "In the case of an ordinary trading partnership the law implies that one partner has authority to bind another, by drawing and accepting bills, because the drawing and accepting of bills is necessary for the purposes of carrying on a trading partnership; but it does not follow that it is necessary for the purpose of carrying on the business of a mining company:" and the judgment of Parke, B. is to the same effect;—the result of the whole being, that in a partnership for the working of mines only such authority will be implied by law in a co-adventurer as is usual and necessary for the purpose of carrying on the concern. The next case is that of Tredwen v. Bourne, where goods were supplied on credit for the use of the mine, by order of the directors. The Judge there left it to the jury with the direction, that if they were satisfied the defendant was a shareholder, and knew of the concern being carried on by the directors and the parties in their employ in the manner in which it was, he was liable in the action. I find there that Mr. Crowder stated, "The business of a mine is carried on quite differently from that of an ordinary trading firm: regular calls are made as money is wanted for the purpose of the partnership, which are paid down; and the directors have only authority to manage the concern with the funds so supplied, but not to pledge the credit of individual shareholders." I believe, with respect to a cost-book mine, the statement is quite correct. Parke, B. there says, "The directors have authority to do all that it is usual to do in the management of mining companies." There is nothing in that case inconsistent with the ruling now complained of; and Parke, B. in his judgment says, "If the case had merely stood on the fact of his being a shareholder, I should have thought it was not sufficient;" just what was said in this case. That case therefore is a distinct authority in favour of the present ruling. The next case of importance is Hawtayne v. Bourne. There a debt was incurred by the agent of the mine for the payment of wages due to the labourers in the mine, and who had obtained warrants of distress upon the materials. The consequences of such a seizure would in all probability have been, that the mine would have been filled with water, and very great expense incurred in afterwards clearing it. My Brother Maule there left it to the jury, "that although under ordinary circumstances an agent could not, without express authority, borrow money in the name of his principal, so as to bind him, yet, if it became absolutely necessary to raise money in order to preserve the property of the principal, the law would imply an authority in the agent to do so, to the extent of that necessity: and he left it to the jury to say, whether the pressure on the concern was such as to render the advance of this money a case of such necessity;" and the jury found that there was such a necessity. The Court of Exchequer however granted a new trial, saying, that this was not within the ordinary authority of an agent, and that such an authority was not to be inferred. We have therefore the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, that it is not a sudden necessity which will give an agent authority to borrow money; and nothing appears in that case to sanction the doctrine, that any such authority is to be implied from the simple fact of being a co-adventurer. The next case is Hawken v. Bourne, where the defendant had proved the restraint and limitation as to incurring liabilities, which it was supposed, from an obiter dictum in Tredwen v. Bourne, would constitute a defence; and the case shews how much less authority is to be given to an obiter dictum than to a judgment on a point necessary to be determined: the Court there said, that any restriction by agreement amongst the partners does not limit the authority as to third persons, unless they know that such restriction has been made. That case also distinctly recognizes the position, that in looking to the liabilities of the members of a mining company regard must be had to what is usual. In the present case, there was no evidence of what was usual, and I do not indeed see how it could have been given. It is enough, therefore, to say that here it appeared simply that the defendants were co-adventurers with Robinson, and that Robinson, without authority from them, opened an account at the bank. The Judge rightly ruled that they were in no way liable for the acts of Robinson; and the ruling must have been the same if the conduct of Robinson had been as candid and correct, as from the facts it is open to the suspicion of fraud. I think the whole case was fully before the jury, and there was nothing to warrant them in coming to a different conclusion from that to which they arrived, and their decision appears to me to have been a correct one. The question was not so put to the jury; but I think there was a strong case that the plaintiffs dealt on the individual credit of Robinson.

1847. } KING v. NORMAN.
July 3.

Principal and Surety—Pleading—Admission on Record of Amount of Debt—Evidence—Judgment not inter partes.

Debt on a joint and several bond for 500l. The condition, set out on oyer by the defendant, recited that one S. had been appointed collector of taxes, and that the plaintiff had become surety for the payment of such sums as S. should receive, that the plaintiff consented to become surety on the condition that the defendant and S. would indemnify him from all charges, &c. which he should incur as surety. Plea, that the plaintiff had not at any time since been in anywise damnified by reason of anything in the condition specified. Replication, that S. received, as collector, divers sums of money, amounting in the whole to a large sum exceeding 500l., to wit, 2,000l., that S. did not duly pay the said sums so received, nor any of them, but made default, by reason of which plaintiff afterwards was forced to pay to the receiver general a large sum, to wit, the sum of 500l., and thereby sustained damage to a large amount, to wit, 500l. Rejoinder, that the plaintiff was not forced to pay the said sum in the replication mentioned, or any part thereof. At the trial, no proof was given of the receipt of any money by S. as collector; but it was proved that S. had not paid any over to the receiver general, and that the plaintiff had been called on as a surety to pay the 500l., and, having been sued, had submitted to a judgment:—Held, that the receipt of the 500l. by S. was not admitted on the pleadings, and that the plaintiff, in default of proof of the receipt, was only entitled to nominal damages.

Held, also, that the defendant, having been no party to the judgment obtained against the plaintiff, the judgment was only evidence to shew that the plaintiff had been sued, or had been subjected to a bonâ fide pressure, but not evidence that he was legally liable to the extent for which the judgment was signed.

Debt upon a bond for 500l., bearing date October 3, 1845. The bond, which was set out on oyer by the defendant, stated that D. Strachan and J. Norman were jointly and separately held and bound unto

T. King in the penal sum of 500l., and the condition recited that whereas the said D. Strachan has been nominated and appointed a collector of the land, assessed, and property taxes for the second part of Conduit Ward, in the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, in the county of Middlesex; and whereas the said T. King has consented to become one of the sureties for the said D. Strachan for the due payment to the Receiver General of Taxes of all such sum or sums of money as shall come to the hands of the said D. Strachan, as such collector as aforesaid, and for the due demand by the said D. Strachan, in pursuance of the acts of parliament under or by virtue of which the said several taxes are payable, of the said several sums assessed of the respective persons from whom the same are payable; and in case of non-payment thereof, for the due enforcement of the powers of the said acts against such as shall make default; and whereas the said T. King consented to become such surety for the said D. Strachan, on condition that the said D. Strachan and J. Norman should enter into the above-written bond or obligation, subject to the condition hereafter contained: Now the condition of the above-written bond or obligation is such, that if the said D. Strachan and J. Norman, or one of them, their or one of their heirs, executors, or administrators, do and shall from time to time, and at all times hereafter, well and sufficiently save, defend, keep harmless and indemnify the said T. King, his heirs, executors, and administrators, from and against all loss, costs, charges, damages, and expenses, which he, the said T. King, his heirs, executors, or administrators, shall, or may at any time or times hereafter incur, sustain, or be put unto by reason or in consequence of the said T. King becoming such surety as aforesaid, then the above-written bond or obligation shall be void, otherwise the same shall be and remain in full force and virtue; which being read and heard, the defendant saith, that the plaintiff hath not at any time since the making of the said writing obligatory and conditions thereof hitherto been in anywise damnified by reason or means of any matter, cause, or thing in the said condition of the said writing obligatory mentioned. Verification.

Replication, that the said D. Strachan, in the said writing obligatory and in the said condition thereof named, remained and continued such collector of the land, assessed, and property taxes, for the second part of Conduit Ward, in the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, in the said county of Middlesex, as in the said condition mentioned, for a long space of time, to wit, from the day of the making of the said writing obligatory until and upon a certain other day subsequent hereto, to wit, until and upon the 5th of March A.D. 1846, and that during the said time that the said D. Strachan so remained and continued such collector as aforesaid, and after the making of the said writing obligatory and of the said condition thereof, to wit, on the 3rd of October A.D. 1845, and on divers other days and times between that day and the 5th of March A.D. 1846, there came to the hands of the said D. Strachan, as such collector as aforesaid, divers large sums of money amounting in the whole to a large sum of money, exceeding the sum of 500*l.*, to wit, the sum of 2,006*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* And the plaintiff further says, that the said D. Strachan did not nor would duly pay to the Receiver General of Taxes the said several sums of money so by him received as aforesaid, nor any or either of them, or any part thereof, but therein wholly made default. And the plaintiff, after assigning a breach of the said condition of the said writing obligatory, according to the form of the statute in such case made, says, that by means and reason of such default and non-payment of the said D. Strachan as aforesaid, he, the plaintiff, afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the 28th of May, A.D. 1846, was called upon by the said Receiver General of Taxes to pay, and was then forced and compelled and did then pay to the said Receiver General of Taxes a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 500*l.*, parcel of the monies so received by the said D. Strachan as such collector as aforesaid; and he, the plaintiff, did thereby then incur and sustain loss and damage to a great amount, to wit, to the amount of 500*l.*, by reason and in consequence of him, the plaintiff, having become such surety as in the said condition of the said writing obligatory mentioned; yet the said D. Strachan and the defendant have not, nor hath either of them, paid the said sum of 500*l.* or any part thereof, to the plaintiff, nor have they, nor hath either of them, otherwise well and sufficiently saved, defended, kept harmless, and indemnified the plaintiff from or against such loss and damage as aforesaid. And the said sum of 500*l.*, from thence hitherto hath been and still is wholly due and unpaid to the plaintiff. Verification.

Rejoinder, that the plaintiff was not forced or compelled to pay to the said Receiver General of Taxes the said sum of money in the replication in that behalf mentioned, or any part thereof, in manner and form as in the said replication alleged, and the plaintiff, of his own wrong, paid the same: conclusion to the country, and issue joined thereupon.

Upon the trial of the cause, no proof was given of the actual receipt of any money by Strachan as collector, but it was admitted that he had not paid any over to the Receiver General, and it was proved that the plaintiff had been called upon as surety for Strachan, to pay the sum of 500*l.* claimed to be due from Strachan as collector, and that having been sued in consequence, he had submitted to a judgment for 500*l.*, which was signed against him under a Judge's order. It was contended, on behalf of the defendant, at the trial, that in the absence of proof of any receipt of money by Strachan as collector, the plaintiff was entitled to no more than nominal damages. The learned Judge thought that the receipt of 500*l.* was admitted on the pleadings, and the damages were in consequence assessed at that amount.

A rule nisi for a new trial having been obtained in Michaelmas term last,—

Montagu Chambers and Peacock (May 27) shewed cause.—To the plea of non damnificatus the plaintiff has replied that while Strachan was collector there came to his hands as such collector “divers large sums of money, amounting in the whole to a large sum of money, exceeding the sum of 500*l.*,” to wit, 2,006*l.*, and the replication then says, that by reason of Strachan's default, the plaintiff was called upon to pay, and was then forced to pay, and did pay, “a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 500*l.*” There are, therefore, two averments: first, a positive one, that the sum exceeded 500*l.*; second, an averment of the sum under a videlicet. Supposing the precise amount were not originally material, the plaintiff has made it so by the direct averment, which might have been traversed. The defendant, in his rejoinder, says, that the plaintiff was not forced or obliged to pay the sum of 500*l.* claimed to be due from Strachan. In 2 Wms. Saund. 291, C, n. 1. it is laid down, "On the other hand, the want of a videlicet will, in some cases, make an averment material that would not otherwise be so;" and Symmons v. Knox (1) is cited as an authority for that rule. In Cooper v. Blick (2) the same rule is also laid down by Patteson, J., and see also Tatem v. Perient (3), and other cases referred to in 2 Wms. Saund. 206, and Carvick v. Blagrove (4).

[MAULE, J.—With respect to anything which the plaintiff can prove he was compelled to pay, to that extent the defendant does not deny that such a sum came into Strachan's hands. It is not only the forcing that is put in issue, but also how much the plaintiff was forced. I think the 500*l.* is only admitted by the rejoinder to the extent to which the plaintiff was forced to pay.]

Yes: whatever the plaintiff proves he was forced to pay, that sum is admitted by the rejoinder to have been received by Strachan. The plaintiff proves, that the Receiver General compelled him to pay 500*l.*, and, therefore, it is admitted on the record that a sum to that amount was received by Strachan.

Channell, Serj. and Lush, in support of the rule.—Supposing even that the rejoinder admits a default in Strachan, it only admits some default, and the plaintiff is bound to shew what default. If he has to go into evidence at all as to the default, he must shew to what extent there was default, and how much the plaintiff was compelled to pay.

[MAULE, J.—It seems to come very much to this: the Receiver General having recovered in an action against the plaintiff, whether, if you do not shew collusion, the judgment is not prima facie evidence of coercion.]

All that the plaintiff shewed was that an action was brought on the bond for 500*l.*, and that the plaintiff submitted to the action by a Judge's order. There was no proof that Strachan had received anything. Had there been a trial, possibly the case might have been different, because the amount which Strachan had received must then have been proved; but a submission to a judgment is no stronger proof than a payment without any judgment at all. The replication says, that by means and reason of the default and non-payment of Strachan the plaintiff was forced and compelled to pay. The plaintiff says he was not forced, &c., modo et forma, i. e. by means and reason of the default and non-payment of Strachan. Supposing, therefore, the preceding part of the replication, as to the amount, might have been traversed, still if there is a subsequent part, which involves the preceding part, and is traversed, the preceding part is traversed also—Dunstan v. Tresider (5).

COLTMAN, J. now delivered the judgment of the Court, (after stating the pleadings and facts as ante).—A rule nisi for a new trial having been granted, the question was argued before my Brothers Maule, Cresswell, and myself, and it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff, as it had been at the trial, that the receipt of 500*l.* by Strachan, as collector, was admitted, or if not, that the judgment was evidence of the amount of damage suffered by the plaintiff. It is an established rule of pleading, that by pleading over, every traversable allegation which is not traversed is admitted, as is said in Hudson v. Jones (6); but what is not material nor traversable is not admitted nor confessed, when it is alleged and not traversed—The King v. the Bishop of Chester (7). In that case, Lord Holt is reported, in Lord Raymond, p. 298, as regards this matter, to have said, "The case is thus, the Attorney General declares that Queen Elizabeth, 14th of February, twelfth year of her reign, was seised of this advowson in gross, and then presented Tymes, prout by the inrolment of the letters patent in Chancery, nunc apud Westmonasterium remanens, plenius apparet. though the defendant admits Charles the First to have been seised of this advowson in gross by descent; and, consequently, that Queen Elizabeth was seised in gross of it at some time of her reign; yet he does not admit it at the precise time of the 14th of February, twelfth year of her reign; because the alleging of the time and day when Queen Elizabeth was seised in gross, is surplusage and immaterial; for it is sufficient to allege general seisin in a quare impedit in the time of peace in the reign of such a king. Then, though the defendant does not deny a thing, yet he admits by it only things materially alleged, but he does not admit things immaterially alleged." In the present case, it was essential to the maintenance of the action for the plaintiff to shew that some money had been received by Strachan; but the amount he had received was not material, for whether it was 5*l.* or 500*l.*, which he had received, the bond was equally forfeited. But it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff, that there being here a direct and positive allegation, that there had come to the hands of Strachan a sum of money exceeding 500*l.*, the defendant had a right to traverse the allegation to the extent to which it was made; and to prove this the cases of Tatem v. Perient, Leke's case (8), and Smith v. Dixon (9), were relied on. The general rule of pleading undoubtedly is, that a party shall not be allowed to take his traverse in such a form as to make matter which is immaterial parcel of the issue—Colborne v. Stockdale (10), Doctrina Placitandi, 360, and Goram v. Sweeting (11). But the cases cited on behalf of the plaintiff, from Yelverton, Dyer, and Ad. & El. shew, that in certain cases in which the material and immaterial matters are mixed up in one combined and undivided allegation, the opposite party has been held to be entitled to traverse the whole compound allegation, in the terms in which it has been made. The present case, however, does not, we think, fall within the principle of those cases; the material part of the allegation, videlicet, that there came to the hands of Strachan a large sum of money, being perfectly distinct and separate from the immaterial part, that that sum exceeded 500*l.* If the immaterial words were struck out of this replication, the remainder would constitute a perfect allegation of everything necessary to be alleged; and the case is like that of Moore v. Boulcott (12), and Thurman v. Wild (13), in which the traverse was held bad for including immaterial matters in the issue, though they had been directly averred in the adverse pleading. It is, however, not necessary to determine whether a traverse in the terms of the allegation could have been sustained on demurrer, for no such traverse has here been taken; and the question here is, what the defendant has admitted by omitting to traverse the allegation; and according to the doctrine laid down by Lord Holt, in The King v. the Bishop of Chester, above referred to, he is not considered as having admitted anything but what is materially alleged. Even if the defendant had traversed the allegation in its present form, it would have been sufficient for the plaintiff to have proved the substance of the issue, upon which the substantial question would have been, whether any sum of money had come to Strachan or not; for be it more or be it less, the action would be well maintainable; and it is impossible, we think, to maintain that a party admits more by omitting to traverse an allegation than the opposite party would have been compelled to prove, in order to maintain the issue, if it had been traversed. On these grounds, we think, that there is no admission on the record, that the sum of 500*l.* had come to the hands of Strachan. It was secondly contended, that the amount of the judgment was evidence of the amount which the plaintiff had been obliged to pay through the default of Strachan. The judgment was in this case evidence that the plaintiff had been sued; and coupled with proof, or (as in this case) an admission of liability to some extent, might lead the jury to conclude that the plaintiff had been subjected to a bond fide pressure, by which he was forced and obliged to pay whatever he was legally liable to pay through Strachan's default: but whether he was legally liable to the extent for which judgment was signed, is a matter which could only be collected by inference from the judgment; and for such a purpose the judgment could not be used without holding that a stranger to a judgment who has had no opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses or to dispute the conclusions to be drawn from the evidence can be bound by the verdict, where the judgment is after verdict, or can be bound by an agreement made without his privity or intervention between the parties to the judgment, where, as in the present case, it is a judgment founded on such an agreement. The law, we apprehend, is not so. The judgment cannot be used for such a purpose against one who is neither a party nor privy to it. We think, therefore, that the rule in this case ought to be made absolute.

APPEALS from the Courts of Revision, under 6 Vict. c. 18.

1847. } TOMS, APPELLANT; LUCKETT,
Nov. 15. } RESPONDENT.

Parliament—Vote—Apartments in House—Landlord's Controul—Common Outer Door.

T. occupied rooms in a house in which the landlord also occupied a shop and parlour, but did not sleep. Each party had a key to the outer door, which stood open all day, but was shut at night. T. was held entitled to a vote for members of parliament as the tenant of "a building," under the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27.

At a court held, before the revising barrister for the city of London, on the 20th of October 1847, W. E. Lockett objected to the name of Moses Toms being retained on the list of voters of the parish of St. Giles without Cripplegate, as entitled to a vote in the election of members of parliament for the city of London, in respect of the occupation of apartments at No. 21, Milton Street, in that parish.

It appeared that Toms occupied the first floor, consisting of two rooms, in the house, No. 21, Milton Street, in which he had resided for the last year and three quarters, at a rent of 5s. 6d. per week. The landlord occupied a shop and parlour on the ground floor in the same house, but did not sleep there, and three other persons occupied other distinct apartments up-stairs in the house. There was but one outer door to the house, by which the landlord, in common with all the inmates, entered and went out. The landlord, Toms, and the three other inmates had each respectively a key of the outer door, and they all locked and unlocked that door when and as they pleased. The door was never barred or fastened inside at night; there was neither bolt nor chain to it; and it stood open during the day time. The landlord's shop door was inside the passage, which passage Toms had to enter and pass along to get to the staircase that led up to his apartments, and the staircase was shut off from the passage by a swing door, which had no lock to it. There was a back kitchen at the end of the passage, in which there was a cistern for water, and from which all parties in the house were supplied with water on going there for it. The outer door was opened in the morning by the party who had occasion first, and locked at night by whoever had occasion last, either to enter or to leave the house. The question raised before the revising barrister was, whether, under these circumstances, the occupation of Moses Toms was such an occupation in law as to entitle him to vote under the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27. for a member of parliament. On behalf of Toms it was contended, that, as the landlord did not reside in, but merely occupied a part of, the house, Toms having a key of the outer door as well as the landlord, and residing there, the landlord's occupation did not prevent Toms from being enfranchised, and that therefore he was entitled to be registered. It was urged, on the contrary, that Toms had no exclusive controul over the outer door, and that he was a mere lodger. The revising barrister held the objection valid, and expunged Toms's name from the register; but directed that if the Court of Common Pleas should be of opinion that the decision was erroneous, the name of Toms should be re-inserted in the list.

Toms having appealed against this decision,—

Crompton (15th Nov.) appeared for the appellant.—This was the “domus mansionalis” of Toms, and not that of the landlord. In no case has a house been held to be the domus mansionalis of a person who does not sleep in it. Each party had uncontrolled access to his apartments; the outer door was used only as a protection against thieves. The landlord did not stand in the relation of “pater-familias” to the occupiers, and it is a perversion of the meaning of the word to call them “lodgers.” This is like the case of Wright v. the Town Clerk of Stockport (1), where different persons occupied separate rooms in a factory, to which there was a common staircase and an outer door which was never fastened, and the occupier of each room was held to be the exclusive occupier of “a building” within the Reform Act.

[WILDE, C.J.—This case does not state an exclusive use of the apartments, or that the appellant had a key of his apartments.]

There was no limit of the enjoyment of the apartments. In Pitts v. Smedley (2), where the occupier had no key of the outer door, the key being kept by the landlord, the Court held the claimant to be a mere lodger not entitled to vote, on the ground that he had a limited enjoyment only, his access to his rooms being merely permissive. The exclusive possession of the key by the landlord was the ground of that decision. Here the occupier was not under the landlord's controul as to access. In Score v. Huggett (3), the occupier of apartments having a key, where the landlord did not reside in or occupy part of the house, was held entitled to vote. The case of Wansey v. Perkins (4), where the landlord resided on the premises, and the occupier of apartments having a key as well as the landlord was held not entitled to vote, was decided on the ground that the claimant was a mere lodger, Cresswell, J. referring to Pitts v. Smedley, and Erle, J. to Monks v. Dykes (5), which was a case of an ordinary lodger.

In Kearney's case (6) the claimant, who was held entitled to vote, occupied a front apartment as a shop. There was no door from the shop immediately opening into the street, but the passage from the shop to the street was through a hall, in which there was also a door opening to a staircase and apartments occupied by other lodgers. The street door opening from the hall was open all day, but locked at night. The claimant had one key, the landlord's brother had another. All the authorities shew that the separate apartments of different occupiers, where the landlord does not reside on the premises, are deemed in law to be the several “dwelling-houses” of the respective parties—1 Hawkins, P.C. book 1. c. 39. ss. 13. and 14; 4 Black. Com. 225; Archbold's Crim. P.C. tit. ‘Burglary’; The King v. Rogers (7), The King v. Trapshaw (8), Lee v. Gansell (9). In the case of The Queen v. Ponsonby (10), the occupation of apartments in a royal palace was held sufficient for rating purposes, although a portion of the palace was occupied by the Crown. The occupation of Toms, then, was a distinct occupation, sufficient to give him a vote under the act of parliament; and the fact of the landlord using a part of the premises and possessing a key makes no difference, as the tenant had uncontrolled access to his apartments.

Groves, for the respondent.—The claimant in this case does not occupy “as owner or tenant, any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building,” under the 27th section of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. There is nowhere any definition of “residence” which shews that the landlord in this case did not reside on the premises. In The King v. Ditchet (11), it was held not to be necessary to make a man the occupier of a tenement so as to gain a settlement, that he should sleep in or take his meals there. The decisions in all the cases of claims to vote depend upon the question of exclusive occupation. The only difference between this case and Wansey v. Perkins is, that the landlord in this case did not sleep on the premises. There is no authority to shew that this is necessary to constitute residence; but, at all events, residence is not necessary under the act if there is a holding by occupation. It cannot be contended that the landlord is not entitled to vote as occupier. If he is entitled, then his occupation is exclusive, and the lodger cannot be entitled. There is not one case which shews that a party has a right to vote when the landlord has retained a right to interfere with the premises. The words of Crampton, J., in Kearney's case, are directly in point. He says, that it must be a full, free, and exclusive enjoyment, and the claimant must command the entrance to and exit from the premises. Can it be said that the occupier commands the entrance and exit when the landlord has a key as well?

[WILDE, C.J.—If the landlord gives the tenant a key, and cannot change the lock, how does that interfere with the tenant's command of the entrance?]

In Wansey v. Perkins both the landlord and the claimant had keys, and that was held not to be exclusive occupation: and if that was not, how can this be?

[WILDE, C.J.—How would it be if two occupiers had each a key, and the landlord had none?]

Each would have a vote. In the present case, the revising barrister has not found that the tenant had the exclusive occupation of his own rooms.

Crampton, in reply.—As to the form of the case: since the questions raised were with regard to the occupation, the revising barrister found the occupation in the words of the statute. The objection was taken that Toms had no exclusive controul over the outer door, and it was on this point that the revising barrister decided against him. There is here an occupation at a sufficient rent. Is it an occupation as owner or tenant? It is not as owner; but unless Toms is a mere lodger, he is tenant. It is said, that in order to make him a tenant so as to have a vote, there must be an exclusive occupation; but an exclusive occupation of his own rooms is sufficient. It cannot be meant that it is necessary that the party should have exclusive possession of the whole house, but merely that he should have the right not to be excluded from the house. According to the proposition on the other side, a person has no exclusive use of his own rooms, unless he can keep his neighbours from them. In Pitts v. Smedley the landlord had power to exclude the lodger if he pleased. Wright v. the Town Clerk of Stockport is exactly like the present case both in the judgment and the statement. There the landlord did occupy, and the tenant's vote was allowed. In Kearney's case it is clear that the landlord had controul over the key. In Wansey v. Perkins the landlord resided in the house, and the case is, in that respect, distinguishable from the present.

WILDE, C.J.—In this case, the question referred to the Court is very limited. The case states that it was urged on behalf of the appellant, that as the landlord did not reside in the house, but merely occupied a part of it, and as the appellant resided on the premises, and had a key of the outer door as well as the landlord, the occupation by the landlord did not prevent the appellant from having a vote. The objection is, that the claimant had not the exclusive controul over the outer door, and it was upon that objection that the revising barrister decided. I am of opinion that the objection is not well founded, and that the absence of exclusive controul over the outer door does not deprive the party of his right of voting. Looking at the facts, at the objection taken, and the mode in which the question is referred, it seems to me that the intention of the revising barrister was, to ask us whether or not the absence of such controul had the effect of preventing the appellant from being a "tenant" within the act of parliament, and reduced his occupation to that of a mere lodger. The 27th section of the Reform Act enacts that a party who "shall occupy as owner or tenant any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building," of the clear yearly value of not less than 10*l.* shall be entitled to vote. Now, what was intended to be comprised within the words "house, warehouse, counting-house, or shop"? It is quite clear that all these import parts of houses used for particular purposes; and the following words "or other building" were meant to include other occupations of the same nature, where a distinct portion of a house was in the same manner occupied separately, and were used by the legislature to prevent nice distinctions which were otherwise likely to arise. In this case, the appellant occupied a certain apartment in a house, and it must be considered another building as contradistinguished from a house, just as much as a shop, warehouse, or counting-house is another building under this act. I therefore think that the appellant occupies a description of premises which, if occupied in a certain manner, gives him a right to vote. The character of his occupation must be that of "tenant," construing that word in the sense in which the legislature intended to use it, that is to say, in its popular sense. It must be an occupation under a demise, which gives him the exclusive right to the possession of the premises. The case finds that the appellant occupied two rooms at a rent of 5s. 6d. per week, and from that fact alone it might be inferred that he had the exclusive occupation; but looking at all the facts, it is quite clear that the appellant was deemed to have the exclusive right to his part of the house. Where then is anything shewn in the case to cut down his qualification? A man may occupy rooms in a house to the possession of which he may have the exclusive right; and yet there may be some one having such superior mastership and dominion over the house, as to prevent him from having the character of tenant under the act of parliament. The Court has been called upon in some cases to say, whether under certain circumstances, a party's interest in the occupation of premises has been cut down, as where the landlord has resided in part of the premises, and retained the key of the outer door, in which case the Court has considered that the landlord had such mastership as to prevent the occupier from being a tenant under the act, their opinion being founded on the facts of residence on the premises and the retention of the key. This they have held also even when the occupier himself had a key. In this case, the landlord did not reside, but merely occupied a certain part of the house. If he had resided day and night in the premises, it would not have so necessarily followed that the contract of tenancy should give the tenant an absolute right to enter at all times. If the landlord is not on the spot at all times to exercise dominion over the outer door, who is to have the right to enjoy the use of that door? Is the tenant to have it at some times, and not at others? There certainly is no such qualification of the right. Whatever may be the just inference where the landlord resides on the premises, retaining entire dominion over them, except so far as he has personally parted with it, the same inference would not be warranted by the mere fact that the landlord had a key of the outer door if he did not reside on the premises. I cannot see why the fact of the tenant not having exclusive controul over the outer door is to destroy his right to vote. It may be one circumstance from which to infer that he is not a tenant, but unless coupled with other matters, it would not have that effect of itself. I am therefore of opinion, that the appellant had sufficient controul over the premises to prevent the fact of the landlord having a key from qualifying his interest. As this is the only question raised in the case, I think the revising barrister was wrong, and the appellant's name ought to be restored to the list of voters.

COLTMAN, J.—I also am of opinion that the revising barrister was wrong. The case gives no distinct statement as to the interest of the occupier in the rooms; but as it nowhere points to any other person as having a right to enter those rooms, the stipulation between him and the landlord must be taken to be, that he should have the use of the rooms, and no one else. Then, if the party had such exclusive use of the rooms on the payment of rent, that prima facie imports a tenancy. In the case of Wansey v. Perkins, the Court thought that such an inference might be rebutted by the fact that the landlord resided with his family on the premises. In this case, however, it appears to me that there is nothing to shew that the party ought not to be considered a tenant entitled to vote. There is one other point, namely, whether the holder of one portion of a house can be considered a tenant within the act. I think such an occupation properly falls within the words "other building," words which are quite consistent with its being a portion of another building in the same manner as a shop, counting-house, or warehouse.

MAULE, J.—I think the appellant is right in this case. The case seems to me to raise a question not relating so much to the nature of the thing occupied, as to the nature and quality of the occupation. The point seems to be, whether this is an occupation as tenant, entitling the claimant to vote under the 27th section of the statute, or the occupation of a lodger, considered as different from that of a tenant. I think that the distinction between these cases is this, that where the owner of a house takes some person into his house, who occupies a room, and has the right of ingress and egress, yet if the owner retains his general character of master of the house, that person so occupying is a lodger, and not a tenant within the 27th section of the act. I do not think that the case is varied by the person having a key to let himself in and out; nor do I think, that if other persons have a key, that will affect his exclusive occupation. The right of way of others does not interfere with his right. The distinction between lodger and tenant depends upon the owner living in the house in the manner and quality of master of the house, retaining some degree of controul over that part of the house where the lodger lives. The relation of master of the house does not necessarily follow from that of landlord. If the landlord does not live in the house, and is not what in ordinary language is called "master of the house," he does not generally keep any controul over the part let. If he wishes to do so, he must expressly reserve such controul, and it will not be inferred that, because he is landlord, he has the controul. In the present case, the owner occupies a shop and parlour, not the house. I think, that the claimant, taking the apartment and having constant access at all times without leave of the landlord, no person having controul over his occupation, is entitled to vote; and I, therefore, think, that the decision of the revising barister ought to be reversed.

WILLIAMS, J.—I concur in the opinions expressed by my learned Brothers; but I confess that my mind is not altogether free from a doubt which has arisen in the course of the argument. The 27th section of the act gives a right to vote to any person who shall occupy as tenant or owner any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building. I have considered that the claimant ought to be in a condition to maintain trespass in respect of some such tenement as is mentioned in the statute. I have felt a difficulty as to whether the claimant has occupied a house under the statute, and notwithstanding the case of Wright v. the Town Clerk of Stockport, whether the tenement which he occupied comes under the description of "other building," in the act. My doubts, however, are not sufficient to induce me to differ from my learned Brothers.

Parliament—Vote—Occupation as Tenant —Part of House—Outer Door.

A party claiming to vote, occupied a counting-house in a house in which the landlord and others had counting-houses. There were a wooden gate and a door at the outer entrance, which were open all day, but shut by night. A clerk of the landlord's lived on the premises to protect them, and kept the keys of the gate and door, which could be locked and unlocked only on the inside. It was the clerk's duty to open the gate and door to any of the occupiers, if required to do so, none of them having keys:—Held, that this was an occupation as tenant by the claimant, which entitled him to a vote.

At a court held before the revising barister for the city of London, on the 20th of October 1847, W. E. Luckett objected to the name of H. B. Downing being retained on the list of voters of the parish of Allhallows Staining, as entitled to vote in the election of members of parliament for the city of London, in respect of the occupation of a counting-house, No. 11, Mark Lane, in the said parish. The case stated the following facts:—"H. B. Downing, the claimant, occupied a counting-house, at No. 11, Mark Lane, and had done so for three years at a rent of 20l. a year. Six other parties, besides the landlord, respectively occupied counting-houses in the same house. There was but one outer entrance to the house, and at that outer entrance there was a small swing-gate, which was kept sometimes open, and sometimes shut, during the day, but was never locked. There was also a large wooden gate, and likewise a door at the outer entrance, both of which were kept open during the daytime, but they were shut and locked inside every night by A. W. Enever, one of the landlord's clerks, who resided in the upper part of the house with his family, and who kept the keys. Enever unlocked and opened the outer door and the large gate, every morning. The landlord required him to reside there, for the protection of the premises and the accommodation of those who occupied the counting-houses. Neither the large gate nor the outer door had a key-hole outside; therefore, they could only be locked and unlocked inside. Enever paid no rent in money for his apartments, but considered that he paid it in services. After entering at the outer entrance, which was common to the landlord and all his tenants, and proceeding along a short passage, ascending some steps, and turning a short way to the right, Mr. Downing passed the door of the landlord's counting-house, and then went through folding-doors into a passage, which led to the door of his own counting-house. There was a water-closet near the landlord's counting-house door, common to all the inmates. The claimant paid Enever a small yearly sum, in consideration of his servant's sweeping the passage between his own and the landlord's counting-house. He had no key of the outer gate or of the outer door, and if he wished to gain admittance after the large gate and the door at the outer entrance were shut at night, or before they were opened in the morning, he could only do so by ringing a bell, and getting it answered by Enever. Mr. Downing handed to the revising barrister a letter from Enever, in which he stated that the outside gates were locked at night by him, or his servant, and that, of course, Mr. Downing, or any of his servants, would be admitted at any hour of the night. It was objected, before the revising barrister, that Mr. Downing was not entitled to a vote, because he had no key or independent power of access to the premises; and the revising barrister, sustaining the objection, expunged Mr. Downing's name from the register; but directed its re-insertion, if the Court should be of opinion that his decision was erroneous.

The argument, in this case, was heard immediately after that in the last case, Toms v. Luckett, and no additional authorities were cited.

WILDE, C.J.—We are all agreed that this case is without difficulty. The landlord here retained nothing of his interest as landlord, with regard to the counting-house in question. The case finds that Enever occupied the apartments in the house, for the protection of the premises. That surely cannot mean protection against the occupiers. Then, is there anything in the case to limit the interest of the tenant? It seems to me that the case is exactly like that of chambers in the Albany, or shops in the Burlington Arcade, where there is a common entrance, and a porter who attends to open the gate or door to occupiers, and to protect the premises. It is quite clear that the appellant occupied as tenant, and there is nothing in the case to warrant the inference that his interest was limited.

COLTMAN, J.—This case is not at all analogous to the cases where part of the landlord's family resides upon the premises.

MAULE, J.—There is, in this case, a total absence of all circumstances shewing any controul over the right of the occupier, so as to reduce the occupation to something less than an occupation as tenant. The object of having the outside doors, and the keys in Enever's hands, is to prevent people other than the occupiers from getting in; and the locks are inside to prevent burglary. Enever's duty is to let the occupiers in at their pleasure. It appears that the claimant has as exclusive a controul over his counting-house as a person can have.

WILLIAMS, J. concurred.

1847. } BIRCH, APPELLANT; EDWARDS,
Nov. 15. } RESPONDENT.

Parliament—Voter—Notice of Objection—Service—Duplicate.

A notice of objection to a voter sent by post, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 100, should have an address on the outside as well as in the inside.

Where the notice sent by post had directions both on the outside and in the inside, and the paper produced as a duplicate to prove the service, contained the direction in the inside but none on the outside, the Court held that the paper was not a duplicate, and that the service was not proved.

The following case was granted by the revising barrister for the county of Monmouth:—

At a court held, before me, T. C. S. K., revising barrister for the county of Monmouth, on Monday the 4th of October 1847, at Pontypool, for the revision of the list of voters for the parish of Trevechin, in the said county, James Birch objected to the name of Francis Brittain, of Garndiffaith, being retained on the list of voters for the said parish.

To prove a service of notice of objection on the said Francis Brittain, an alleged duplicate notice, bearing the post-mark "Pontypool, August 24, 1847," was produced, but on inspection it appeared that though posted in due time, and correctly drawn according to the form No. 5, Schedule A, 6 Vict. c. 18, it was not duly directed to the said Francis Brittain, unless, as was contended, the words on the face and at the top of the notice "To Mr. Francis Brittain, Garndiffaith," could be considered as a direction.

It was proved that on the back of the notice which was delivered to and retained by the postmaster at Pontypool, to be forwarded by post to the said Francis Brittain, the words "To Mr. Francis Brittain, Garndiffaith" were written so as to form, when the paper was folded into the shape of a letter, an external direction to him.

Under these circumstances, it was contended, on the part of the said Francis Brittain, that the service of notice of objection on him was not duly proved, inasmuch as the two papers were not duplicates; and I being of that opinion retained his name upon the list of voters. But in order to give the objector an opportunity of availing himself of his notice of objection, in case the Court of Common Pleas should be of a contrary opinion, the said Francis Brittain was called and failed to establish his qualification.

If the Court should think the service of notice of objection duly proved, notwithstanding the absence of external direction on the alleged duplicate thereof, the register is to be altered by expunging the name of the said Francis Brittain with those of the other persons hereafter named from the list; otherwise the register is to remain unaltered.

The case then stated that forty-nine other persons mentioned in a schedule annexed were objected to by notices similarly served, and that the revising barrister decided on their cases upon the same point of law, directing the appeals against his decision to be consolidated.

Keating (Nov. 15,) for the appellant.—The 100th section of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. (1) only requires that the notice shall be directed, and it is immaterial on what part of the paper the direction is placed. If it is contained in the inside it is really not necessary to repeat it by indorsement. No particular form is required by the statute. It might be partly printed and partly written, or it might be written or printed on a card. The present notice might have been so folded as to shew the address on the outside. The reasonable construction of the 100th section is, that inasmuch as the postmaster, before stamping the notice, must ascertain that the document is in a proper state for transmission, if he finds that it has an address which enables him to forward it, nothing more is requisite. The notice is precisely in the form given in Schedule A. No. 5. of the act. The papers require to be duplicates only in essential particulars. That being so, and the two documents agreeing in all essential particulars, the case contains abundant evidence that the claimant did not prove his qualification.

(1) That section enacts, "Whenever any persons shall be desirous of sending any such notice of objection by the post, he shall deliver the same duly directed, open and in duplicate, to the postmaster of any post-office where money orders are received and paid within such hours as shall have previously been given notice of in such post-office, and under such regulations with respect to the registration of such letters, and the fee to be paid for such registration (which fee shall in no case exceed 2d. over and above the ordinary rate of postage) as shall from time to time be made by the Postmaster General in that behalf; and in all cases in which such fee shall have been duly paid, the postmaster shall compare the said notice and the duplicate, and on being satisfied that they are alike in their address and their contents, shall forward one of them to its address by the post and shall return the other to the party bringing the same duly stamped with the stamp of the said office, and the production by the party who posted such notice of such stamped duplicate shall be evidence of the notice having been given to the person at the place mentioned in such duplicate, on the day on which such notice would by the ordinary course of post have been delivered at such place."

Byles, Serj. for the respondent.—This document is not sufficient under the statute. The notice, at all events, if in the form of a letter, as it is here, ought to have an address on the back. The meaning of the act must be, that the notice shall be directed in the way in which letters usually are directed. "Direction" is not the only word used. The act speaks of "address" also, which must apply to an external address. It speaks also of "contents" as something different from "address." These papers are not duplicates, although they might have been so had they both been directed inside only. To be "duplicates" the two documents ought to be identical—Toms v. Cuming (2).

Keating, in reply.—At all events there is sufficient proof of the service, by posting the paper addressed to the party objected to.

[MAULE, J.—But for the provision in the act, there must have been other evidence. The postmaster is directed to forward one of the papers to its address by the post. That must mean an address on the outside of it. A thing is not the duplicate of another if it differs from it in any essential particular. If it is essential that the address should be on the outside, then these documents are not duplicates. The actual thing to which the postmaster or postman was to look for the transmission of the paper was not in duplicate.]

It would be introducing fresh provisions into the statute if the Court were to hold that there ought to be an external address, and that the notice should be in the form of a letter.

WILDE, C.J.—It appears to me that the document relied upon to prove the service of the notice of objection, cannot be considered a duplicate of that which was forwarded by post. It might lead to very serious inconveniences if we were to hold it sufficient. One of the most important points to be ascertained is, the direction which was given to the post-office with regard to the transmission of the notice. Here, there was a matter on the outside of the notice which was intended to be given for that purpose, and on the document produced that matter appears only on the face of it. When I find that the legislature expressly mentions "address" and "contents," I cannot think that because you may fold the paper so as to make the name appear outside, it is therefore to be deemed a duplicate of the other. I see no inconvenience in coming to this conclusion.

COLTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion.—I think that when the statute says that the notice shall be duly directed, it refers to that which is to be transmitted by post, and means a direction on the outside. I do not think that the variance between the two papers is immaterial.

MAULE, J.—I also think that the statute has not been complied with in a material provision necessary to make this document evidence of the delivery of the notice. The notice had in the inside an address for the holder, and another, on the outside, for the use of the post-office to tell them to whom they were to deliver it. The most essential part of the proof is to shew what it is that the post-office authorities were desired by the party who left the notice to do with it. The postmaster was directed to deliver to the address on the outside of the paper. The other paper omits to state what the person sending the notice desired the postmaster to do.

WILLIAMS, J.—I also am of the same opinion, inasmuch as it appears to me that the documents are not duplicates within the statute. The form of the notice is that which is given in the schedule, however it was served; but it is necessary that it should have a cumulative direction, one in the inside, and another on the outside.

Parliament—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 17.—Notice of Objection.

A notice of objection to a voter for a borough was in the following form:—"To

(2) 7 Man. & Gr. 94; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.A.) C.P. 67.

Mr. C. S. 1, Olney Place. Take notice, I object to your name being retained on the list of voters for the borough of Cheltenham. (Signed) J. F. of No. 5, Sherborne Street, on the list of voters for the parish of Cheltenham":—Held, that the description of the objector's place of abode, No. 5, Sherborne Street, meant Sherborne Street, Cheltenham, and was a compliance with the requirements of the 17th section of the Registration Act.

Whether a notice of objection designates on the face of it an objector's place of abode, is a question of law. Whether such designation is sufficiently particular, is a question of fact.

At a court held before the revising barrister of Cheltenham, for revising the list of voters for the said borough of Cheltenham. John Fletcher objected to the name of Charles Sheldon being retained on the list of voters for the said borough. The notice of objection was in the following form:—"To Mr. Charles Sheldon, 1, Olney Place. I hereby give you notice, that I object to your name being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Cheltenham. Dated this 21st day of August 1847. (Signed) John Fletcher, of 5, Sherborne Street, on the list of voters for the parish of Cheltenham." It was contended, on behalf of the person objected to, that the notice of objection was defective in that it did not shew in what town or parish Sherborne Street was situate, there being other parishes within the distance of seven miles, containing streets, though it was not shewn that there was any other Sherborne Street than that in the parish of Cheltenham. The borough of Cheltenham consists of the parish of Cheltenham only, and the names of the whole of the voters for the borough are comprehended in one list, viz., those entitled to vote in respect of property situate within the parish of Cheltenham. The name of John Fletcher, the objector, appeared in the list of voters, and his place of abode, and the local description of his qualification was therein described, precisely in the same words as in the notice of objection, viz., "5, Sherborne Street." It was not suggested, that in fact there was any other place called Sherborne Street, within the borough of Cheltenham, or that it was not perfectly well known, or that any practical inconvenience followed from the omission of the name of the town or parish. The revising barrister thought the notice of objection sufficient; and the person objected to having failed to prove his right to have his name retained in the list of voters, he expunged it therefrom. The case of twenty-six other persons objected to by the said J. Fletcher upon similar notices, and whose names the revising barrister expunged from the list, were consolidated with the principal case. If the Court of Common Pleas should be of opinion that the notice of objection was sufficient, the register was to remain unaltered; if they should be of a contrary opinion, the names of the parties so expunged were to be restored to the register.

Byles, Serj., for the appellant.—The notice of objection is bad. No. 5, Sherborne Street may be in York or in Exeter. The objector need not be residing within the borough at the time of the service of the notice, and therefore he should have added Cheltenham to the description of his residence in the notice. The case finds there is a plurality of parishes and streets wherein voters may reside, and it is not improbable that there may be more than one Sherborne Street among them. The case of Woollett v. Davis (1) is in point. It will be said that that was the case of a county voter, and that this is a town voter, but that makes no difference in the particularity required by the Registration Act in a notice of this kind. The voter has no occasion to look at the list of voters to ascertain who the objector is: the notice must speak for itself; and in this case, without reference to the list, it does not appear in what parish or county Sherborne Street is situate. The form of notice here does not comply with that given in 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, Schedule (B), No. 11; and by the 17th section of that act an objector must give a notice to the person objected to according to that form: the objector's place of abode should be fully stated in the body of the notice; and it is obviously incomplete without the addition of the parish or place, "Cheltenham." A letter directed to John Fletcher,

No. 5, Sherborne Street, and posted in London, would not be likely to reach him.

Keating, for the respondent.—The case of Woollett v. Davis is not in point. That decision amounts to this: the description in a notice of a place of abode of an objector insufficient in itself, and so found by the revising barrister, cannot have its deficiencies supplied by reference to another document. The sufficiency of the statement of the place of abode must vary according to the circumstances of each particular place; and the way in which that case was reserved for the opinion of this Court shews that the revising barrister thought the description in the notice per se insufficient:—"The question for the Court of Common Pleas was, whether coupling together the notice of objection and list of voters for the parish of St. Woollos, it did not sufficiently appear that the place called The Oaks was the place of abode of the objector, and that it was situate in the parish of St. Woollos;" and it is there said in the judgment, by Wilde, C.J., "It was held, by the barrister, that the notice, admitted to be insufficient in itself, might be made valid by being coupled with the register, &c., and we think that this decision is wrong." The barrister here has found the fact which was the foundation of that judgment in a different way: the notice here is sufficient in itself, and therefore his decision is correct; and Woollett v. Davis is an authority in favour of the respondent.

[MAULE, J.—A good deal of the case sent to us may be struck out: the mere negation of no other street of the same name, the existence of a register, &c., and it then comes to this:—Is the description of the objector taken by itself sufficient? or, rather, is it necessarily insufficient? The statement of the immaterial facts leads us to fancy that, but for their existence, the barrister might not perhaps have found as he has done; but those facts should not have influenced his judgment.]

It has never been decided, as a matter of law, that it is necessary to give the name of the parish, in describing the place of the objector's abode, in a notice of objection: it is rather a question of fact to be decided in each case by the revising barrister. Thus King Street, with nothing more, in a London notice, would probably be held an insufficient—King Street, with nothing more in a Huntingdon notice, a sufficient description of an objector's place of residence. The Court will not lay down an inflexible rule of what is necessary to be stated in each case. In Knowles v. Brooking (2), the Court decided, that in a notice of objection it was sufficient to state the objector's present place of abode, because the word "of," in form No. 11 (signed) A. B., "of," was intended to give all necessary information to the person objected to. As then the place of abode is not matter of description, but matter of information, it is necessarily a question of fact. In this case the barrister has given his decision; and by the 65th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. it cannot be impeached.

[MAULE, J.—This is a consolidated appeal. If the decision went upon that ground, the revising barrister ought to have inquired into the means of knowledge of each party objected to.]

He has found, as a fact, that the information given in the notice was sufficient for everybody, that, according to the 101st section, "the person is denominated in the notice so as to be commonly understood."

[WILLIAMS, J.—That section would not authorize omissions, but admits the use of equivalents, as St. Kitts for St. Christopher.]

The judgment of Tindal, C.J., in Gadsby v. Warburton (3), shews that a place of abode is not necessarily to be described as in a parish, and that if there be any inconvenience to the party objected to, in consequence of a want of particularity in the notice, such inconvenience should have been proved.

Byles, Serj., in reply.—The sufficiency of this notice is a question of law, and not a question of fact; it was so left by the barrister, and so decided by this Court in Gadsby v. Warburton and Woollett v. Davis. At any rate it is a question of law to some extent, as appears from Walter v. Haynes (4), where Lord Tenterden decided that the sufficiency of the direction on a letter was matter of law.

(3) 7 Man. & Gr. 11; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 41.

(4) Ry. & Moo. 149.

[WILDE, C.J.—I understand that case as a decision on a matter of fact. The Judge decided, the direction on this letter "Mr. Haynes, Bristol," is so general, that it furnishes no evidence of the fact that the notice of dishonour of a bill contained in the letter has ever reached Mr. Haynes.]

It cannot be collected from this case what the barrister would have found upon the notice itself; he finds many facts, and coupling them together with the notice decides that the notice is sufficient. In Woollett v. Davis the Court rejected the register which had been, as it were, annexed to the notice to establish its validity; and the Court will reject the facts which have here been used for its support. The decision of the barrister was reversed in that case, and it must be also reversed in this.

[WILLIAMS, J.—The statement here may fairly mean, I thought the notice sufficient, but should not have done so had it been shewn there was another Sherborne Street.]

WILDE, C.J.—It is required by the 17th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. that an objector must adopt the form of notice of objection No. 11 in Schedule (B) to that act, which form requires the objector's signature to be given, and also a statement of his place of abode. The first question is, does that statement involve a matter of fact or a matter of law? It appears to me to involve both. When the stated place of abode names a particular locality, and the statement is so vague that by means of it such locality could not be found, the question as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of such statement would then be matter of law. Suppose an objector in London were to describe himself of King Street simply, that would be a description of his place of abode from its extreme generality so manifestly insufficient, that a decision upon it might be reviewed by this Court as a matter of law. But if the description were so particular and defined as to be as generally understood as the one supposed would be likely to be misunderstood, then the question would be for the barrister; and his decision upon it could not be inquired into by this Court, because his decision would in such case be pronounced on a matter of fact. In Woollett v. Davis the Court held the decision of the barrister wrong, because he had coupled two things together (the register and the notice), which as a matter of law ought not to have been coupled together, and without such junction the notice of objection was insufficient; the revising barrister found it was insufficient, we adopted his opinion, and therefore reversed his decision. In Gadsby v. Warburton the barrister thought that the description of the place of abode of the objector, "Poplar Grove, Didsbury," was sufficient in fact, but that something ought to have been added to the description as matter of law, such as "near Manchester" or "Lancashire," and therefore he decided against the validity of the notice: the Court, however, thought that it was not necessary as matter of law to add anything to the description, and so reversed his decision; but there was no suggestion in that case that the notice was insufficient, as the barrister had decided it to be in Woollett v. Davis, and this shews the perfect agreement of those two cases. In this case the objector states his place of abode to be No. 5, Sherborne Street. The question is, where is Sherborne Street? What am I, the voter objected to, to understand by Sherborne Street? Why, what are the parties inquiring or corresponding about? The subject is a vote for the borough of Cheltenham, the person addressed resides at Cheltenham, he is a voter of Cheltenham, and the notice being applicable to a vote for the borough of Cheltenham, can anybody doubt that No. 5, Sherborne Street means in the borough of Cheltenham? Then, taking this notice as applicable to the borough of Cheltenham, is it not a reasonable and sufficient description of a person's residence, when you are referring to such a place as Cheltenham to say, he lives at No. 5, Sherborne Street? I think the description was prima facie sufficient. The barrister has decided as a matter of fact that it was sufficient, and his decision must be affirmed.

COLTMAN, J.—I am disposed to think that this notice was sufficient to give the information to the voter objected to which the act of parliament requires. It may be doubtful whether such a notice would be sufficient to give information to all persons. But we should, I think, take into our consideration, when we look at this notice, that it relates to the register of voters for a borough on which the name of the voter was, that is, the borough of Cheltenham; and though it is not necessary that the objector must reside in Cheltenham, still when parties are talking and referring to the borough of Cheltenham, the mention of the name of Sherborne Street must and would naturally be taken with reference to, and in connexion with, that borough, and the description therefore means Sherborne Street, Cheltenham. The statement of the place of abode must be the true statement; and when it is contended by the appellant, that on this notice the objector might say, I meant Sherborne Street, York, the answer is, that then the notice is bad, because the statement in it of your place of abode is untrue; "Sherborne Street" in this notice, means Sherborne Street, Cheltenham, and cannot mean anywhere else. As a matter of fact the barrister has found the description to be sufficiently particular; the facts stated in the first part of the case do not necessarily qualify his opinion, nor does he state that those facts were the foundation of his opinion. It is not necessary for the barrister to give his reasons, but if we saw enough on the face of the document to shew that the statement was not reasonably sufficient, we should say as a matter of law that his decision was wrong.

MAULE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I doubted at first whether the barrister had not founded his opinion of the sufficiency of the notice upon the facts stated in the case; but, on consideration, I am satisfied that he did not do so. It is to be observed, that the notice is directed—

"To Mr. Charles Sheldon, No. 1, Olney Place.

"Take notice, that I object to your name being retained on the list of voters for the borough of Cheltenham.

(Signed) "John Fletcher,
No. 5, Sherborne Street, on the register of voters for the parish of Cheltenham."

The notice then is from a Cheltenham man to a Cheltenham man, and the subject before and between them is a vote for Cheltenham. There is no fuller description of Olney Place than there is of Sherborne Street. Does Mr. Charles Sheldon know, upon receiving this notice, where Olney Place is? if so, why should he not know where Sherborne Street is? Does he suppose, or could any person suppose, that Olney Place and Sherborne Street, mentioned in this notice, are in York or in Gloucester? No person out of a court of justice could doubt (reference being had to the matter of inquiry,) that these places are both in Cheltenham; and I do not think that because we are in a court of justice such a doubt should be entertained. Then, as upon the proper construction of this notice, a sufficient description of the place of abode has been given in point of law, and as the barrister has decided that the description for all practical purposes is sufficient in point of fact, his decision must be affirmed.

WILLIAMS, J.—Upon the face of this document, No. 5, "Sherborne Street," must mean Sherborne Street, Cheltenham: that is sufficient in point of law. The question of particularity was for the barrister, and he has decided that it was sufficient.

Decision affirmed.

May 8. } WONTNER v. SHAIRP.*

Railway—Action for Return of Deposit—Committee of Management—Misrepresentation by Subscription Deed.

*In an action for money had and received brought by a depositor against one of the committee of management of a projected railway company, it appeared from the prospectus that the capital was to have been 3,000,000*l.*, in 120,000 shares, deposit 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share. The plaintiff requested an allotment of sixty shares, stating "I undertake to accept the same, subject to the regulations of the company, and to sign the legal documents, and to pay, when required, the deposit." To this the following answer (in substance) was sent: "Not transferable. The L. and E. R. Company, capital 3,000,000*l.*, in 120,000 shares of 25*l.* each, &c.—Sir,—The committee have, at your request, allotted you sixty shares, upon condition that the deposit be paid on or before the 18th of October, in default of which such allotment will be forfeited." Before the day so appointed for the payment* of the deposit, the committee of management issued an advertisement, stating that they had completed the allotment of shares, and apologizing to disappointed applicants. There was evidence that the plaintiff saw this advertisement; within a day or two he paid his deposit, and he afterwards executed the subscription deed, which gave authority to the committee to pay expenses out of the m<sup>o</sup> subscribed. The committee allotted only 58,000 shares, though they had had the opportunity of allotting the whole 120,000. The deposits had been expended, and there were no funds to make the deposit required by the House of Commons. The plaintiff, with a knowledge of the last two circumstances, attended a meeting which was called of the shareholders, and moved that the deposits should be returned, but was outvoted. Afterwards the scheme was abandoned:—Held, first, that the application for and the allotment of the shares did not, at the time when the plaintiff paid the deposit, constitute a contract binding upon the plaintiff to take and pay for shares in a concern consisting of 58,000 shares only.

Secondly, that the application being unconditional, and the form of the allotment conditional, the contract was not, upon that account, binding upon the plaintiff.

Thirdly, that the jury were warranted in saying that the advertisement, stating that the committee had completed the allotment of shares, was a fraudulent misrepresentation, and a material inducement to the plaintiff to pay his money; and that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to recover it back in an action for money had and received.

Fourthly, that the payment of the deposit having been obtained from the plaintiff by misrepresentation, the deed executed by him under the same belief formed no answer to the action.

Fifthly, that the plaintiff's subsequent attendance at the meeting did not preclude him from bringing the action.

Assumpsit for money had and received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff, and upon an account stated.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

The cause was tried, before Erle, J. and a special jury, at the sittings in Middlesex, after last Trinity term, when it appeared that the action was brought to recover a sum of money paid by the plaintiff to the directors of the Direct London and Exeter Railway Company, as the deposit upon sixty shares allotted to him in that concern. The defendant was one of the directors of the company. On the 24th of May 1845, the company was formed and provisionally registered, and the following prospectus (so far as it is material) was issued: "Direct London and Exeter Railway Company (with extensions to Falmouth and Penzance). Capital, 3,000,000*l.*, in 120,000 shares of 25*l.* each. Deposit, 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share (a further deposit of 1*l.* 5*s.* per share to be paid after the bill has passed the House of Commons), with power to raise 1,000,000*l.* more, if necessary (provisionally registered pursuant to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110)." Then followed the list of the provisional committee, and a list of the committee of management (in both of which the defendant's name appeared). The prospectus then set forth the various advantages of the line, and then stated: "The entire line has been partially surveyed. The plans, sections, and books of reference will be ready within the time prescribed by the Standing Orders of Parliament, and application will be made for a bill to incorporate the company early in the next session. In case Parliament should not sanction the present undertaking, which every active means will be taken to secure, the money deposited, deducting the necessary expenses attending the project, will be returned to the shareholders. The deposit of 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* will be sufficient to comply with the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, and after the bill has passed the Commons a further deposit of 1*l.* 5*s.* will be made in order to comply with the regulations of the House of Lords. The committee are unwilling to require the whole deposit earlier than is absolutely necessary. Prospectuses and plans of the line, with forms of application for shares may be had at the offices of the company."

The form of application for shares, as set out at the foot of the prospectus, was as follows:—

"To the provisional committee of management of the Direct London and Exeter Railway Company.

"Gentlemen,—I request you will allot me        shares of 25*l.* each in the above railway; and I undertake to accept the same, or such less number as you may appropriate to me, subject to the regulations of the company, and also to pay the necessary deposit of 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share, and to sign the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement when required."

On the 25th of September the plaintiff sent a written application for thirty shares in the company, signed and in the form prescribed, substituting only the words "necessary legal documents" for "parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement," and gave as his referee the name R. This paper was produced, and there appeared written upon it "Perfectly good for thirty shares. R." The plaintiff afterwards, and before the scrip was issued, applied to increase the number to sixty shares. To these applications, the following answer was sent to the plaintiff, signed by the secretary, on the 13th of October:—

"Not transferable. The Direct London and Exeter Railway Company, with extensions to Falmouth and Penzance, provisionally registered. Capital 3,000,000*l.*, in 120,000 shares of 25*l.* each, deposit 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share. Number of shares sixty.

"Sir,—The committee have, at your request, allotted to you sixty shares of 25*l.* each in this undertaking, on condition that the deposit of 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share thereon be paid on or before the 18th of October instant, in default of which this allotment will be forfeited, and the shares disposed of to other applicants. The bankers will give a receipt in exchange for this letter, which must be left with them. I beg also to inform you that the scrip for shares will be delivered to you in exchange for the bankers' receipt, on your executing the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement, of which due notice will be given. Be pleased to observe that the bankers' receipt must be produced when you attend to execute the deed."

The following advertisements were inserted in the Times newspaper of the 15th and 17th of October, respectively:—

"The Direct London and Exeter Railway. —The managing committee of management of this company hereby give notice that the allotment of shares is completed, and that the letters will be issued to the public, if possible, this day.

"E. S. Blundell, Hon. Sec.

"October 13, 1845."

"The Direct London and Exeter Railway. —The committee of management are happy to announce that the surveys are being carried on with the utmost activity, under the superintendence of Mr. Braithwaite and his assistant engineer, and that they have no doubt of being able to comply with the Standing Orders even before the time fixed by parliament. The second deposit of 5*l.* per cent., in addition to the 1*l.* 5*s.* per share, required by the House of Commons, need not be called for under the Standing Orders of the House of Lords, until the bill shall have passed the House of Commons.

"By order of the committee,

"E. S. Blundell, Hon. Sec.

"6, Great Winchester Street, Oct. 13, 1845."

"Times, 17th October 1845.

"The direct London and Exeter Railway, (with extensions to Falmouth and Penzance). —The committee of management hereby give notice, that they have completed the allotment of shares, and that the usual letters are this day issued. In the arduous duty of deciding on claims unprecedented, it is believed, in their number and respectability, the committee have been obliged to give a preference to applicants locally interested, or likely to bring to bear for the company a large share of legitimate influence. The numerous persons with undoubted claims on the score of wealth and social standing, whose applications have either been passed over or cut down, are requested to accept this reason as the committee's apology. The committee desire to add, that while attestations of public support are daily reaching them from the most influential quarters, the engineering preparations, under Mr. Braithwaite, are so far advanced that the project cannot fail to be placed before parliament in a manner the most satisfactory to the shareholders.

"J. S. Blundell, Hon. Sec."

The plaintiff did not pay the deposit upon his allotment of shares until the 21st of October, four days after the date of the last advertisement, and there was some evidence to shew that he had previously seen the advertisement. Only 58,000 of the 120,000 shares were ever allotted. Upon the 4th of November the plaintiff executed the railway deed. It was in the usual form, and contained a clause empowering the committee to pay the expenses which had been or might be incurred, out of the deposits. The company were not in a condition to go before parliament; the paid-up capital was not sufficient, and the regular notices had not been given.

Upon the 15th of December a meeting was held of the shareholders, and the plaintiff then first learned that only 58,000 shares had been allotted. Resolutions of confidence, &c. in the directors and in the project were put at the meeting, and the plaintiff proposed, as an amendment, that the deposits be returned: the chairman, however, did not put the amendment, and the original resolutions were carried, the plaintiff voting against them. Shortly afterwards the project was entirely abandoned, but no part of the deposits was returned, the money having been expended in the surveys and other matters.

At the trial the Judge left it to the jury to say whether there had been a fraudulent misrepresentation; and whether, if so, it was material to induce the plaintiff to pay the deposit. He also asked them whether the deed was executed by the plaintiff under the same belief he was under when he paid the deposit, and whether the consideration had failed. The jury having answered these questions in the affirmative, the Judge ordered a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff, without stating whether the application for the shares and the allotment constituted a binding contract or not.

A rule nisi having been obtained in Michaelmas term for a nonsuit or a new trial—

Knowles and J. Brown now shewed cause. —The plaintiff is entitled to keep his verdict. First, the money in question was paid in consequence of a fraudulent misrepresentation, untrue to the knowledge of the defendant; and, if so, it may be recovered back in an action for money had and received—Pope v. Wray (1). There is no doubt of a false statement having been made by the directors, because the advertisement, inserted in the newspapers by them, contained the statement that they had completed the allotment of the shares. It will be argued that the advertisement was only directed to disappointed allottees; but that argument is disproved by the concluding part of the advertisement, which shews it to have been directed to the shareholders also. Even if it was not issued with the object of inducing shareholders to pay the deposits, if it was calculated to have that effect it constitutes fraud in law—Polhill v. Walter (2); here the jury have found that it was a misrepresentation. It will be argued that the plaintiff was bound by his contract to pay the deposit before the fraudulent advertisement in question was issued. The answer is, there never was any such contract. The plaintiff made a proposal, asking for shares “in the above railway,” i. e. shares in a railway in which the whole number of shares would be allotted. The answer to that proposal, which was the allotment, contained the new term, the deposit “to be paid on or before the 18th of October instant.” The allotment was, therefore, conditional—Greaves v. Ashlin (3), Martindale v. Smith (4). The condition also was not complied with, because the payment was not made by the plaintiff until the 21st of October. There was no contract, therefore, until that date; and, before that date, the fraudulent advertisement had been issued. To constitute a binding contract there ought to have been a simple acceptance of the proposal, without the introduction of any new term—Holland v. Eyre (5), Routledge v. Grant (6), Smith v. Surman (7), Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, p. 116. Again, the letter of allotment is headed, “not transferable;” but the act of parliament does not make them not transferable—Young v. Smith (8), Lawton v. Hickman (9); and it has been the practice to sell letters of allotment before the scrip was issued—Mitchell v. Newhall (10). But for those words, therefore, the plaintiff might have sold his prospective right to the shares—Hibblewhite v. M'Morine (11), Mortimer v. M'Callan (12). Even if a valid contract had been entered into by the plaintiff to take the shares, no action could have been maintained against him for breach of the contract, because the plaintiff's answer would have been, "you do not give me what I contracted for." He was not bound to enter into a concern with smaller capital and fewer shares. All the shares must first have been allotted—Fox v. Clifton (13), Pitchford v. Davis (14). It will be said that the defendant waived his right to repudiate the shares by attending the meeting of the 15th of December. [The Court intimated that it was not necessary to argue this point.] Then with respect to the execution of the deed, the jury have found that the plaintiff executed the deed under the same belief as when he paid the money. This puts an end to any question which might arise with respect to the deed. The deed is only applicable to the event of the company being duly formed. Nothing had occurred at the time of the execution of the deed to shew the plaintiff that fewer shares had been disposed of. The deed is distinct from the prospectus, and not in pursuance of it: it is part of the fraud that it varies from the prospectus; and it was executed by the plaintiff under the misrepresentation. The general rule, as laid down in Nockells v. Crosby (15) and Walstab v. Spottiswoode (16) is, that when parties pay money in respect of a scheme which turns out entirely abortive, the expense of it ought to fall upon the projectors. The defendant, also, cannot take advantage of the deed, under the plea of non assumpsit—see Filmer v. Burnby (17.)

Sir F. Kelly, Channell, Serj., and Fitzherbert, in support of the rule.—When the plaintiff has requested to have an allotment of shares, and has undertaken to accept an allotment which is to be subject to the regulations of the company, the only reasonable construction is, that the allotment is to be subject to such conditions and stipulations concerning the shares as the company may reasonably think proper to impose. The allotment is notified by a letter, which says that scrip will be delivered upon executing the parliamentary contract; and the plaintiff's letter in answer completes the contract, and makes it binding on the defendants. It must then be seen what the plaintiff has done in pursuance of that contract. Part of it is that he is to sign a parliamentary contract; and by the deed executed by him on the 4th of November he contracts with new parties as to the deposit. Thus the money was paid by the plaintiff under a contract, which not only contained within itself certain terms, but under which a deed was executed by which the committee is authorized to incur various expenses; and if the plaintiff is entitled to recover back his deposit, it can only be subject to those expenses which the committee have incurred. As soon as expenses are shewn to have been incurred the onus is on the plaintiff of shewing that there is a surplus after paying all those expenses. An account must be taken of the expenses. The 23rd section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. enacts, that it shall be lawful for the promoters to receive such further sum above 10s. per cent. as may be required by the Standing Orders of either house of parliament to be deposited before the obtaining of an act of parliament. As the committee have only received 5s. per cent. to deposit in compliance with the then Standing Orders, they must be presumed to have kept it in their hands for that purpose, and the time for making the deposit never having arrived, they are to hold it according to the contract that has been entered into between the parties. It is not a contract such as there was in Fox v. Clifton and Pitchford v. Davis. Those cases are not applicable to this question. The liability for an act which a company can only perform when formed is different from the liability for acts necessary for the formation of it. Goods were supplied in those cases as to a company that had been formed. Therefore, if the case be put upon the undertaking having failed, the answer is, "you have made this deposit upon a special contract; you have made it upon an undertaking that you shall only have it back after payment of the expenses, and until an account has been taken as to how much they amount to, and what should be borne by each person, you cannot maintain an action to recover it back." A fraudulent misrepresentation (if there was one) is only collateral to the contract, and will not entitle the plaintiff to rescind it. Then, as to the effect of the misrepresentation, and how far the learned Judge's charge is to be supported. The learned Judge left it to the jury to say, whether, supposing the representation to be false, it was material to induce the plaintiff to pay the money. In insurance law if a party make a representation upon anything which is material, or suppress a fact which is material, it avoids the policy; but that doctrine is peculiar to cases of insurance, and is not applicable to general cases of false representation. In these the law is, that the representation must be false and knowingly false, and the party must thereby be induced to pay, and must pay the money, in consequence of the false representation. In Moens v. Heyworth (13) the law is so laid down by Parke, B. p. 157. It is submitted that justice will not be done in this case, unless the question be submitted in a less ambiguous form to another jury. Further, the plaintiff attends the meeting of the 5th of December, at which a full and candid statement is made, and he is then informed of the untruth of the advertisement. He ought then to have said, I hold myself bound as a shareholder no longer; but, on the contrary, resolutions are come to at that meeting, of which the plaintiff suffers himself to form a part, implying that the company still has existence. Has the plaintiff a right to say, on the 5th of December, I am a shareholder, and to oppose the resolutions and propose an amendment consistently with such right; and to say now I am not a shareholder, and to demand the return of his deposit? It was a question of fact also for the jury, whether there had not been an acceptance of the contract before the 17th. The plaintiff's sending an answer amounted to an acceptance of the contract—Richardson v. Dunn (14). This question was not left to the jury. Again, it should have been left to the jury to say, whether the representation was made with a fraudulent intention or not—Langridge v. Levy (15). They then cited on the question of the false representation Shrewsbury v. Blount (16), Taylor v. Ashton (17). If the alleged falsehood was after the contract was completed, it does not invalidate the contract—Stone v. Grubham (18), Mason v. Ditchburn (19); and it was not decided at the trial by the Judge, whether the contract was or was not completed. On the alleged misdirection they cited Foster v. Charles (20), Vernon v. Keys (21), Barley v. Walford (22); and that the defence, in consequence of the deed, was open to the defendant under non assumpsit, Edwards v. Bates (23).

WILDE, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the Court (24).—This was an action of assumpsit for money had and received to the use of the plaintiff. The plea was non assumpsit. The action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, as one of the committee of management of a projected railway company, to recover the sum of 82*l.* 10*s.*, paid by the plaintiff, as a deposit on sixty shares which had been allotted to him in that concern. The case was tried, before Erle, J., at Guildhall, after last Trinity term, when it appeared in evidence, that in the year 1845, a prospectus was issued in the following form:—that prospectus purported to be of a plan for making a railway, called the "Direct London and Exeter Railway, with extensions to Falmouth and Penzance, capital 3,000,000*l.*, in 120,000 shares of 25*l.* each, deposit 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share; a further deposit of 1*l.* 5*s.* per share to be paid after the bill has passed the House of Commons, with power to raise 1,000,000*l.* more, if necessary." It then proceeds to give the names of the provisional committee, and the committee of management, and contains various observations not material to this case, in regard to the plans; the defendant's name being inserted as one of the committee of management. It then states, "that the plans, sections, and books of reference would be ready within the time prescribed by the Standing Orders of Parliament, and that application would be made for a bill to incorporate the company early in the next session. That in case Parliament should not sanction the present undertaking, which every active means will be taken to secure, the money deposited, deducting the necessary expenses attending the project, would be returned to the shareholders. The deposit of 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share will be sufficient to comply with the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, and after the bill has passed the Commons, a further deposit of 1*l.* 5*s.* will be made in order to comply with the regulations of the House of Lords. The committee are unwilling to require the whole deposit earlier than is absolutely necessary. Prospectuses and plans of the lines, with forms of applications for shares, may be had at the office of the company." It then contains a form of application for shares, directed to the provisional committee of management in the "Direct London and Exeter Railway Company,"—"Gentlemen,—I request you will allot me        shares of 25*l.* each, in the above railway, and I undertake to accept the same, or such less number as you may appropriate to me, subject to the regulations of the company, and also to sign the necessary legal documents, and to pay when required the deposit thereon of 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share." On the 25th of September 1845, the plaintiff sent in an application for shares in the form prescribed, which was to the following effect:—"To the provisional committee of management of the Direct London and Exeter Railway Company: Gentlemen,—I request you will allot me thirty shares of 25*l.* each, in the above railway, and I undertake to accept the same, or such less number as you may appropriate to me, subject to the regulations of the company, and also to sign the necessary legal documents and to pay when required the deposit thereon of 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share. Thomas Wontner, solicitor, Skinner Street, Snow Hill. Reference, W. R., Esq., No. 6, South Square, Gray's Inn, 25th of September 1845," signed by the plaintiff; and there is a note upon that paper: "Perfectly good for thirty shares. W. R."

It appears afterwards the plaintiff made an application to have the number of shares allotted to him increased from thirty to sixty. To this application the following answer was sent:—"Not transferable. The Direct London and Exeter Railway Company, with extensions to Falmouth and Penzance. Provisionally registered. Capital 3,000,000*l.* in 120,000 shares of 25*l.* each. Deposit, 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share. Number of shares, sixty.—Sir,—The committee have, at your request, allotted you sixty shares of 25*l.* each in this undertaking, upon condition that the deposit of 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share thereon be paid on or before Saturday, the 18th of October instant; in default of which, such allotment will be forfeited, and the shares disposed of to other applicants. The bankers will give a receipt for the deposit in exchange for this letter, which must be left with them. I beg also to inform you that the scrip for shares will be delivered to you in exchange for the bankers' receipt, on your executing the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement, of which due notice shall be given. Be pleased to observe, the bankers' receipt must be produced when you attend to execute the deed." Signed by the secretary and directed to the plaintiff. In this letter, as well as in the prospectus, the concern is described as one which was to have a capital of 3,000,000*l.* in 120,000 shares. Before the day appointed for the payment of the deposit, an advertisement was published by the managing committee, stating that the allotment of shares had been completed, in the following form, and dated the 17th of October 1845:—"The Direct London and Exeter Railway Company, with extensions to Falmouth and Penzance.—The committee of management hereby give notice, that they have completed the allotment of shares, and that the usual letters are this day issued. In the arduous duty of deciding on claims unprecedented in their number and respectability, the committee have been obliged to give a preference to applicants locally interested, or likely to bring to bear for the company a large share of legitimate influence. The numerous persons with undoubted claims, on the score of wealth and social standing, whose applications have been either passed over or cut down, are requested to accept this reason as the committee's apology. The committee desire to add that while attestations of public support are daily reaching them from the most influential quarters, the engineering preparations, under Mr. Braithwaite, are so far advanced, that the project cannot fail to be placed before parliament in a manner the most satisfactory to the shareholders." Signed by the secretary. Some evidence was given upon the trial, from which it might be inferred that the plaintiff saw this advertisement, and on the 23rd of October he paid 82*l.* 10*s.* as a deposit on shares allotted to him. At that time the committee had, in fact, allotted no more than 58,000 shares, although application had been made by responsible persons for more than 120,000. On the 4th of November, the plaintiff executed the subscription contract under seal, which gave power to the committee to pay expenses which had then or might thereafter be incurred, out of the sum thereby subscribed.

The plans and sections deposited in the Parliamentary Office on the 30th of November were imperfect; the whole of the deposit, except 400*l.*, had been expended, and the committee had no funds for making the deposit required by the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. On the 15th of December, a meeting of shareholders was called, at which the plaintiff attended, and resolutions of confidence in the concern and in the committee of management, and that a further allotment of shares should be made to raise the sum required for the deposit was then proposed. The plaintiff moved an amendment, that as 58,000 shares only had been allotted, the deposits already received should be returned to the parties who had paid them. The chairman did not put the amendment, but did put the original resolution, which was carried by a large majority. A few days afterwards, the committee found it was impossible to proceed with the undertaking, and on the 6th of January 1846 this action was commenced. On this state of facts it was contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that the advertisement stating that the allotment of shares had been completed, was false to the knowledge of the defendant, and was a fraudulent misrepresentation; that the plaintiff having been thereby induced to pay his money was entitled to recover it in this action; that the deed was executed by the plaintiff under the influence of the same misrepresentation, and therefore did not affect his rights. For the defendant it was contended, that the written application for shares and the letter of allotment constituted a valid contract, by which the plaintiff was bound to pay the deposit on or before the 18th of October, and therefore that he could not be permitted to ascribe the payment which he made to the advertisement, and further, whatever might have been the result had the case rested on the prospectus and letters only, the deed expressly authorized the application of deposits to the payment of expenses incurred in preparing for parliament. The learned Judge, before whom the case was tried, without declaring his opinion whether the letters of application and allotment constituted a binding contract or not, left it to the jury to say, whether the defendant had made a fraudulent misrepresentation, which was a material inducement to the plaintiff to pay his money; whether the consideration had failed, the company being at an end; and whether the deed executed by the plaintiff was so executed under the same belief which operated on his mind when he paid his money. The jury having answered these questions in the affirmative, the learned Judge said, that this finding would entitle the plaintiff to a verdict for 82*l.* 10*s.*, which was accordingly entered in his favour. In Michaelmas term a rule nisi was obtained for entering a nonsuit or verdict for the defendant, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. The case was recently argued before us, when it was contended as at the trial, on behalf of the defendant, that the letters constituted a binding contract; that the payment by the plaintiff must be ascribed to his legal liability and not to the advertisement; that the advertisement contained no misrepresentation, for that it did not import that the whole number of shares had been allotted, or if it did, the representation was manifestly addressed to disappointed applicants, and not to allottees, and therefore had no reference to the plaintiff; and that if the money was not obtained by fraud, the deed which the plaintiff had executed expressly authorized the application of it to the payment of expenses; but it was admitted, that if the payment was obtained from the plaintiff by fraud, the deed would be no answer to the action.

It was further contended that the plaintiff, by attending the meeting on the 15th of December, and there acting and voting as a shareholder after he knew that only 58,000 shares had been allotted, had thereby precluded himself from claiming a return of his depositon that ground, for which Campbell v. Fleming (25) was cited as an authority. Upon the first of these points, we are of opinion that there was no contract binding on the plaintiff to part with his money at the time when he paid the deposit; he had applied for sixty shares in a concern which was to have a capital of 3,000,000*l.* raised by the issue of 120,000 shares. The committee allotted to him a very different thing, but professed to allot him that which he had asked for, and the letter of allotment as well as the prospectus described the capital as 3,000,000*l.*, the number of shares 120,000. Now, it might be reasonable to expect that such an undertaking would succeed with a capital of 3,000,000*l.*, but absurd to suppose it could be accomplished for less than half the sum. The plaintiff therefore, having asked for shares in a practicable scheme, received shares in one which was impracticable, and which was rendered so by the act of the committee in refusing to allot more than 58,000 shares, although more than the 120,000 had been applied for by responsible persons: that which was allotted not being in truth that which the plaintiff asked for, he was not bound to take it. Again, the allotment was not absolute, but conditional only; and on that ground, also, we think the letters of application and allotment do not constitute a valid contract—the letter of allotment not being a simple acceptance of the plaintiff's proposal. Such being our opinion as to the alleged contract, we must inquire whether there was any evidence that the plaintiff was induced to pay his money by any fraudulent representation; if there was not, the plaintiff ought to have been nonsuited or a verdict found for the defendant, but we think there was ample evidence of such misrepresentation.

If we are to construe the advertisement, we think it means that all the shares had been allotted; the advertisement was a public advertisement, or at least it must be taken to have been addressed to all who were interested in the subject-matter of it, of whom the plaintiff undoubtedly was one. To him it represents that he had got what he had asked for, that is, sixty shares out of 120,000 shares in the proposed adventure; the jury were therefore well warranted in finding the representation so made was a material inducement to the plaintiff to pay his money. If the meaning of the advertisement was for the jury, they appear to have construed it as we do: either way, there was ample evidence to be left to the jury on this point, and upon this point there is no ground for either a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendant. The next point made for the defendant was, that the plaintiff by attending and acting as a shareholder at the meeting of the 15th of December, when he knew only 58,000 shares had been allotted, had precluded himself from making any claim to his deposit on that ground; but this is disposed of by the evidence. The only act done by the plaintiff at that meeting was to propose that, in consequence of the allotment of only 58,000 shares, all the deposits should be returned; and the argument comes to this, that having tried to induce others to join him in claiming the deposit, and failing in that attempt, he shall not be permitted to do so by himself. No such doctrine as that is to be found in Campbell v. Fleming, or any other decided case that we are aware of. The plaintiff did no act at that meeting or afterwards, shewing his assent to be treated as a holder of sixty shares, and we think, notwithstanding his attendance at that meeting, he is in a condition to maintain the present action; the motion, therefore, for a nonsuit or to enter the verdict for the defendant on this point wholly fails. But it was further contended by Mr. Fitzherbert that the defendant was entitled to a new trial because the learned Judge did not tell the jury whether the letter of application and allotment did or did not constitute a binding contract. It is impossible to make that a ground for a new trial. Whether they constituted a contract or not, is a question of law for the Court, and not of fact for the jury; and if a new trial were granted, the same questions that the learned Judge submitted to the jury must be again submitted to them. However, it appears that after taking their opinion upon the question of fraudulent misrepresentation, the Judge said that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, which must be taken as a direction to the jury to find such a verdict. If in order to give that direction it was necessary to decide that the letters did not constitute a contract, the learned Judge in giving that direction must be taken to have so decided; and if we had considered those letters did constitute a contract, we must have treated that direction as incorrect, and made the rule absolute for a new trial. Inasmuch as we think the direction right, the rule obtained by the defendant fails on this as well as on the other points, and must therefore be discharged. My Brother Williams having been consulted when at the bar in this case, has taken no part in the consideration of this question.

Nov. 22. } MOLLETT v. WACKERBARTH AND OTHERS.

Contract, Alteration of, material—Plea—Variance.

A material alteration of a sold note by the buyer, without the privity of the seller, avoids the contract.

An alteration in a material part of a written contract, without the consent of both parties, is a material alteration which avoids the contract, although it may not have altered the duty of the party sought to be charged.

A plea stated that a material alteration had been made in the contract declared on, and proceeded to specify the alteration under a videlicet; and at the trial, a different alteration, which was also material, was proved, and no objection was taken on the ground of variance:—Held, that the plaintiff could not take advantage of the variance in shewing cause against a rule nisi for leave to enter a verdict for the defendants.

Semle—That it was not necessary under such a plea to prove the specific alteration alleged; and that, at all events, the Judge could have amended the plea at the trial.

Assumpsit for non-delivery of goods. The declaration stated, that the plaintiff agreed to buy, and the defendants to sell, a large quantity, (to wit) 100 tons of crushed sugar, as per sample, in hogsheads, at 40l.

per ton, free on board, to be shipped within the prompt, and paid for on delivery in cash, the sellers allowing discount, at the rate of 4l. per centum per annum, for the unexpired term of two months. Breach, that although the prompt (meaning two calendar months) had expired, the defendants had not delivered the sugar according to the agreement.

To this declaration the defendants pleaded five pleas, of which the last and only material one was as follows:—"That the said agreement in the declaration mentioned was made and entered into by the defendants, in and by a certain written agreement or instrument in writing, duly signed by one Joseph Dodson, the agent lawfully authorized of them, the defendants, in that behalf, and not otherwise; and the defendants further say, that the agreement was a contract for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise for the price of upwards of 10l. within the true intent and meaning of the statute made and passed in the 29th year of the reign of his Majesty King Charles the Second, intituled 'An act for the prevention of frauds and perjuries;' and that the buyer of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, (to wit) the plaintiff, hath not accepted part of the goods sold, or given anything in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment; and the defendants further say, that after the said agreement had been made as in the declaration mentioned, and after the said agreement or instrument in writing had been so signed by the said agent of the defendants as aforesaid, and after the defendants had promised as in the declaration mentioned, and before the commencement of this suit, (to wit) on the 7th day of July, A.D. 1845, the said plaintiff, without the knowledge or consent of the defendants, caused the said agreement or instrument in writing to be, and the same was then, altered in a certain material particular, (that is to say), by inserting in the said agreement or instrument in writing certain words to the purport and effect, that the sugars mentioned in the said agreement or instrument in writing were to be of the manufacture of them, the defendants; and the defendants further say, that the said agreement contained in the said instrument in writing so signed by the said agent of them, the defendants, as aforesaid, became and was by such alteration materially altered and changed as regards the mode of performing the same by them, the defendants; and that by reason of the premises in this plea mentioned, the said agreement in the declaration mentioned became and was from the time of the said alteration void and of none effect."

Replication to the fifth plea, that the agreement or instrument in writing, in the last plea mentioned, was not altered in any material particular in manner and form as in the last-mentioned plea alleged.

At the trial, before Erle, J., at Guildhall (6th of July 1847), it appeared in evidence that in July 1845, the plaintiff employed Dodson, as broker, to purchase 100 tons of crushed sugar, and that Dodson employed another broker, named Plaxton, who entered into the contract with the defendants. On the 7th of July Plaxton delivered the following sold note to the defendants:—

"London, 7th July 1845.

"To my principal.—Sold for Messrs. Wackerbarths & Coling, 100 tons of crushed sugar (as per sample) in hogsheads, at 40*l.* per ton, free on board, to be shipped within the prompt, and paid for on delivery, in cash, the sellers allowing discount at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum for the unexpired term of two months."

The bought note was not delivered to the plaintiff till after the defendants had received the sold note. No samples were produced at the time of the contract, but the plaintiff had seen one previously, and saw others subsequently. Those samples were all of the manufacture of the defendants, but other houses manufactured sugars not distinguishable from those of the defendants; and at the time of the contract there were Dutch sugars in the market. After the receipt of the bought note, which corresponded exactly with the sold note, the plaintiff, without the privity of the defendants, wrote the words "of their own manufacture" at the bottom of it, making marks of reference, in order to introduce these words after the words "as per sample," in the body of the note, and within the parenthesis. The Judge, holding this alteration to be immaterial, on the ground that it did not alter the legal effect of the instrument, directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff; leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them.

Talfourd, Serj. having obtained a rule nisi, pursuant to the leave reserved,—

Channell, Serj. and Peacock (22nd November) shewed cause. The plea is founded on the case of Powell v. Divett (1), in which it was held that a material alteration in a sale note, without the consent of the purchaser, annuls the instrument. The principle on which that case was decided is recognized in Cumming v. Roebuck (2), Grant v. Fletcher (3), and Davidson v. Cooper (4).

[WILLIAMS, J.—The old rule laid down in Pigot's case (5) is, that when an alteration has been made in a deed by a stranger, the question is, whether that alteration is material or not, but where it has been made by one of the parties, it avoids the instrument whether material or not. The law is similarly laid down in Shep. Touch. 68, 69, and in Swiney v. Barry (6).]

It is submitted that the defendants were bound to shew that the alteration had been made, that it was a material alteration, and that it was to the effect described in the record. First, there was no alteration of the contract. The words "of their own manufacture," were a mere memorandum to remind the broker that the samples were of the manufacture of the defendants. If it had been intended to alter the contract, the sold note would have been altered as well as the bought note. The defendants held in their hands the sold note, which was part of the contract, and they had not by that note agreed to sell sugars of their own manufacture. Secondly, if there was an alteration, it was not material. The sale was made by sample, the sample being of Messrs. Wackerbarths' manufacture. That does not mean that the goods so to be delivered must be of their manufacture. At the trial it was proved, by a sugar-broker, that he would not have known the Messrs. Wackerbarths' sugar from others. If there was any custom of trade as to selling by sample, the question should have been left to the jury. In the case of a simple contract, an immaterial alteration, even by a party to the contract, does not render it void—Sanderson v. Symonds (7). Thirdly, even if there was a material alteration, it was not such a one as is described in the plea; the note, when produced, shewing a contract to sell by sample, which was of the defendants' manufacture, and the allegation being that the alteration made it a contract to sell goods of the defendants' own manufacture.

Talfourd, Serj. and Cleasby, in support of the rule.—The rule laid down in Pigot's case and in Shep. Touch. is precisely in point. Any alteration by the plaintiff, or by a stranger at his request, without the privity of the defendants, would render the contract void. In Langhorn v. Cologan (8), the alteration of a policy, by inserting a specific description of the subject insured, which was assented to by some of the underwriters, was held to avoid the policy as to those who did not assent. Campbell v. Christie (9) was a similar case. The case of Sanderson v. Symonds, cited on the other side, is the only case in which an alteration of a contract has not been held to vitiate it, and it differs materially from the present. The Lord Chief Justice there says, "The words interlined were no more than a proposed alteration adopted by those who subscribed their initials, and refused by those who did not." In Davidson v. Cooper the act of alteration was far from being so strong against the defendant as the present one is. There the language was not altered at all; there was only the addition of a seal to the agreement. The question comes to be, whether the words written at the bottom of the sold note were only a memorandum to assist the memory of the party as to the sample. If the intention of the plaintiff was to make an alteration, that alteration must be a material one, and must also have been made in the sense of the allegation in the plea. If it had relation to the subject-matter, and if it was intended to convey the slightest meaning as to the subject-matter, it must be material. It appeared at the trial, that at the time the contract was entered into, there were Dutch sugars in the market, and the plaintiff may, upon that account, have wished, by introducing the words in question, to insure himself sugars of the defendants' manufacture.

WILDE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the substance of this plea was proved; that is to say, that an alteration had been made in that which was originally proposed to be the contract between the parties; that alteration being effected by the words "of their own manufacture," written at the bottom of the bought note, and marks of reference shewing that these words were to be introduced into the body of the note. On reading the note a question may arise, whether the words so introduced were intended to refer to the bulk which was to be delivered or to the sample. It appears to me, that whatever may have been the intention in this respect, the words have an equal effect in avoiding the contract. I confess I should be inclined to read the words introduced as applicable to the bulk, but I am content to take them as applicable to the sample only. The learned Judge, at the trial, expressed his opinion that the alteration was not material, because it did not alter the duty of the seller, nor impose upon him the duty of delivering other goods than those which would have been supplied according to the contract; but supposing that it does apply to the sample, and that it does not alter the duty of the seller, yet it may affect the rights of the parties. The Court does not know but that it may put the defendants in a different situation with regard to the trade, and the plaintiff might have had a reasonable ground of complaint if the sample turned out not to be of the Wackerbarths' manufacture, although the bulk, which was offered to be delivered, was equal in quality. Might not the purchaser have had an action, if that which was represented to be Wackerbarths' was not so? The seller, then, had two duties to perform: the one, to see that the sample was Wackerbarths'; and the other that the bulk was as good as the sample. It seems to me, therefore, that the alteration was material, and so avoided the contract. But it is said that the plea sets out an alteration of a particular import, which has not been established. If it was necessary to shew that the specific alteration mentioned had been made, the objection should have been taken at Nisi Prius. But there the only

(7) 1 Brod. & Bing. 426.

matter discussed was the materiality of the alteration. I think, therefore, that the rule for entering a verdict for the defendants should be made absolute.

COLTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question has arisen, whether the words introduced by the plaintiff are to be referred to the description of the bulk, or of the sample; and, I think, on looking at the note, those words must refer to the words "as per sample," which latter words are within a parenthesis, and the mark of reference to the words at the bottom is also within the parenthesis; and I also think, that, according to the ordinary grammatical construction, the reference is to "sample" as the last antecedent. It is true, that speculating on probabilities it must be supposed that the party intended to refer to the bulk; but I do not think that we should admit a speculation of that sort when called upon to judge of a written instrument. The alteration made there is a statement, that the sample was of the Wackerbarths' own manufacture. It is true that the duty of the defendant may not be altered by that circumstance, because it might have been sufficient to deliver articles of the same quality; but still the representation is altered: we cannot say that that might not have been material under some circumstances which might have arisen. The plea was then proved, except that part which relates to the specific alteration; but although the variance appeared at the trial, no objection was taken on that account, but only that there was no material alteration. The parties, therefore, entered into a contract to be bound by the question of material alteration.

MAULE, J.—I also think that this is a material alteration; and I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that it is not necessary to say whether it applies to the sample or to the bulk. I am rather inclined to agree with my Brother Coltman, that the mark of reference ought to lead us to incorporate the words at the bottom of the note with those within the parenthesis, and that it would have been more natural to put the words before the parenthesis, if it was intended that they should apply to the bulk. This, then, is a material alteration supporting the plea. I think an alteration is material when it is made in a material part. If a written instrument is altered in a material part, it is avoided; and it is no answer to say that it is not altered in respect of a matter which varies the duty of one party to the contract. I think that a state of circumstances may be easily conceived where the plaintiff would be very differently situated if the words which are there were not there. Suppose a party to have occasion to sue or be sued in respect of the contract, it might be most material for him that this sample sugar was represented to be sugar manufactured by the defendants; and it cannot be said that the alteration is not material, because a state of circumstances has here arisen in which the alteration does not affect the rights of the parties. With respect to the variance between the declaration and the plea, I think that the videlicet in the plea introduces something which need not be proved, and I am therefore disposed to think that the plea would be proved by shewing any material alteration; but I also concur in what has been said with regard to application not having been made at the trial. At all events, that this was a case for amendment, if necessary, cannot admit of a doubt. It is just the case which the law of amendment expressly provides for. I therefore think that there has been a material alteration, sustaining the plea, which vitiates the contract. The verdict should therefore be entered for the defendants.

WILLIAMS, J.—I also am of the same opinion. The doctrine in Pigot's case has been extended to all instruments evidencing contracts, and it establishes that any alteration in a material part of an instrument avoids it.

A partnership at will exists between A. & B, the business being carried on on the premises of A. Such partnership is put an end to by a notice of dissolution, and A. can maintain trespass for a subsequent entry by B. on that part of his premises where the partnership business had been transacted.

This was an action tried, before Williams, J., at the Sittings for Middlesex, after Trinity term last. The declaration was in trespass for breaking and entering two rooms in the dwelling-house of the plaintiff, and making a disturbance therein.

The defendant pleaded, first, not guilty; secondly, that the rooms in which, &c. were not nor was either of them the room of the plaintiff; lastly, leave and licence. Replication, to the last plea, de injuriâ.

It appeared, at the trial, that the plaintiff was a house-agent, auctioneer, &c., and tenant for a term of years of the dwelling-house mentioned in the declaration; that in 1846, negotiations took place between the plaintiff and the defendant for a partnership in the business, and for a lease of the upper part of the house to the defendant, at a yearly rent of 40*l*. The draft of the lease was prepared, but never agreed upon. In September 1846, a partnership (the terms of which were never settled) commenced; the joint names of the plaintiff and the defendant were placed over the door of the shop, which contained property of the partners, and they entered into contracts with third persons, as partners. On the 26th of December 1846, the plaintiff served the defendant with the following notice:—

“To Mr. William Samuel Gray:—

“I hereby dissolve the partnership which has existed between us, and been carried on at No. 1, High Street, Camden Town, under the style or firm of Benham & Gray. December 25, 1846.

(Signed) “J. H. Benham.

“Witness, G. Benham.”

The lower part of the house consisted of the shop and counting-house, where the business of the auctioneers, &c. was carried on. The defendant went to the house on the 2nd of January 1847, and finding the doors of the shop and counting-house locked, he broke them open and entered, asserting that he had a right to enter the partnership premises; for this entry the action was brought. Upon these facts, the learned Judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 1*s.*, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

Petersdorff now moved accordingly.—The plaintiff, in this action of trespass, undertakes to shew that he is solely seised and entitled to the rooms in the declaration mentioned: that fact is put in issue by the second plea, but he failed to shew that he was the exclusive owner of the premises, as no such right can exist in rooms used for the purposes of the partnership. A plea of a right to joint occupancy would be a bad plea; and the case of the defendant as it appeared by the facts proved, entitled him to a verdict.

[MAULE, J.—Is not the right to carry on the business as a partner in the shop, &c., a mere easement?]

The books lay down no rules as to the relative rights of partners inter se, when no definite terms are agreed upon between them; but it is submitted, that the notice of the 26th of December did not operate so as to extinguish the rights of the defendant who was entitled (at least) to enter for the purpose of seeing the books, which were the property of, and the contracts which related to, and were entered into by, the firm, of which firm the defendant had been (if he did not still continue to be) a member.

WILDE, C.J.—This rule is moved for on the general ground, that a partnership exists or had existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, which gives the defendant a right to enter the premises at any time on which the partnership business was being carried on, or, if the partnership were put an end to, gave him such right for an indefinite time, and so long as any contracts entered into by the partnership were not completed. The parties had certainly some partnership dealings on the premises of the plaintiff for about three months; but no agreement was entered into and no terms of partnership were ever arranged: it was, therefore, a partnership at will, and was put an end to by the plaintiff. Whatever rights previously existed were extinguished by the notice of the 25th of December, upon the service of which the sole right of possession reverted to the plaintiff. The defence set up under the second plea entirely fails; and there is no ground for the rule.

1847. } RODGERS AND OTHERS v. NOWILL
Nov. 2. } AND ANOTHER.

Action on the Case—Fraudulent Use of Trade Mark—Arrest of Judgment.

Case. The declaration stated that the plaintiffs, manufacturers of cutlery, were accustomed to mark their knives with certain marks denoting their manufacture, and that the defendants, intending to injure the plaintiffs, did fraudulently impose similar marks on knives made by the defendants, to induce the public to believe that the knives made by the defendants were manufactured by the plaintiffs, &c.:—Held, that it was properly left to the jury to consider, whether there was such a resemblance between the defendants' marks and those used by the plaintiffs, as was calculated to deceive the public; and whether the defendants used the marks with an intention to deceive.

No person has a right to sell his own goods as and for goods manufactured by another person.

That the damage is too generally stated in the declaration, is no ground for arresting the judgment.

Action on the case. The declaration stated that the plaintiffs for a long space of time before, and at the time of the committing of the grievances thereafter mentioned were, and thence hitherto had been and still were, cutlery manufacturers, and before and at the time of the committing of the grievances hereinafter mentioned, exercised and carried on, and still exercise and carry on the business of cutlery manufacturers at, to wit, the town of Sheffield, in the county of York, and in the way of their said business did during and at the time aforesaid, prepare, manufacture, make, and sell, and still do prepare, manufacture, make, and sell amongst other articles of cutlery divers large quantities of pen-knives and pocket-knives, and during and at the time aforesaid the plaintiffs were accustomed to make and still were accustomed to make divers large quantities of such pen-knives and pocket-knives with a certain stamp or mark, consisting, to wit, of the figure of a crown placed between the capital letters V and R, with the words "J. Rodgers & Sons" in letters thereunder in manner following, that is to say. [Here a fac-simile of the mark was set out.] And the plaintiffs aver that the said pen-knives and pocket-knives were so marked by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, in order to denote that they were articles of cutlery prepared, manufactured, and made by the plaintiffs, and to distinguish them from articles of cutlery of the same description manufactured or made by other persons; and the said pen-knives and pocket-knives so prepared, manufactured, and made by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, and so marked by them as aforesaid, long before and at the time of the committing of the grievances hereinafter mentioned, had been, and were, and still were held in very high estimation by dealers in cutlery on account of their good quality, manufacture, getting up and finish, and as such had been, and were during all the time aforesaid, and still were in great request, and sold and still were selling to a great extent as well in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland as in parts beyond the seas, that is to say, on the continents in Europe and America, and in the East and West Indies and elsewhere; and the plaintiffs during all the time aforesaid had thereby gained and acquired, and still thereby gain and acquire great reputation with the public, on account of the said good quality, manufacture, getting up and finish of the said pen-knives and pocket-knives so prepared and manufactured, and made and marked respectively by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, and had made, and were still then making great gains by the sale of the same: yet that the defendants, well knowing the premises, and contriving and wrongfully intending to injure the plaintiffs in the sale of the said pen-knives and pocket-knives, and to deprive them of the great gains which they might and otherwise would have made by preparing, manufacturing, making, and marking, and selling such pen-knives and pocket-knives as aforesaid, theretofore, to wit, on the 1st day of January in the year of our Lord 1843, and on divers other days and times between that day and the 9th day of August last aforesaid, did wrongfully, knowingly and fraudulently, and against the will and without the licence, consent, or knowledge of the plaintiffs, prepare, manufacture, and make for sale, and cause to be prepared, manufactured, and made for sale divers quantities, to wit, 100,000 pen-knives and 100,000 pocket-knives in imitation of those prepared and manufactured, and made by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, and marked such pen-knives and pocket-knives so prepared, manufactured, and made for sale by the defendants as aforesaid with a certain stamp or mark, that is to say, a stamp or mark consisting of, to wit, the figure of a crown placed between the capital letters V and R, with the words "J. Rodgers & Sons, Sheffield," in letters thereunder in the manner and form following, that is to say—[Here a fac-simile of the defendants' mark was set out]—in imitation of the said thereunder-mentioned stamp or mark of the plaintiffs, and of a form, letters, signification, and appearance very much resembling the form, letters, signification, and appearance of the said plaintiffs' said stamp or mark; and which said pen-knives and pocket-knives so prepared, manufactured, and made by the defendants as aforesaid, and stamped and marked by the defendants as aforesaid, were so stamped and marked by the said defendants as aforesaid, in order to denote that the said pen-knives and pocket-knives so prepared, manufactured, and made by them as aforesaid, were prepared, manufactured, and made by the plaintiffs, and to enable the defendants, and divers other persons in collusion with them, to sell, or cause to be sold, such pen-knives and pocket-knives so prepared, manufactured and made by the defendants, and so stamped and marked as aforesaid, by them, as and for penknives and pocket-knives of the genuine manufacture of the plaintiffs; and the defendants did, on the several times aforesaid, knowingly, wrongfully, and fraudulently, and against the will, and without the licence or consent of the plaintiffs, sell and cause to be sold for their own lucre and gain and profits, the said pen-knives and, pocket-knives, so by them prepared, manufactured, and made and marked as aforesaid, as and for and under the false colour and pretence that the same were respectively pen-knives and pocket-knives of the plaintiffs, and so respectively prepared, manufactured, and made by them, the plaintiffs; whereas in truth and in fact the plaintiffs had never prepared, manufactured, or made the said pen-knives and pocket-knives, or any or either of them, or any part thereof; and whereas in truth and in fact the plaintiffs had never marked the said pen-knives or pocket-knives, or any or either of them, with the said stamps or marks, or any or either of them, and did not mark them, or any of them, with any stamp or mark at all: by means of which said several premises the plaintiffs were wrongfully and unjustly hindered and prevented by the defendants from selling and disposing of divers large quantities, to wit, 1,000,000 pen-knives, and 1,000,000 pocket-knives, so prepared, manufactured and made by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, marked with the stamps and marks as aforesaid, of great value, to wit, of the value of 30,000*l.*, which the plaintiffs would otherwise have sold and disposed of; and the plaintiffs were deprived of divers great gains and profits, which would otherwise have accrued to them from the sale thereof, and were otherwise greatly injured in the selling of their said pen-knives and pocket-knives, and their reputation and good fame, and credit of manufacturing and selling pen-knives and pocket-knives of the said good quality, manufacture, getting-up, and finish as aforesaid, to the damage of the plaintiffs, &c.

The defendants pleaded, first, not guilty. Secondly, that the plaintiffs were not cutlery manufacturers, nor did the plaintiffs exercise or carry on the business of cutlery manufacturers, nor did they in the way of their said business prepare, manufacture, make, and sell such quantities of pen-knives and pocket-knives as in the declaration mentioned, in manner and form, &c. Thirdly, that the plaintiffs were not accustomed to mark such quantities as in the said declaration mentioned of the said pen-knives and pocket-knives with the said stamp or mark, in the said declaration in that behalf mentioned, in manner and form, &c. Lastly, that the said pen-knives and pocket-knives were not, nor were any of them, so marked by the defendants as in the said declaration mentioned, in order to denote that they were articles of cutlery prepared, manufactured, and made by the plaintiffs, and to distinguish them from articles of cutlery of the same description prepared, manufactured, and made by other persons, in manner and form, &c. ; on which pleas issues were joined.

At the latter end of the year 1843 a suit in equity was commenced by the plaintiffs against the defendants, praying that they might be restrained from manufacturing or causing to be manufactured or sold any knives, &c., marked with marks [specifying them] in imitation of those used by the plaintiffs. On the 22nd of July 1846 an order was made in the said suit by Vice Chancellor Wigram, "enabling the plaintiffs, within one year from the date of the order, to proceed at law, touching the matters in question in the said suit," and this action was accordingly commenced in November 1846. The trial took place, before Williams, J., at the sittings for Middlesex, after Trinity term last, when it appeared that the plaintiffs were large manufacturers of knives and all kinds of cutlery, at Sheffield, where the business had been carried on for a great number of years under the name of J. Rodgers and Sons; that goods manufactured by the firm were marked with a crown between the initials of the reigning sovereign (now) V. R., and with the name of the firm, "J. Rodgers & Sons," underneath, and with the name of Rodgers in fifteen other modes; that the firm sent out their goods in a paper wrapper, on which was printed a notice, by way of caution to the public, that no articles except those marked as above described were the genuine manufacture of the plaintiffs; that the knives of the plaintiffs were in great repute; that their trade was increasing, and had extended considerably within the last four years; that the defendant Nowill was also a manufacturer of cutlery at Sheffield, and in 1843 he received from John Lord & Co. (merchants), an order for "forty-eight dozen stag-horn handle single-blade pen-knives, named Rodgers & Sons, highly polished" (and other articles); that Nowill provided the materials for, and employed the other defendant, W. Rodgers, a knife-blade grinder, to make forty-eight dozen knives; and to mark the blades with the name J. Rodgers & Sons and the other marks used by the plaintiffs; that the man so employed had a father named J. Rodgers, who was a knife-blade forger; that the knives, when finished, were sent, with a bill of parcels, to Nowill, headed thus: "Bought of John Rodgers & Sons." The amount of the bill was 27*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*; and was signed thus: "Settled, William Rodgers." These knives were transmitted by Nowill to John Lord & Co., according to their order. Upon these facts being proved, the learned Judge directed the jury to consider, first, "whether there was such a resemblance to the plaintiffs' marks, in the marks put on the knives made by the defendants, as was calculated to make an ordinary person believe that the marks were the marks of the plaintiffs, denoting that the knives were the knives of the plaintiffs." Secondly, "did the defendants, with an intention to deceive, sell these knives, representing them to be the manufacture of the plaintiffs." The learned Judge also directed the jury that "no man had a right to sell his own goods under the false representation that they were the goods of another person; that the action was brought for a violation of that right, and that the amount of damages was immaterial."

Montagu Chambers now moved for a rule to shew cause why there should not be a new trial on the ground of misdirection, or to arrest the judgment.—There are three necessary ingredients which must be proved in order to sustain this action: there must be an unauthorized use of the plaintiffs' marks by the defendants; there must be an intention to deceive others by the use of these marks; and there must be a damage to the plaintiffs resulting from their use. The existence of any two of these ingredients is not sufficient; they must all appear in combination. If there be fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, the action fails. There can be no such exclusive right to certain marks as the plaintiffs here contend for.

[WILDE, C.J.—The exclusive right the plaintiffs have is to use these marks for their goods, and to prevent others from using them for the purpose of palming off their goods as goods of the plaintiffs.]

The case, as it was proved, was a deceit practised on a third party, John Lord & Co., and that gives no right of action to the plaintiffs. The learned Judge also withdrew the question of damage from the jury. The action cannot be maintained without proof of damage beyond that which was proved in this case. There was no damage shewn at the trial; nothing calculated to inflict any on the plaintiffs, whose trade had increased and was increasing. The plaintiffs claim an exclusive right to use certain marks, which they allege the defendants have usurped; but if it be so, they must shew an actual loss sustained, as well as a right invaded. In Blanchard v. Hill (1), Lord Hardwicke says, "It is not the single act of making use of the mark that is sufficient to maintain the action; it must be done with a fraudulent design to put off bad clothes by such means, or to draw away customers from the clothier." He also cited and commented on the following cases in the course of his argument—Comyns's Dig. (2), Bac. Abr. (3), Pasley v. Freeman (4), Baily v. Merrell (5), Crawshay v. Thompson (6), Southern v. How (7), Blofield v. Payne (8), Marzetti v. Williams (9). Then, in arrest of judgment, the damage is not alleged with sufficient precision. The terms used in the declaration are far too general; there is nothing stated as to the goods sold by the defendants being inferior goods; nor is the marking and sale of the goods alleged to be with an intent to withdraw the plaintiffs' customers, which Lord Hardwicke says is necessary. The damage in Crawshay v. Thompson was more minutely set forth in the declaration than it is here.

[WILDE, C.J.—A want of particularity cannot be urged in arrest of judgment.]

If the defective allegation be sufficient after verdict, still the kind of damage necessary to support this action cannot be inferred from the preliminary statements in the declaration.

WILDE, C.J.—I can see no ground for granting a rule. The action arises out of circumstances of an ordinary character, and from the facts proved in this case no action were maintainable it would be a reproach to the law. The real question is, will the law protect a trader and secure to him the use of certain marks, which he has adopted and used to describe goods made by him? Will it prevent others using the same marks with the intention to represent goods to be manufactured by him, which in truth are not so manufactured? The declaration does not claim an abstract right to the use of certain marks, but says that the plaintiffs (knife-makers) had adopted certain marks (describing them) to denote that knives marked therewith were prepared and made by them, and that the defendants being aware of the fact, and intending to injure the plaintiffs, did fraudulently impose similar marks on knives made by the defendants, in order to mislead the public, and to induce them to believe that the knives so made and marked by the defendants were prepared and manufactured by the plaintiffs, and that they so acted under circumstances which deprived the plaintiffs of divers great gains and profits. It appears that the defendant Nowill received an order from John Lord & Co. for some knives, marked in a certain way; they were to be "48 doz. stag-horn handle single-blade pen-knives, named Rodgers and Sons, highly polished" (and some dozens of other knives not material now to mention), that is to say, for pen-knives manufactured and known to the public as the knives of Rodgers & Sons,—for that must be the meaning of the expressions in the order. After receipt of this order Nowill procures the knives to be made and marked by the defendant Rodgers, with the marks denoting the plaintiffs' manufacture, and receives them from Rodgers, with a bill of parcels invoiced as from Rodgers & Sons; this invoice would substantiate the mark on the knives, and guarantee the goods when sent to Lord & Co., as being the genuine manufacture of Rodgers & Sons. An action is brought by the plaintiffs, and the order, the execution of it, and the delivery of the goods being proved, the counsel for the defendants addresses the argument to the jury, that this is a vexatious action, brought against a respectable tradesman for the profit arising from the sale of goods, the gross value of which was only 27*l.*; and in order to counteract the effect which such an argument might have upon the minds of the jury, the learned Judge says, in his summing up, the parties do not come here for the purpose of obtaining damages, but to see whether the defendants may make use of their mark to their prejudice, and the action is therefore in fact brought to try a right; and in that view of the case it is not material to prove the amount of damages sustained. The learned Judge proposed two questions for the consideration of the jury: first, is there such a resemblance between the plaintiffs' marks and those used by the defendants as is calculated to impose upon an ordinary person, and to lead him to think that the marks were the marks of the plaintiffs, denoting their manufacture? If that were satisfactorily made out by the plaintiffs, the jury were then to inquire, secondly, whether the defendants did falsely represent, by means of this similarity, that the knives they sold were of the plaintiffs' manufacture, and was it done with the intention to deceive? That is in effect this, Was the act done? Was it done in a fraudulent way? Was it done in a way likely to deceive? and was it done with that intention? It appears to me that the mode adopted by the learned Judge at the trial, was the correct mode of putting the case to the jury.

As to the proof of damage, it is sufficient in actions of this kind to shew that such acts have been done as were here proved, and that they were done with the intention, and that the natural result of them was to prejudice the plaintiffs. If the defendants adopted these marks, knowing they were calculated to induce persons to believe the goods they made and sold were goods manufactured by the plaintiffs, that is sufficient proof of damage. The defendants receive an order for the knives of Rodgers & Sons; they execute it themselves without making any application for the knives to that firm. Do not the plaintiffs thereby sustain a substantial damage? Suppose the jury had said, We cannot say that Lord & Co. would have gone to Messrs. Rodgers for the knives if the defendants had not supplied them; still, if the reasonable intendment be the other way, the jury would be well justified in finding it, as they have done here, and that would be a good and reasonable verdict. If the jury had found for the defendants because there was no sufficient evidence of damage, the case would have been sent down to them again. The last ground of motion is to arrest the judgment, because the particular damage is not sufficiently alleged in the declaration. It is sufficient to say on this point that a general allegation of damage may be ground for special demurrer, but cannot be urged in arrest of judgment. After verdict the Court looks only at the record, and if it states any damage which might have been proved at the trial, we must take it that such damage was proved.

COLTMAN, J.—I fully agree with the opinion of the Chief Justice, and with the law as stated by my Brother Williams at the trial. No man has a right to sell his own goods as for goods manufactured by another person. I, at first, hesitated whether the question of damage was not withdrawn from the jury, but I am now satisfied that it was not withdrawn from their consideration. After the jury had found that Lord & Co. wanted the knives of Rodgers & Sons, and that the goods supplied them by the defendants were so marked, the damage necessarily results from those facts; and if the jury had not so found, the verdict would have been an inconsistent verdict.

MAULE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The declaration is in the ordinary form. The proof given was similar to that usually adduced in cases of this nature. The direction of the learned Judge was quite right, and in accordance with previous decisions. A manufacturer of and dealer in certain articles can maintain an action against another person who sells similar articles, purporting to be, and by him falsely represented to be articles manufactured by such dealer: such a state of facts necessarily imports some damage; but in this case there was strong evidence of actual damage. The order of "Lord & Co.," in a legal sense, means, "Send me the knives of Rodgers & Sons," and the defendants, instead of going to Rodgers & Sons for them, supply the knives themselves. The law could not have been more clearly or more correctly stated than it was stated by the learned Judge to the jury; and the proposition to them of two separate and distinct questions was not unfavourable to the defendants. It appears to me that the verdict of the jury was a just verdict and the only verdict they could have reasonably returned. That the damage in the declaration is not alleged with sufficient distinctness, is no ground for arresting the judgment. I think the terms used in this declaration to state the damage are sufficient, and that they do comply with the view of Lord Hardwicke in the case quoted.

Assumpsit for work and labour and on an account stated.

Plea, the general issue.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 45*l.*, for literary articles supplied to and published in the New Quarterly Foreign and Colonial Review. It appeared at the trial, before Coltman, J., at the last Summer Assizes for the county of Surrey, that the defendant was one of the proprietors of the Review, which was established in 1843, of which Dr. Worthington was the editor; and that the plaintiff had contributed articles which were published in the Review, from the time of its institution down to the commencement of 1847. A prospectus of, and rules for carrying on the Review, were drawn up by the promoters, among which the following are material: Fourth, "That the financial department of the Review be conducted by a committee of six persons (naming them), three of them being the defendant, Mr. Powell, and Dr. Worthington (the editor), and that the accounts be annually submitted to a general meeting of shareholders." Fifth, "That the editorial department be confined to the Rev. D. Worthington, D.D., of Trinity College, Cambridge, with all the authority usually vested in an editor of accepting, rejecting, or modifying such articles as should be submitted to him." Sixth, "That all articles intended for insertion in the Review, when accepted by the editor, be paid for, if required, at the rate of 8*l.* per sheet, of sixteen octavo pages, and that such pay be made within fifteen days from the publication." Seventh, "That the committee of six (the same as managed the financial department) above named should assist the editor in promoting the prosperity and circulation of the Review, in obtaining, as far as possible without expense, literary contributions, and in all such matters connected with the Review as the editor might require, aid in, but not interfere with, the editorial department." The first articles contributed by the plaintiff were delivered by him to the editor, and he was paid for them by the defendant. In 1845 the plaintiff supplied a philosophical article, which was rejected by the editor, who then expressed his determination to admit no more of the plaintiff's articles in the Review. Since this rejection the plaintiff had contributed three articles which were delivered to the editor through Powell, who concealed the name of their author; and these three last-named articles were altered and published in the Review by Dr. Worthington, who did not know who wrote them, and who thought they were supplied gratuitously by Powell. It was for the remuneration alleged to be due from the defendant in respect of these three articles that the action was brought. The learned Judge told the jury, "That he thought Powell acted as the plaintiff's agent, and if Powell concealed the name of the author from the editor, that was a fraud, and the plaintiff could not recover;" and upon being asked by the jury, "Whether one proprietor of shares had authority to employ persons to write for the Review?" he answered that a proprietor had no such authority. He also directed them to consider several questions on the facts of the case; and they found a verdict for the defendant.

Shee, Serj. now moved for a new trial upon the ground of misdirection, and that the verdict was against the evidence (the argument on the latter point is omitted).—The words of the seventh resolution empowered Powell to employ the plaintiff to write for the Review; the words of it are express:—"The committee (of which Powell was one) are to get articles, free of expense if possible." Thus, Powell was constituted an agent for the purpose of getting articles; and the resolution means he is to get them if he can gratuitously, and if not then he is to get them with expense.

[WILDE, C.J.—If that be so, then all the committee have the same right.]

The plaintiff ought not to be damnified by the concealment of Powell. The demand is only for the articles which were accepted and inserted in the Review; the proprietors have had the benefit of and ought to pay for them.

WILDE, C.J.—This was an action brought to recover compensation for literary articles supplied to a Quarterly Review. It appeared that the Review was established by certain persons who held shares in it: one person was by the general body appointed editor with certain powers, and others were appointed to assist the editor and to procure voluntary contributions of matter for publication in it. The questions of fact were left to the jury; and we are of opinion that their verdict was clearly warranted by the evidence, and upon that ground there can be no rule. It was, however, contended by the plaintiff that there was a misdirection, inasmuch as the terms of the seventh resolution of the shareholders authorized Powell to employ the plaintiff to write articles for the Review. It was argued that he had contracted with Powell, who had authority to bind the shareholders; that the plaintiff's articles were furnished to Powell, and were subsequently accepted and published by the editor of the Review, and that the remuneration for those articles could not be legally withheld. Powell's authority depended upon the terms of a written instrument, the construction of which was for the Judge at the trial; and he was of opinion that that document conferred on Powell no authority as an individual shareholder or member of the committee to contract for or bind the other shareholders. We think that such opinion was correct; that there was no misdirection, and therefore no rule can be granted.

Nov. 3. } RUSHBROOK v. HOOD.

Deed—Stamp—12 Anne, c. 9. s. 24.—
55 Geo. 3. c. 184.

The indenture mentioned in the first count of the declaration was of four parts, between and executed by the vendors, a trustee, the plaintiff, and the defendant. It recited the title of the vendors to certain copyholds, an agreement for sale to the defendant, that he had taken possession and built a house thereon, an agreement by the plaintiff with the defendant to lend him some money by way of mortgage, and that for the purpose of carrying the agreements for mortgage and purchase simultaneously into effect, a surrender was to be made of the copyholds by the vendors, to a trustee, to secure the money advanced by the plaintiff. The vendors then covenanted with the plaintiff, his heirs, &c., and separately with the defendant, his heirs, &c., that they had a good title, &c., for quiet enjoyment, &c.; and the defendant also thereby covenanted to pay to the plaintiff the sum advanced, with interest.

The indenture mentioned in the second count was between and executed by the plaintiff and the defendant; it recited the former deed, default in payment of the sum thereby secured, a further loan by the plaintiff; and the defendant thereby covenanted to pay the whole sum, with interest, and that the copyholds should remain further charged with the entire sum.

Held, that the indenture in the first count was single in its nature and object, though treating of several matters; that it was not within the statute of 12 Anne, c. 9. s. 24. and, therefore, liable only to the single stamp duty of 35s.

Held, that the indenture in the second count was a deed constituting a further charge, and liable only to the ad valorem stamp duty of 80s. under 55 Geo. 3. c. 184.

This was an action of debt tried, before Patteson, J., at the last Assizes for Suffolk in which the plaintiff had a verdict for 515 18s. 7d., with leave to move to enter nonsuit if the Court should be of opinion that both the indentures on which the action was brought were inadmissible in evidence from being improperly stamped, or to reduce the verdict to 103*l.* 3*s.* 7*d.*, in the event of the deed mentioned in the first count being held inadmissible, or to 412*l.* 15*s.*, in the event of the deed mentioned in the second count being held inadmissible.

The first count stated that, on the 30th of April 1842, by indenture made between J. C, G. C, C. C. the younger, T. C, and A. C, of the first part; C. C. the elder, of the second part; the defendant of the third part; and the plaintiff of the fourth part, the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff to pay him 400*l.*, and interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, on the 30th of April 1842, and breach in payment. The second count stated, that on the 29th of April 1843, by indenture made between the defendant of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff to pay him 100*l.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, on the 29th of October 1843, and breach of payment. The defendant pleaded, to each count, non est factum, and to the whole of the declaration a set-off for money received to his use by the plaintiff.

The first indenture was produced at the trial, stamped with a 35*s.* stamp, with proper followers. The defendant contended that there should have been two stamps for 35*s.* each. This indenture was dated and made between the parties as stated in the first count; and, after reciting the admission of one John Clarke, on the 24th of November 1795, to certain copyhold lands in the county of Suffolk; his devise to the parties of the first part, with a direction for sale and division of the proceeds between them, on A. C. attaining the age of twenty-one; of John Clarke's death leaving C. C. the elder his customary heir; that on the 28th of November 1829, C. C. was admitted; that Ann C. attained the age of twenty-one on the 14th of April 1838; that in September 1841 the parties of the first part contracted with the defendant for the sale of the copyholds to him, and that he was let into possession and had built thereon six messuages; that an agreement had been entered into between the defendant and the plaintiff for mortgage for 400*l.*; and that, pursuant to arrangement between the parties, and for the purpose of carrying the agreements for mortgage and purchase simultaneously into effect, certain surrenders of the copyholds to a trustee had been passed by the parties of the first and second parts: the one by direction of the defendant to such uses as the plaintiff should appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of him and his heirs; the other to the use of the defendant and his heirs, subject to the surrender in favour of the plaintiff. The indenture then witnessed that, in pursuance of the agreements, and in consideration of the premises, each and every of the parties of the first and second parts, in respect of their respective undivided shares, did grant, covenant, promise, and agree with the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, and also separately with the defendant, his heirs and assigns, that they had right to convey; for quiet enjoyment, free from incumbrances; and for further assurance. It further witnessed, that in further pursuance of the said agreements, and in consideration of the premises, the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff for payment of 400*l.* and interest, as set out by the declaration, and to insure; there was also a power of sale after three months' notice, and a proviso for quiet enjoyment by the defendant until default, and a declaration that the trustee in whom the copyholds were vested should stand seised, in trust for the plaintiff, his heirs, executors, and assigns, for securing payment of principal and interest, and subject thereto for the defendant, his heirs and assigns.

The indenture mentioned in the second count was dated, and made between the parties stated in that count, and after reciting the first indenture, default in payment of principal and interest, and an application by the defendant to the plaintiff for, and agreement by the plaintiff to lend him, the further sum of 100*l.*, and its advance by the plaintiff, the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff, his heirs, &c., that the copyholds should remain further charged with the 100*l.* and interest; that the defendant should pay the plaintiff this further sum of 100*l.* and interest as set out in the second count, and that plaintiff should hold the estate as security for the whole sum of 500*l.* It was stamped with a 30*s.* stamp, which the defendant contended should have been a stamp for 35*s.*

Rouse now moved accordingly.—The first indenture should have had two stamps of 35s.; it operates as two distinct deeds and carries out two separate contracts—the contract between the vendors and the defendant, and the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. It comes within the provisions of 12 Anne, stat. 2. c. 9. s. 24, which enacts, “that where more than one of the matters or things (i. e. indentures, leases, bonds, or deeds) thereby charged with any stamp duty should be engrossed on one piece of vellum, &c., the duties should be charged on every one of such matters.” The parties themselves have by their recitals in this deed treated the contracts as separate; and by allowing such separate matters to be covered by one stamp, the revenue would be defrauded.

[MAULE, J.—The whole deed relates to one matter, the sale of an estate: it states the terms upon which the purchase-money is borrowed; that does not make it two indentures.]

As to the second indenture, instead of the 30s. mortgage stamp, the 35s. deed stamp should have been impressed thereon: the deed does not operate as a mortgage or further charge within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 55 Geo. 3. c. 184. If the advance of the 100*l.* were meant to operate by way of further charge, such intention should have been effected (no admission having been taken under the previous conditional surrender) by a further conditional surrender. This deed merely operates as a covenant or as a declaration of trust under the previous surrender, and therefore comes within the principle of Haywood v. Bibby (1), and ought therefore to have been stamped with a 35s. stamp. There had been no admission under either of the surrenders mentioned in the first indenture. The legal estate therefore was not vested in the defendant. The words “further charge” mean a “legal charge,” and the defendant could not create that. If then this deed (dealing as it does with an equitable interest merely) operates as a covenant, a 35s. stamp is requisite, and it was improperly received at Nisi Prius.

WILDE, C.J. — I am of opinion that neither of the objections can be supported, for in order to impose a stamp duty on any document the clear language of a statute embracing and designating such document is absolutely required. With regard to the first objection, the party who becomes the purchaser agrees with the vendors that a surrender shall be passed to uses in favour of a party appointed by the purchaser, which declares, that he who advances the money shall hold the estate by way of security. The whole object of the deed is to carry out the contract of purchase, by raising the money on the security of the thing purchased to pay for it; and thus the matters carried out by this deed are not separate and distinct matters, but they all form part of one and the same transaction. The words of the statute of Anne refer to several indentures on the same parchment, which it makes subject to separate stamps; and the single question is, is this one indenture, or more than one? It appears to me to be one indenture, framed for the purpose of carrying out one single object. It does not come within the words or the meaning of the statute of Anne; and, therefore, the objection fails. I had some doubt about the second deed. Its object is to give the mortgagee a lien on the estate for the further sum of 100*l.* lent to the defendant, in addition to the 400*l.* mentioned in the former deed, and to enable him to hold the estate as security for the re-payment of the whole sum. I understand the word “mortgage,” as used in the Stamp Act, to mean an instrument which operates as a security upon land for the payment of money. This deed recites a former transaction, by which the sum of 400*l.* is already charged on the estate, and says, *this shall be a charge on the same estate for the further sum of 100*l.* now advanced.* It gives no further security for the sum previously due, upon which the stamp duty had been previously paid. It is within the express terms of the Stamp Act: it creates a further charge, and was properly marked with a stamp of 30s.

(1) 11 Mea. & Wels. 812; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 404.

COLTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The provisions of the statute of Anne do not furnish an objection to the state of things which exist in this case. That statute refers to different deeds, having different objects inserted in the same parchment. As to the second indenture, that is clearly a deed of further charge; and therefore within the exception in the schedule of the 55 Geo. 3. c. 184.

Practice.—Second Application.

Where a rule obtained in the name of the plaintiff to set aside an order had been discharged on an affidavit of the plaintiff that the application was made without his authority or consent, the Court allowed a second application to be made on the same affidavits in the name of the party on whose behalf the action was brought.

On the 16th of October 1846 an order was made by Cresswell, J. setting aside the final judgment signed in this cause, and all subsequent proceedings, on the ground that the judgment had been signed without the consent of the plaintiff. The action had been brought in the name of the plaintiff, with his authority and consent, but for the benefit and on the behalf of H. W. Hemsworth, upon a bill of exchange drawn by the plaintiff upon and accepted by the defendant. In Hilary term, 1847, a rule was obtained to set aside the above-mentioned order, on the ground that the summons on which it was founded had been improperly altered by defendant's attorney. This rule purported to have been obtained upon the application of the plaintiff, but on shewing cause an affidavit of the plaintiff was produced, that he had not authorized the application for the rule, and praying that it might be discharged, which was thereupon done by the Court. On the last day of the same term,

Lush, on behalf of H. W. Hemsworth, obtained a rule, to the same effect as that of Hilary term, 1847, against which—

Telford, Serj. now shewed cause.—The present application is in substance to the same effect as the former, omitting the charge against the attorney. That was made by Hemsworth in the name of the plaintiff, and he now comes and repeats the application as on his own behalf, and in his own name. It is an invariable rule that the Courts will not hear a second application upon the same matter. If a party fails through a defect in the form of the application, he cannot bring the same matter in substance before the Court again—The Queen v. the Manchester and Leeds Railway Company (1). This application is made upon precisely the same affidavits as the former. The last case on the subject is Dixon v. Oliphant (2). There the application was upon new matter arising since the former application. The rule had at first been refused on the ground of defective service, and leave was given to make a fresh service and a fresh application thereon—Levi v. Coyle (3), Ex parte Hasleham (4). Nothing is more important than that a party should make his application in the proper name.

Channell, Serj., and Lush, in support of the rule.—The rule is, that where the motion fails on the merits you cannot move again.

[CRESSWELL, J.—No, not on the merits. There are cases in which the application has been discharged on technical grounds.]

The rule does not apply except where the application is made nominally on behalf of the same individual as well as really. No case has been decided in which, the party to make the application having been misconceived, it has been held that he cannot come again in the right name. This rule was not moved for till two or three days after the other rule was discharged. The attention of the Court was then called to the rule, and it was granted with full knowledge that the matter had been discussed before, and that the application was made on the same affidavits. This is not within the class of cases referred to. The Court cannot look out of the present rule, and say that it is moved on behalf of the same person as the former one. It is in the discretion of the Court to grant the second application; and this rule having been granted upon a full statement of all the circumstances, the Court will not allow the objection to be taken now. v. Perkin (5) a second application was allowed, and in Jeyes v. Hay (6) a second rule was granted for the same thing, only with costs.

[WILDE, C.J.—It is an important question, and one of general application. The Court will hear the motion on the merits, and consider afterwards whether the case falls within the rule.]

WILDE, C.J.—In this case an action had been brought in the name of the plaintiff by one Hemsworth, who had signed judgment; and, on summons, an application was made to set the judgment aside on the ground that Hemsworth had not the plaintiff's authority, which application was successful. The summons issued called on the plaintiff's attorney, but was altered by the defendant's attorney to a summons calling on the plaintiff; and the Court was asked to set aside the order on the ground of the improper alteration of the summons. The Court thought it was improperly altered, and the rule was drawn up in favour of the plaintiff. The Court came to this decision on the merits, but an affidavit of the plaintiff that he had not authorized the application to the Court being produced, and the rule being drawn up in his name and as on his application, it was eventually discharged. Another rule to the same effect has been obtained in the name of Hemsworth, and the question now is whether such rule can be made absolute. A multiplicity of rules on the same subject is not allowed; and the question is, whether the present rule is so far the same as and identical with the former as to offend against that well-known rule of practice. We have looked into the cases, and think that the rule may be made absolute in this case without interfering with any of the decided cases. The merits are with the plaintiff; and, therefore, as the present application is made by Hemsworth, who has a right to make it, the rule will be absolute.

Trial—Recalling Witness.

A witness on cross-examination answered a question put to him by the defendant's counsel, and went on to make a further statement, which was not legal evidence. The plaintiff's counsel in reply remarked upon this further statement; he was stopped by the jury, who understood the witness to have said the direct contrary to that attributed to him by the plaintiff's counsel, who then wished to recall the witness, but the Judge refused to allow this to be done:—Held, that the witness having volunteered a statement which was not evidence, it was the duty of the Judge not to notice it; and that he was right in refusing to recall the witness to correct the mistake of the jury as to what the statement was.

This was an action of assumpsit on an attorney's bill, tried, before Cresswell, J., at the last Sittings for Middlesex.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

The defendant had a verdict.

It appeared that the defendant was an advertising agent, and a creditor to the extent of 1,000*l.* of the Northern and Eastern Junction Railway Company; on applying for the amount due to him at the company's office, the secretary of the company introduced him to the plaintiff, who brought two actions in the defendant's name against two of the provisional committee of the railway company for the money due to the defendant. There was evidence to shew that the object of the actions was to enforce a general contribution from the directors to pay the engagements of the company. Both actions failed; the bill of costs was now demanded, and the only question at the trial was, whether the plaintiff had been retained to bring these actions by the defendant, or by the secretary to the company? The clerk to the secretary of the railway company was called as a witness for the plaintiff in the present action, and was asked, on cross-examination, "whether the plaintiff had not been called as a witness in one of the former actions at Maidstone?" To this the witness answered, "Yes;" and added, that the "plaintiff said, on that occasion, he had not been retained by the company to bring the action."

The counsel for the plaintiff was commenting on this statement, in his reply to the jury, when he was interrupted by the foreman, who, it appeared, had taken down the statement exactly contrary to that made by the witness. Upon this the counsel begged that the witness might be recalled to correct the mistake of the foreman; but the learned Judge refused to recall him, and said, "The further statement was not evidence; I took no note of it; and the witness's answer now would not be evidence." In his summing up he told the jury not to take the statement into their consideration.

E. James now moved for a new trial.—The foreman of the jury was mistaken in the expressions used by the witness; and it was a miscarriage on the part of the learned Judge not to allow the witness to be recalled to correct the mistake. The statement was one which must have influenced the minds of the jury, and it was the duty of the Judge to correct that influence and prejudice, which a mistake on the part of the jury had occasioned.

[MAULE, J.—You cannot call a witness to prove what a witness said before the jury; it does not alter the principle because the witness you propose to call is the witness himself.]

He also moved on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence.

WILDE, C.J. now (Nov. 22) said—This was a rule for a new trial, on two grounds: first, miscarriage or misdirection of the Judge; and secondly, because the verdict was against the evidence. The action was on an attorney's bill, and the question in the cause was, whether the defendant, or another person, had retained the plaintiff. The defendant contended, that the plaintiff had been retained by the secretary of a railway company, to bring two actions against some of the provisional committee-men, to sue in his (the defendant's) name, to oblige them to pay their share in order to liquidate the debts of the railway company. It appeared that a clerk of the railway secretary was called as a witness at the trial. The defendant's counsel asked him on cross-examination whether the plaintiff had been examined at the trial of one of the former actions. The witness said that "the plaintiff was then examined," and chose to add "the plaintiff, in his evidence on that occasion, stated that he had not been retained by the company to bring that action." That statement was foisted upon the Court, and did not arise from the question of the counsel. The learned Judge did not put upon his notes this additional answer given by the witness. Mr. James adverted to this statement at the latter part of the case, and one of the jurymen then interfered and remarked, that the witness said that "the plaintiff had stated that at the former trial he was retained by the company;" upon which Mr. James requested the Judge to recall the witness to ask him what he had said; but the Judge refused to do so, and told the jury that the statement of the witness was not to be taken into their consideration at all in deciding the case. When a forward witness volunteers a statement which is not in answer to any question put to him, it would be most mischievous to allow it to become evidence in the cause; and we think the Judge was quite right in refusing to recall a witness to re-state that which he had not been asked for, and which was not evidence. It is said that the jury might have been influenced by what their foreman said he had heard, and acted contrary to their duty; but the learned Judge, as far as he could, excluded the statement altogether from their consideration, and there is no reason for saying that they were influenced by it, and if they were, we cannot, under these circumstances, interfere. As to the verdict being against the evidence, the Judge was satisfied with the verdict, and thinks the verdict a proper verdict, consistent with the evidence, and just.

Nov. 9, 22. } CAMPBELL v. SMART.

Process—Alteration of Writ of Summons—Statute of Limitations.

The plaintiff applied for a rule to alter the date in the first and alias writ of summons from the day on which they were respectively issued to a later date, in order that a pluries writ might issue within a month after the date of the alias as amended for the purpose of saving the Statute of Limitations:

I •

—Held, that the Court will not authorize any alteration in the date of a writ of summons ; though without such alteration the Statute of Limitations will be a bar to the action.

It appeared, upon the affidavits in this case, that the last day on which a writ could have issued to save the operation of the Statute of Limitations was on the 14th of January 1847. On the 11th of January a writ issued, which was duly returned non est inventus and filed ; and on the 9th of June an alias writ was sued out, which expired on the 8th of October. A pluries writ ought to have issued on the 7th of November, which happened on a Sunday, and on the attorney for the plaintiff applying for the writ on the morning of the 8th of November, he ascertained that the writ could not be regularly entered on the roll.

Dowling, Serj. (Nov. 9,) moved for leave to alter the date of the teste of the original writ from the 11th of January to the 13th of January, and to alter the date of the teste of the alias writ from the 9th to the 11th of June, so that the pluries writ might regularly issue, and be entered on the roll as of the 8th of November, the day on which the plaintiff's attorney applied for it.

[WILDE, C.J.—By the 12th section of 2 Will. 4. c. 39. it is expressly enacted, that every writ shall be tested of the day it is actually issued.]

The 10th section enacts, " That no first writ shall be available to prevent the operation of any statute whereby the time for the commencement of the action may be limited, unless the defendant shall be arrested thereon, or served therewith, or unless such writ, and every writ (if any) issued in continuation of a preceding writ, shall be returned non est inventus, and entered of record within one calendar month next after the expiration thereof, and unless every writ issued in continuation of a preceding writ shall be issued within one such calendar month of the preceding writ, and shall contain a memorandum indorsed thereon, or subscribed thereto, specifying the day of the date of the first writ." Notwithstanding these enactments, the late cases shew that the alterations now required may be made in a writ. In Eccles v. Cole (1) the Court allowed a writ to be altered from debt to assumpsit more than six months after it had issued, on an affidavit, stating that the Statute of Limitations would be a complete bar to a fresh action. In Williams v. Williams (2), the Court allowed additions to be made to the writs by inserting therein memorandums of the return thereto, &c. The addition of the name of a plaintiff was allowed in Lakin v. Watson (3), and also in Brown v. Fullerton (4).

[MAULE, J.—When a person has issued his writ in proper time within the statute of Will. 4, but in improper form, then the Court has allowed alterations to be made which indirectly save the Statute of Limitations ; but here you have no writ issued within the statute.]

[WILDE, C.J.—In the cases you cite some things were allowed to be added which had been accidentally omitted, and the additions were truths : in this case you ask to be allowed to make an alteration which will falsify that which is now true, and to do something which is against the enactments of a statute.]

Mavor v. Spalding (5), and Culverwell v. Nugee (6) are two of the latest authorities on the subject, and in both of them amendments were allowed. It is also contended that the amendment is one which can be made without referring at all to the statute of Will. 4. The Court has power, by the common law, over its own records, and will assist a plaintiff who has merits to prevent an abuse of the Statute of Limitations. If the original writ were altered, as asked for by this application, there would be something to amend by, and the subsequent writs could then be made regular, both in form and in time. The defendant can traverse the fact if he pleases.

[WILDE, C.J.—Then granting this rule will not benefit the plaintiff. Besides, the motion is for a rule absolute in the first instance, as the defendant cannot be served ; in the cases cited there was only a rule nisi.]

The plaintiff is willing to take the rule, believing that it will be beneficial to him—M'Keller v. Riddie (7).

[WILDE, C.J.—It appears to me that we are not authorized to do what is asked for, namely, to make an amendment in a writ, the effect of which will be to state in it that which the statute says shall not be stated; for we are requested to make it appear that things were done on certain days, and within a certain time, whereas in truth they were not so done. A great many cases have been cited, in which amendments in writs have been sanctioned, but the present case seems to go beyond any of them: the Court, however, will look through the cases referred to, before deciding upon this application.]

WILDE, C.J. now (Nov. 22) said,—This was an application for leave to alter the dates and indorsements in two writs of summons, by substituting some other day for the day on which those writs actually issued, the object being to exclude the defendant from the benefit of the Statute of Limitations, which would otherwise be a defence to the action. It appeared to the Court, at the time of the argument, that the application could not be granted; but as numerous cases of amendments were cited we took time to consider our judgment. I have looked carefully through all the cases, and have submitted them to my learned Brothers; and we all agree that in all of them the amendments were made for reasons inapplicable to the present case. "The Uniformity of Process Act requires the true date to be stated upon the writ; we are asked to insert another and later, and, consequently, a date contrary to the express terms of the statute, which requires a correct date. What is the ground on which the Court is asked to amend? Why, that the defendant may be excluded from having the benefit of the Statute of Limitations. But the act intended that a defendant, under these circumstances, should have the benefit of this defence; and we are required, without hearing the defendant, to deprive him of a defence conferred by statute. It is enough to say, that the statute, having expressed that the true date should appear, the Court cannot interfere, because, by an alteration, the party would be deprived of a legal defence. The Court cannot enter into the question of merits; and there is neither principle nor authority to warrant us in ordering the alterations required. The Court does not prohibit the plaintiff from entering the pluries writ as of the 8th of November, if he think fit so to do, making the alterations valeant quantum.

Dowling, Serj. expressed his intention to adopt that course.

APPEALS from the Courts of Revision, under 6 Vict. c. 18.

1847. }
Nov. 11, 13. } PALMER v. ALLEN.

Parliament — Practice — 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 60.—Paper Books.

An application was made to deliver the paper books nunc pro tunc in an appeal under the Registration Act. By the practice of the Court the paper books should have been delivered four days before the hearing:—Held, that the Court will enforce the established practice, unless a sufficient reason be given in excuse of a departure therefrom.

This was the first day appointed by the Court under the 64th section of the 6 Vict. c. 18, for hearing appeals against the decisions of revising barristers; and on behalf of the appellants in this and two other cases,

Gray applied to be allowed to deliver the paper books nunc pro tunc, the attorney for the appellants having omitted to deliver them four days before the day of hearing. He stated, in answer to an inquiry from the Court, that he had no satisfactory excuse for the omission.

WILDE, C.J.—The Court cannot consent to depart from its established practice without some sufficient ground to excuse compliance therewith, and it is necessary and advisable that in these cases a departure from recognized forms without a good reason should not be allowed. The 60th section of the Registration Act, which is here our guide, refers to and directs parties to follow the well-known rules and practice of this Court, with respect to special cases, which rules and practice are to be observed before appeals from the decisions of revising barristers are to be prosecuted, heard, and determined, in and by Her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas. Now, in special cases, the paper books (as is well known) must be delivered four days before the hearing; and though the section above referred to gave the Court power to make rules to regulate the practice in these cases, we have not thought it necessary to do so, and, therefore, the known rules applicable to special cases govern these cases also. Why are we to depart from that established and well-known practice? No reason has been given. We are of opinion that the practice is of great importance; and after considering the matter fully in all its bearings, the Court thinks this application cannot be entertained.

On a subsequent day (Nov. 13,) and before the cases had been reached in their order,—

Wheateley renewed the application, and produced affidavits which stated that the attorney in the country, who had conducted the case for the appellants and served all the notices, &c. up to the 2nd of November, the first day of term, had, on that day, placed the case in the hands of his London agent (who was then first appointed in the place of his former agent); that the attorney in the country expected that his London agent would have delivered the paper books and done everything after the 2nd of November which was necessary to be done before the hearing, whereas the London agent relied upon the country attorney who had previously acted in the matter, and thought that he had delivered the paper books.

WILDE, C.J.—We think that you have shewn sufficient excuse. Allowance may be made for the confusion attendant upon a change of agents, and the paper books may be now delivered.

1847. }
Nov. 11. } BURTON v. GERY.

Parliament—6 Vict. c. 18. s. 73.—Occupation—New Claim.

A voter's qualification in a county register was described in the third and fourth columns respectively, as "Land above 50l." "Own occupation." Within the twelve months next before the 31st of July, he changed his occupation, and took the adjoining land, which was sufficiently designated by the description in the old register, and he did not send in any new claim:—Held, that the name of the voter must be erased from the register.

When the right to vote depends upon the occupation of premises in immediate succession, the whole of the subject-matter composing the qualification must be fully described in the register.

A county voter who claims under section 73. of 6 Vict. c. 18, must always send in a new claim to vote.

At a court held by the revising barrister, for revising the list of voters for the southern division of the county of Northampton, James Burton (the appellant) objected to the name of David Attfield being retained on the list of voters for the parish of Cold Ashby. The name "David Attfield" stood thus on the register:—

David Attfield.	Cold Ashby.	Occupier of land above £50.	Own Occupation.

It appeared that the above David Attfield had held a farm at Cold Ashby, of a Mr. Loveday, of sufficient value to give a vote, up to Lady-day, 1847, when he left it. At Michaelmas 1846, he took another farm of a Dr. Walker, also of sufficient value, in the same parish, which he still continued to hold and occupy. He had not made any new claim. The question for the consideration of the revising barrister was, whether David Attfield's qualification already on the register was sufficiently described to entitle him to vote in respect of successive occupation. The barrister was of opinion that the qualification of the said David Attfield was sufficiently described in the said list, there having been no hiatus between the said occupations, and that it was not necessary for him to send in a new claim; and the barrister accordingly retained the name of the said D. Attfield on the list of voters for the said county.

Humphrey, for the appellant. — A person has been (for several years) on the register of county voters, as entitled to vote in respect of a certain qualification described in that register, and in this case the question for the Court is, whether such person, who has ceased to retain that qualification, and has not sent to the overseers a new claim, is entitled to retain his name upon the register, if the qualification therein described may be considered to designate correctly the qualification he has recently acquired. The case of Bartlett v. Gibbs (1) is very much the same as this: that was the case of a borough voter, whose qualification consisted of the occupation of two houses in succession, for which he was entitled to be registered under the 28th section of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. This is the case of a county voter entitled to be registered for the occupation of two farms, under the 73rd section of the 6 Vict. c. 18. The fact of the two farms, which, together compose the qualification of the voter, being situated in the same place and the same description applying to both, can make no difference in the principle established in Bartlett v. Gibbs. If the two houses there had been both in East Street, the cases would have been exactly the same, and the judgment there shews that then both the houses must have been described in the register: so here, the voter should have described his qualification in the third column as "two farms in succession." By the 4th section of 6 Vict. c. 18, all persons are directed to send in new claims who do not retain the same qualification as described in the previous register. That applies to the voter David Attfield. The qualification named in the register does not allude to his present holding; the description was placed there before he occupied his present farm; and though such description chances to be applicable by name, it is in fact altogether inapplicable to the identity. As the qualification now stands, it describes one occupation, whereas, in truth, it consists of two occupations; and further, if David Attfield had sent in a fresh claim, as he should have done under the 4th section, his name would have appeared in a different list (the list of claimants), and thus notice of his change of qualification would have been given, and opportunity of inquiry as to the value of the premises, &c. would have been afforded to the other voters who are interested in maintaining the correctness and purity of the register.

Hayes, for the respondent. — The case of Bartlett v. Gibbs does not govern the present; the Court there decided that the 40th section of 6 Vict. c. 18, authorizing the revising barrister to make certain amendments in the list of voters, did not empower the alteration to be made which was there necessary to describe the qualification. The description of the qualification there was, "House, East Street;" and it was decided that he could not add to it "House, John Street." In this case, the description as it stands is comprehensive enough to embrace both holdings: no larger word than "land" can be used, and it correctly applies to the premises now occupied by David Attfield.

[MAULE, J. — The question is, does he retain the same qualification?]

The words of the 4th section are, "who shall not retain the same qualification as described in such register." If that description comprises the voter's present occupation, it is sufficient.

[WILDE, C.J. — Does "land in my occupation" in the register, mean Loveday's farm or Walker's farm?]

It means both.

[WILLIAMS, J. — How can that be? It was inserted before he ever held Walker's land; and being objected to, he must prove he was possessed of the same qualification as that described in the list.]

The proviso at the end of the 40th section enables the revising barrister to retain the name of a person objected to who has changed his place of abode, without having sent in a fresh claim.

[MAULE, J. — Read to the conclusion of the clause, and I think it will conclude your argument. "Provided such person shall prove that he possessed on the last day of July the same qualification, in respect of which his name has been inserted in such list."]

WILDE, C.J.—I entertain no doubt in this case, either upon the words of the statute or the reason of its enactments. The 4th section, 6 Vict. c. 18, expressly enacts, "that all persons entitled to vote in the election of a knight or knights of the shire to serve in parliament, &c., who shall not be upon the register of voters then in force, and also all persons, &c., who being upon such register shall not retain the same qualification" (by which I understand the same property, not the same kind of qualification), "and who are desirous to have their names inserted in the register about to be made,"—the section then goes on to direct how both those classes of persons are to proceed, that is to say, "shall give or send to the overseers an original notice of their claim to vote, or a new claim in the form given in the Schedule to the act. Now, David Attfield does not retain the same property which is described as his qualification in the register, and therefore, according to the words of the act, he should have sent in a fresh claim. There is good reason for the course directed by the act. When a person has been once upon the register, it may be taken that his qualification therein described has undergone the ordeal of a public scrutiny: attention has been called to it; its value inquired into, and it has been found to comply with all the requirements the statute enjoins. When that person changes his property, his qualification is entirely changed; there is the same reason for his sending in a new claim as there is for an original claim when his name had not appeared on the register before. The same scrutiny is required to establish the propriety of the new, as was required to test the validity of the original qualification, and the act therefore requires a new claim to be sent in, that the voter's name may appear in a different list, and the public attention be invited and called to investigate that register in the correctness of which the public are interested. If this were not so, no person would know of the change of the qualification. The very ambiguity which occurs in the present case shews the use of the provisions in the 4th section, for if no notice be taken of the change of property, and the same description applies to both holdings, the property really described on the register may be a good qualification, yet the property to which that description may happen to apply may be insufficient to confer the franchise, and those who are interested in the matter would consider that the original qualification, which they know was a good one, was still occupied by the voter. The decision of the revising barrister cannot be sustained.

COLTMAN, J., MAULE, J., and WILLIAMS, J., concurred.

Decision reversed.

CASE.

At the Court held before me, the revising barrister for the borough of Bewdly, Charles Watson, of Bridge Street, in Stourport, within the said borough, objected to the name of William Cotton being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member to serve in parliament for the said borough, in respect of a wharf and building in Bridge Street, in the hamlet of Lower Mitton, within the said borough. The facts of the case were as follows:—William Cotton occupied a wharf and shed in Bridge Street: the shed stands against a wooden paling, the boundary of the wharf, but is not fastened to it. Six posts put into the ground support a tarpaulin or tar-cloth, which forms the roof. One of the sides of the shed is boarded up with boards, fastened to the posts by nails. The shed is used for purposes connected with the occupation of the wharf. William Cotton put into it his barrows, shovels and coal-baskets; and one Marks, who rented a part of the wharf from William Cotton for the purpose of making hoops, was allowed to put hoops and poles into the shed during six months, paying wharfage for the use of it. I decided that this was a building within the meaning of section 27. of 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45, and therefore retained the name of William Cotton on the list of voters for the said borough. If the Court shall be opinion that this was not a building within the meaning of sec. 27. of stat. 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45, then the name of the said William Cotton is to be expunged from the list. But if the Court shall be of opinion that this was a building within the meaning of sect. 27. of stat. 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45, then the name of the said William Cotton is to be retained on the said list. (Signed by the revising barrister.)

I appeal against this decision.

Charles Watson.

Gray, for the appellant.—The shed as described in this case is not a sufficient building to confer a vote. It is neither house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building within the 27th section of 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. Land is not sufficient of itself, and the building must be something stable, solid, and substantial. It is not every building that is sufficient—Whitmore v. the Town Clerk of Wenlock (1).

[MAULE, J.—We are only told in this case what two of the sides of the shed are made of. How many sides has it? It cannot have less than three sides, the other side or sides may be enormously thick, and built of stone. If our opinion is required, we should be told the facts upon which it is to be formed.]

If the case be not sufficiently stated, the Court will exercise its power under the 65th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, and remit the case to the revising barrister to supply all the deficiencies.

[WILDE, C.J.—We shall not encourage any proceeding of that kind, and must take it that the revising barrister finds that it is a building, but the appellant wants to know whether the facts stated in the case prevent it from being a building within the act.]

It must be assumed that everything that composes the building has been described by the revising barrister: de non existentibus et non apparentibus eadem est ratio. The Court will not assume that anything exists which is not specifically set forth; and then the question is, is the building described such an one as comes within the terms of the Reform Act?

WILDE, C.J.—The revising barrister has found this to be a building, and unless we are satisfied from the description which he gives that it is not a building, his decision must stand. He calls it a shed covered over at the top, and closed in on two sides: that may well be a building. The act uses the word "warehouse," and though it is not stated how many sides this shed has, it cannot have less than three sides, and they may be all closed, but if they were all open it might be none the less a warehouse on that account. It appears that the shed is used for putting poles and tools in, and that the person who uses it for that purpose pays rent for it: is not that a user of the shed in the nature of a warehouse? Whether it be a warehouse does not at all depend upon the nature of the materials placed within it, but on its capacity to hold and protect the materials which are placed within it for convenient custody. We must take it to be a building, unless there are facts stated in the case which prevent it from being a building. I must be satisfied that it cannot be a building before the decision is reversed, and there is nothing stated here from which I am led irresistibly to the conclusion that this is not a building within the 27th section of the Reform Act.

COLTMAN, J.—The question here is more one of fact than of law. The revising barrister states that it is a building; and unless we see facts stated which prevent its being a building, we cannot interfere to alter his decision.

MAULE, J.—It cannot be said that this is not a building; the only question then is, is it such a building as the Reform Act contemplates? There is nothing in the case to shew it cannot be such a building; and when you once shew it is a building of some sort, then the next thing to be decided is, is it put, or can it be put to any of the uses mentioned in the act of parliament? I cannot conceive that anything else is necessary to make it a building within the act. If a shed had been built with great solidity, open at two of its sides, which was capable of being used, and was used as this is used, viz., to put such things into as are required to be kept in it, such description of building would satisfy the terms of the 27th section of the Reform Act, and the shed would still be a building within the act of parliament, though it were not so strongly built as the shed described may have been for anything that appears to the contrary in the case now before us.

WILLIAMS, J.—I cannot say, that from the facts stated in this case the decision of the revising barrister was wrong.

Decision affirmed.

Barrister's Power of Amendment.*

The qualification of a voter for a borough, who was duly objected to, was described in the overseers' list in the third column as "House in succession," in the fourth column as "Butcher Row." It was proved before the revising barrister that the voter had occupied two houses during the twelve months next previous to the 31st of July, one in Coleham, the other in Butcher Row, and he then applied to the barrister to amend the description of his qualification by altering the word "house" in the third column to houses, and by adding "Coleham" in the fourth column, which the revising barrister refused to do:—Held, that the revising barrister has no power under the 40th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. to amend in such manner as to add to the subject-matter of the qualification described in the list.

CASE.

At a court held, before the revising barrister, on the 7th day of October 1847, at the Guildhall, in the borough of Shrewsbury, for revising the lists of voters for the said borough, John Bowdler, the respondent in this appeal, objected to the name of Henry Onions being retained on the list of 10l. occupiers for the parish of Saint Alkmond, in the said borough. The name of Onions was thus inserted in the list:—

Christian Name and Surname of each Voter.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, Lane, or other Place in this Parish, where the property is situate; and number of the House (if any), when the right of voting depends on Property.
Henry Onions, Baker.	Butcher Row.	House in Succession.	Butcher Row.

Henry Onions occupied two houses in immediate succession. It was proved, that he had removed from Coleham, in the parish of St. Julian, to Butcher Row, in the parish of St. Alkmond, on the 1st day of May 1847. Both parishes are within the borough. I was required to amend the third column by making it houses in succession, and the fourth by inserting "Coleham;" and I held that I had no power to do so, on the ground that both the qualifying properties occupied in succession should be stated in the list, and I therefore expunged the name. A number of objections were determined by me at the court aforesaid upon the same point, and the parties, whose names are hereunder written are dissatisfied with my decision thereon. I hereby declare that the several cases depending upon the same decision ought to be consolidated. And I also declare that the following cases, which are identical with the above, should depend upon the decision on the case above stated, and that in the event of the Court holding my decision to be wrong, the names of the following persons should be retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the borough of Shrewsbury, in respect of their occupation of property in the said borough.—Signed by the revising barrister.

"I, Henry Onions, of Butcher Row, Shrewsbury, (Baker), for myself, and on behalf of all the other persons who are interested as appellants in this matter, and whose names are hereunder written, do appeal against this decision, and agree to prosecute this appeal. (Signed), Henry Onions, of Butcher Row, Shrewsbury, (Baker)." [Then followed the names of seventeen other persons.]

Whateley, for the appellant.—The question in this case depends upon the power of the revising barrister to make amendments in the list of voters under the 40th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. The amendment required by the appellant ought to have been made. The Court will not be too astute in upholding objections on the ground of insufficiency of description where there is real bona fides on the part of a voter, and where the description may perhaps offend against the rules of technical precision, but where it is practically well understood. The barrister here was requested to alter the word "house," in the third column, to "houses," and to insert "Coleham" in the fourth column; and such alterations would have rendered the description of the qualification more accurate.

[MAULE, J.—The words in the act "for the more accurately defining the same," do not mean that the revising barrister may add a house.]

[WILDE, C.J.—How do you distinguish this case from Bartlett v. Gibbs (1), which decides that a person must describe in the list all the premises of which his qualification is made up, and that the revising barrister cannot amend a statement of his qualification which only comprises the premises then in his occupation?]

The distinction is this: there the description of the qualification did not allude to more than one house; it implied that the voter had always occupied one house in East Street: now here it obviously refers to two houses, which the words "house in succession" irresistibly convey to the mind. The addition of "Coleham" would not alter the nature of the qualification, but would only more accurately define and specify, by expansion on the face of the list, the meaning which was intended to be, and was indirectly, expressed by the words "house in succession." This case is more like Hitchins v. Brown (2), where the alteration made by the revising barrister in the description of the qualification of the voter was held to have been correct: the word "house," in that case, was altered into the word "houses." In Flounders v. Donner (3), the qualification consisted, as here, of houses in succession, but the number of one of the houses was omitted in the list; and Erle, J. there said, "I am clearly of opinion, that if the number had been brought to the revising barrister, he had power, under the 40th section, to insert it, and was bound to insert it." The error (if it be an error) in this case occurs in the overseers' list, which is in no way under the controul of the appellants; and it will be a great hardship to deprive them of the franchise for technical mistakes committed by the overseers.

Keating, for the respondent.—This case cannot be distinguished from Bartlett v. Gibbs, which, it is submitted, is identical with it, and the decision in which will be upheld by the Court. The description of the qualification there was "house,"—so it is here; the house described was that last occupied,—so it is here: the only difference is, that the words "in succession" are here added, which, it is contended, must mean, in succession to another house. But the addition of those two words do not differ the two cases when the principle established by Bartlett v. Gibbs is properly defined. The principle is, that where a person claims to vote for houses occupied in immediate succession, they all together form one undivided qualification: if he does not describe them all in the list, he does not properly describe his qualification, and the statement is as defective as it would be if his qualification consisted of a cottage and land, and he described his qualification as "land." It is also extremely important that the situation of the premises should be given, that the value of the respective houses, the rating, &c. should be examined by all who are interested in keeping the register pure. The expressions, "house in succession," and "Butcher Row," are calculated to mislead, for if they mean two houses, they must mean two houses in Butcher Row, which is contrary to the fact. If the barrister could, in this case, add one house, he could add five houses if five were occupied during the year. The case of Hitchins v. Brown does not assist the appellant; the description there could not have been altered for the better: the word "house" stood in the third column, and in the fourth column, opposite to it, "Muck Lane" and "St. Mary Street," and the statement of the qualification, taken altogether, could only mean a house in each of the two streets named in the fourth column. Flounders v. Donner bears no resemblance to this case. The name of each of the places in which the houses were situate was there given, and the ground of the decision was, that the barrister was justified in erasing a name because certain matter of description, improperly omitted from the list, was not supplied to his satisfaction. It is impossible to find a judgment more expressly and cogently in favour of the respondent than the judgment of Tindal, C.J., in Bartlett v. Gibbs: "We think the legislature intended that the registration list should afford such information of the nature and situation of the premises, in respect of the occupation of which each person claimed a right to vote, as would enable the other voters to ascertain by inquiry the sufficiency of the occupation and value of each of the premises."

(3) Ibid. 63; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 81.

Whateley, in reply.—The fourth column in the list is only given for the purpose of specifying the situation of the qualification. The nature of the qualification is expressed in the third column, and therefore an alteration in the fourth column would make no change in the nature of the qualification, and that is the change prohibited by the proviso in the 40th section of the Registration Act. If nothing at all were stated in the fourth column, the revising barrister might have inserted both Coleham and Butcher Row; and there seems no reason or principle why the same clause, which confers the power of supplying a total blank, should not be held to confer a like authority when the blank, as here, is only partial.

WILDE, C.J.—I think that the decision of the revising barrister was right, and that he had no power to make the amendment. The case of Bartlett v. Gibbs decided, that when the qualification of a voter consists of the occupation of two houses, the situation of each must be described in the list, and the necessity of such a description is apparent on reference to the act of parliament. The act contemplated that all persons who are interested in the correctness of a register of voters should, by means of objections to the names of persons who were not entitled to be thereon, be enabled to assist in securing its purity, and therefore the act required all particulars of the qualification to be given, in order that an opportunity for the necessary inquiries as to the period and nature of the occupation, as to the value and the rating, might be made with facility. When the qualification consists of two houses these inquiries as to each house are equally important, and therefore the situation of each must be given. The voter here did not give the necessary information: the information he did give was worse than nothing, for it was false; Butcher Row (if it be taken to mean two houses) means that both houses were in Butcher Row, and inquiries there would shew at once that his occupation was not sufficiently long to confer the franchise; and if on the objection being taken he can at the last moment add a house in Coleham when all opportunity for inquiry is gone by, the rights of the objector and the intention of the act will be alike defeated. The words "Butcher Row" contain nothing equivocal or ambiguous; and the 40th section, though it empowers the barrister to make amendments when the qualification is insufficiently described, precludes him from receiving any other qualification than that described in the list. It is said that the latter expression means, that when a person appears as a householder he shall not prove that he is a freeholder or a freeman; but I think it means something far beyond that. Then can it be said that the amendment sought to be introduced will render more clear or more accurate anything which already exists? Coleham does not assist the perspicuity of Butcher Row, but adds something extraneous and wholly independent of it: its effect is to make a substantial addition to the qualification, which without such addition is no qualification at all. Hitchins v. Brown is no authority for the appellant: the situation of the two houses forming the qualification was specified in the fourth column, and thus the information required by the act of parliament was afforded. The case of Flounders v. Donner decided that when the qualification is made up by the successive occupation of two houses, and such houses are numbered, the voter should describe them by their number in the list. There was no question of amendment before the Court; and though Erle, J. expressed an opinion that the barrister might have amended there, still the case does not apply here, the nature of the amendment required not being similar. The application here was not to define the same thing more clearly, but to add another thing essentially different; and the decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed.

COLTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is urged upon us that the failure of description of the qualification occurs in the overseers' list, and therefore it would be hard to disfranchise the voter. Vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt. He had the opportunity to send in a full and sufficient description in a new claim, and therefore the omission is his own fault. "House in succession" in the third column may mean the successive occupation of two houses, but the fourth column confines their situation to Butcher Row. The proposed amendment would not more accurately define Butcher Row, but would introduce a qualification different from that stated in the list.

MAULE, J.—The powers of amendment given to the revising barrister are prescribed by the 40th section, and I agree that the amendment asked for in this case was not within them. Those powers ought not to be extended. Amendments are allowed in cases of total omission, and for the purpose of more accurate definition. Does the word "Coleham," here sought to be introduced, come within the latter head of amendment? is the only question. Butcher Row is not rendered more clear by its addition, and there the alteration ought not to have been made.

WILLIAMS, J.—Taking a liberal view of the statement of the qualification as it appears in the list, it means, houses in succession in Butcher Row in the parish of A. By the proposed amendment it would be, two houses in succession in parishes A. and B: that would be a different qualification altogether, which the revising barrister had no power to introduce.

*Parliament—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 44.—
Form of Case in Consolidated Appeal.*

If cases are included in a consolidated appeal, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 44, which do not depend upon a decision on the same points of law, the Court has no jurisdiction to hear the appeal.

A revising barrister granted appeals against his decisions in respect of five voters for a borough, and declared that such appeals ought to be consolidated. After stating the facts applicable to each voter, and the reasons upon which his decisions were founded, the case concluded, "If the Court should be of opinion that the occupation and residence of each or any of the appellants was sufficient, the names of all or such as the Court shall think fit, are to be retained on the register, otherwise to be expunged":—Held, that the appeals were improperly consolidated, as the decision on one would not govern the rest; that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain any of the appeals, and that the case must be struck out.

This appeal was consolidated with the appeals of James Templer, Henry Augustus Templer, and John Charles Templer.

The names of the appellants (who were duly objected to by the respondent) appeared upon the list of voters for the parish of Lyme, in the borough of Lyme, in the following form :—

Prior, John Venn	Silver Street, Lyme	House and Land	Springfield House
Templer, James	Silver Street, Lyme	House and Land	Springfield House
Templer, Henry Augustus	Silver Street, Lyme	House and Land	Springfield House
Templer, John Charles	Silver Street, Lyme	House and Land	Springfield House

The appellants were duly rated for the property described, and the rates were duly paid by them, and the property is of sufficient value to entitle them all to be retained on the list of voters as joint occupiers, if the qualification is complete in other respects.

Mr. George O'Kelly Templer, a solicitor at Lyme, purchased for Mr. Attwood, in 1845, the property in question (Springfield House), from Mr. Tartt, for the residue of a term of twenty-one years, of which seven were unexpired. Mr. Tartt gave up possession to Mr. O'Kelly Templer, for Mr. Attwood, on the 25th of July 1845, the agreement for purchase having been made about three weeks before.

Mr. Prior is the brother-in-law of Mr. O'Kelly Templer, and is a barrister, practising in Lincoln's Inn, and has a residence with his wife and family at Greenwich, and has had so for some years.

Mr. John Templer is a brother of Mr. O'Kelly Templer, and is a special pleader practising in the Temple, and has a residence with his wife and family at Greenwich, and has had so for some years.

Mr. James Templer is the father of Mr. O'Kelly Templer, and is a solicitor residing at Bridport, within seven miles of the boundary of the borough of Lyme.

Mr. Henry Augustus Templer is another brother of Mr. O'Kelly Templer, and is a solicitor at Bridport, and resides with his wife there, and his house also is within seven miles of the boundary of the borough of Lyme.

Mr. O'Kelly Templer, at the latter end of July 1845, treated with Mr. James Templer, and Mr. H. A. Templer, for their taking Springfield with Mr. Prior and Mr. John Templer upon the terms hereinafter stated, and Mr. Templer (the father) wrote in the last week of July 1845, to propose to Mr. Prior and Mr. John Templer, that they (the four appellants) should take the house furnished, as yearly tenants, rent free, on the terms of paying the rates and taxes, the tenancy to commence from the 30th of July 1845. An agreement, already prepared, was signed by Mr. Attwood, and all the four appellants, on or before the 31st day of July 1845, by which Mr. Attwood agreed to let, and the four appellants agreed to take, Springfield House, with the coach-house, garden, &c., together with the furniture and fixtures, &c., as tenants from year to year, from the 29th of July 1845, in consideration of the four appellants agreeing to pay all rates and taxes, and to keep the internal part of the house in its then state of repair.

In anticipation of the agreement being completed, Mr. O'Kelly Templer engaged a woman to take care of the house on behalf of the appellants, and she has lived there as their servant ever since.

Upon the 30th of July 1845, Mr. H. A. Templer went to the house, and told the housekeeper that he came to take possession, and he took the key.

Upon the 31st of July 1845, Mr. Templer (the father) came to the house and slept there on that night, and six times in the summer of 1846, and four nights in 1847.

Mr. Prior came down to Springfield House with his wife and family in September and October 1845, and stayed there a fortnight. He has not been there since until the 9th of September 1847, when he came to Lyme with his wife and children, and three servants, and remained for a month.

Mr. John Templer accompanied his father Mr. Templer to Lyme during the time of the revision of the list of voters in October 1845, (Mr. Templer being professionally engaged in court attending to the revision), and remained a week at the house. In August 1846, he (Mr. John Templer) came to the house with his wife, two children, and one servant, and accompanied by his wife's father and three of his servants. He remained for eleven weeks. In October 1847, Mr. James Templer, with his wife and family, came to the house (while Mr. Prior and his family were living in it as above mentioned), and remained there from Thursday to the following Sunday as the guest of Mr. Prior, as far as his table was concerned.

Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Templer slept three or four nights at the house between the 31st of July 1845, and the 31st of July, 1846; one night in August 1847, and again when he came to attend the Court in October 1847, to support his qualification.

Whilst Mr. Prior and Mr. J. Templer have respectively been at Springfield, they have left their houses at Greenwich in the care of sometimes one, and sometimes two servants on board wages. Several friends and relatives of the Messrs. Templers, with their assent, have stayed for a few days at a time (on one occasion for two weeks) at Springfield during that year, and others have slept there with the assent of the Messrs. Templer also for single nights when they have come from the neighbourhood to balls at Lyme. The furniture in the house belongs to Mr. Attwood. The value of the furnished house and premises is 150*l.* a-year: the value of the house unfurnished is about 80*l.* a-year. Mr. Attwood pays a rent of 65*l.* a-year for the remainder of the term on a repairing lease.

The housekeeper has since the date of the agreement been paid by the appellants, and has acted entirely under their orders. So has a gardener who has been occasionally employed for the appellants. The produce of the garden (except what has been consumed by the appellants and their families and friends in the above visits,) has been consumed (with their assent) by the housekeeper and her husband; the produce of the grass field sold by Mr. O'Kelly Templer, on behalf of the appellants, has been carried by him to their account, to the amount of 2*l.* a-year. The rates and taxes, amounting to 18*l.* per annum (of which 6*l.* 15*s.* is the amount of the poor-rate), have been paid by Mr. O'Kelly Templer, and repaid him by the appellants.

The revising barrister found that the exclusive object of the landlord was to enable the appellants to acquire the right of voting for the borough of Lyme; that the substantial object of the appellants was to acquire the right of voting; and although they then, and continually since, contemplated an occasional visit to Lyme, with their families, as a consequence of the agreement, that that object formed an inconsiderable part of their real motives for entering into the agreement; but that the agreement was executed by them with the bona fide intention of complying literally with its terms, that is to say, of paying the rates and taxes, and of paying for repairs, and of acquiring the rights of tenants from year to year, according to the agreement; and upon the above facts the barrister found and decided, that Mr. Prior and Mr. John Templer did not actually or constructively reside within the borough of Lyme, or within seven statute miles thereof or of any part thereof, for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July 1847, within the meaning of the statute 2 Will. 4. c. 45, and statute 6 Vict. c. 18. He found also that the house was not reasonably adapted to be contemporaneously inhabited by the appellants and their families, and thereupon found and decided that while Mr. Prior and his family were inhabiting the house, it was neither actually nor constructively occupied by the other appellants, within the meaning of stat. 2 Will. 4. c. 45, nor constituted their residence; and that while Mr. John Templer and his family were inhabiting the house, it was neither actually nor constructively occupied by the other appellants, nor constituted their residence.

If the Court should be of opinion that the occupation and residence of each or any of the appellants was sufficient, the names of all, or such as the Court should think fit, were to be retained on the register, otherwise to be expunged.

Byles, Serj., for the appellants, was proceeding to argue on their behalf.—

[MAULE, J. — This is a consolidated appeal, and yet the facts in the cases are different: that is inconvenient.]

The facts are very nearly the same in each case; they relate to the common motives of the parties, their residence, and the occupation of the same house.

[MAULE, J.—The proximity of the facts renders it the more difficult to separate them: the 44th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. allows a consolidated appeal when the validity of any number of claims or objections depends upon the same points of law, and where one decision would bind all. This seems to be an appeal without jurisdiction, because the revising barrister expressly states, "that the names of all, or of such as the Court shall think fit, shall be retained on the register, otherwise expunged."]

[WILDE, C.J.—When actions on a policy of insurance are consolidated, different facts are not stated against different underwriters: one state of facts must apply to, and one decision must bind, the whole.]

Then the revising barrister will be directed to separate the cases. The Court will remit the case to him, as provided by the 65th section of the Registration Act, "if the statement of the matter of appeal is not sufficient to enable them to give judgment in law." If the Court decline to remit the case to the revising barrister for alteration, then, as Mr. Prior is an appellant properly before the Court, I will proceed on his case alone; he at all events is entitled to be heard.

Kinglake, Serj., for the respondents.—I cannot consent to the last proposition. Even if the Court has power to proceed with one case alone,—which, under these circumstances, it has not,—the respondent would then not come properly before the Court. He has consented to appear in a consolidated appeal, and might have refused to appear against a single vote.

[MAULE, J.—The revising barrister had no power to do what he has done: if he had decided separately upon each case, he, perhaps, would not have doubted sufficiently upon any one to allow an appeal.]

Per Curiam.—The Court has no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal in its present shape, for the reasons which have been pointed out. Neither can we remit this case to be more fully stated: a paucity of statement is not here complained of; the defect is an inherent vice in the framework of the case of appeal, which the addition of further statement can by no means remedy. If such a statement as this could be entertained, a consolidated appeal might contain every case argued before the revising barrister during the revision in which an appeal was allowed, though each case depended upon a different statement of facts. The appeal cannot be heard.

Case struck out.

HOPPE AND OTHERS.

Bankrupt—Prior Act of Bankruptcy, Notice of—5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 22.—2 & 3 Vict. c. 29.—Money had and received.

Under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 22, the filing of a declaration of insolvency is of itself a complete act of bankruptcy, without being followed by an advertisement of the same in the Gazette under the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 6.

Therefore, where a trader gave execution creditors notice that he had filed a declaration of insolvency, and thereby committed an act of bankruptcy, this was held a sufficient notice of a prior act of bankruptcy to deprive the creditors of the protection of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29.

A trader having been arrested on a ca. sa. at the suit of the defendants, who, as well as the sheriff's officer, had received a notice of a prior act of bankruptcy, paid over a portion of his assets to the officer in order to procure his discharge, and the officer paid over the amount to the defendants:—Held, that the bankrupt's assignees were entitled to recover back from the defendants the amount so paid, in an action for money had and received.

Assumpsit for money had and received, and on an account stated.

Pleas—First, except as to 21l. 1s. 6d., parcel, &c. non assumpsit; and second, as to the said 21l. 1s. 6d., parcel, &c., payment into court. The plaintiffs joined issue on the first plea, and accepted the money out of court on the second.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs as assignees of J. G. Ufford, a bankrupt, to recover the sum of 67*l.* 3*s.* received by the defendants, of which 46*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* was received under a ca. sa. issued against the person of the bankrupt, and 21*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* under a test. fi. fa. issued against his goods. By the consent of the parties, and by the order of Maule, J., the following CASE was stated for the opinion of the Court:—

In the month of February 1846, and before his bankruptcy, John George Ufford was indebted to the defendants in two several sums of 36*l.* and 9*l.* 12*s.* (that is to say), the said sum of 36*l.* upon a bill of exchange drawn by them upon, and accepted by him, which became due on the 14th of February in the year aforesaid, and in the sum of 9*l.* 12*s.* for goods sold and delivered. On the 13th of the same month the defendants commenced an action against the said J. G. Ufford in the Court of Exchequer, for the said sum of 9*l.* 12*s.*, for which they held no security; and on the 18th of the same month, the defendants commenced another action against the said J. G. Ufford in the same court to recover the amount of the said bill of exchange. In the former of these actions the defendants delivered their declaration on the 20th of February, and a plea having been pleaded thereto and issue joined thereon, notice of trial before the sheriff was given on the 27th of February; but upon the 4th of March a Judge's order was made by consent for a stay of proceedings in that action, upon payment of 9*l.* 12*s.*, the debt therein claimed, and costs to be taxed, the payment to be made on the 9th of March, the present defendants having liberty to sign final judgment therein forthwith; and final judgment was accordingly signed in that action on the 4th of March 1846. In the second action, namely, that for the amount of the bill of exchange, the present defendants delivered their declaration on the 26th of February, and a plea was pleaded; but the present defendants were allowed afterwards to sign final judgment under a Judge's order; and judgment was accordingly signed in that action on the 7th of March 1846. On the 9th of March 1846 the said J. G. Ufford signed and filed in the office of the Lord Chancellor's Secretary of Bankrupts, a paper writing, attested by Henry Swan in the form following:—

"I, the undersigned J. G. Ufford, of Highbury Brewery, Holloway, in the county of Middlesex, common brewer, do hereby declare that I am unable to meet my engagements. Dated this 9th day of March, A.D. 1846.—J. G. Ufford. Witness, Henry Swan, attorney of the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster, No. 2, Great Knight Rider Street, Doctors Commons, London."

On the same day, a notice in writing was served upon the present defendants at their office, Pig's Quay, Bridewell Precinct, William Street, Blackfriars Bridge, in the city of London; and also on their attorney, Mr. Engleheart, at his office in Doctors Commons, of which notice the following is a copy:—

"In the Exchequer of Pleas. Between Charles Hoppe, Charles Edgely Hoppe and Joseph Hoppe, plaintiffs, and John George Ufford, defendant.—Take notice that I have this day filed in the office of the Secretary of Bankrupts, in Quality Court, Chancery Lane, in the county of Middlesex, a declaration of insolvency, a true copy of which is hereto annexed; and I, being a trader, have thereby committed an act of bankruptcy within the true intent and meaning of some or one of the statutes now in force concerning bankrupts. Dated this 9th day of March, A.D. 1846. Yours obediently, (Signed) J. G. Ufford, the above-named defendant, Highbury Brewery, Holloway. To Messrs. Charles Hoppe, Charles Edgely Hoppe and Joseph Hoppe, the above-named plaintiffs; and to Mr. W. Hayley Engleheart, their attorney or agent, 3, Great Knight Rider Street, Doctors Commons."

On the 9th day of April 1846, a writ of testatum fieri facias was issued on behalf of the present defendants on the judgment obtained in the first action, indorsed to levy 21*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, the amount of the debt and costs in that action; and this writ was delivered to an officer of the sheriff of Middlesex on the same day. On the said 9th day of April a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum was also issued on behalf of the present defendants against the said J. G. Ufford in the second action, indorsed to take 46*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, the amount of the debt and costs in that action; and this writ was also delivered to an officer of the sheriff of Middlesex on the same day. On the said 9th day of April 1846, the officer of the sheriff levied upon the goods of the said J. G. Ufford, under the said writ of test. fi. fa., the said sum of 21*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, which was afterwards paid over to the present defendants, and which sum they have paid into court in the present action. On the same day, the said 9th of April 1846, the officer to whom the said writ of ca. sa. had been delivered took the said J. G. Ufford in execution under that writ; and at the time of the said arrest, the said J. G. Ufford informed the said officer of his having filed the said declaration of insolvency. The said J. G. Ufford was, on the same day, removed in the custody of the said officer to a lock-up-house, where in order to procure his discharge he paid to one of the assistants of the said officer the amount indorsed on the said writ of ca. sa., having also previously informed the said assistant of his having filed the said declaration of insolvency. This money, being the said sum of 46*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* now claimed in the present action in addition to the sum paid into court, was part of the assets of the said J. G. Ufford, at the time when it was so paid to the said assistant of the said officer as aforesaid, and was afterwards (that is to say), on the 11th of April 1846, and before the commencement of this action, paid over, by the said assistant who received it, to the officer of the sheriff, and by him to Mr. Engleheart, the attorney to the present defendants, and was received by him on their behalf; and he has since paid over, or otherwise accounted to the defendants for, the same. The before-mentioned actions were commenced and prosecuted by the defendants against the said J. G. Ufford, adversely, and with the sole view of asserting their legal rights. On the 30th of April 1846 a fiat in bankruptcy was issued against the said J. G. Ufford, founded on the said declaration of insolvency, under which, on the 1st of May following, he was duly declared a bankrupt, and this fiat and the proceedings thereon are still in force, and the present plaintiffs have been duly appointed, under the said fiat, assignees of the estate and effects of the said J. G. Ufford, and now claim to recover from the present defendants, in addition to the sum of money already paid into court, the said sum of 46*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, as money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs as such assignees.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, under the circumstances above stated, the plaintiffs, as assignees as aforesaid, were entitled to recover the said sum of 46*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative thereof, then the defendants agreed that judgment should be entered against them by confession for the said sum of 46*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, in addition to the said sum of money already paid into court in this action, immediately after the decision of this case, or otherwise as the Court might think fit; but if the Court should be of a contrary opinion, then the plaintiffs agreed that a judgment should and might be entered against them of nolle prosequi, as to the issue joined in this action, immediately after the decision of this case, or otherwise as the Court might think fit, and that judgment should be entered accordingly.

Badeley (Talfourd, Serj. was with him), for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are not, according to the principles of the bankrupt laws, entitled to retain this money as against the assignees. The 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. protects bond fide payments made by the bankrupt after the act of bankruptcy, only in cases where the person receiving the money had no prior notice that an act of bankruptcy had been committed. The case here finds that the defendants had such notice. Authority on the point is almost needless; but the case of Allanson v. Atkinson (1) is precisely in point. In that case, a person having committed an act of bankruptcy was arrested on a ca. sa., at the suit of the defendants, and in order to procure his discharge he gave goods to the sheriff's officer to pledge, and the officer having accordingly pledged them, handed over the proceeds to the defendants. Under these circumstances, the assignees were held entitled to recover back the money, although the defendants had not been privy to the act of pledging. Though the bankrupt laws have been altered since that case, the same principle is directly applicable here, subsequent enactments only substituting notice of an act of bankruptcy for the committal of the act itself; and notice having been given as in this case, the consequences remain the same.

(1) 1 Mau. & Selw. 583.

Simon, for the defendants.—The notice of the prior act of bankruptcy, given in this case, is not sufficient under the statute. The mere filing of a declaration of insolvency is not, by 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 6, an act of bankruptcy, unless followed by an advertisement of the same in the London Gazette; and therefore notice of it alone, without notice of such advertisement, will not take a payment out of the protection of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. s. 1, which protects dealings with a bankrupt before the fiat, provided the party having such dealing had not notice of a prior act of bankruptcy. In Conway v. Nall (2) a notice that J. S. had signed a declaration of insolvency on the previous day, and that he would be declared a bankrupt immediately, a fiat having been sent for, was held insufficient to take away the protection of execution creditors under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. Tindal, C.J. there says, "The meaning of these words (2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. s. 1.) appears to me to be that the party, in order to defeat an execution, shall have notice of a prior act of bankruptcy, complete in itself, at the time the notice is given to him."

[WILDE, C.J.—In that case the notice was prospective. It only stated that a declaration had been signed, and that the party would be declared a bankrupt.]

The notice in the present case may, perhaps, contain more than appeared in that case, but still there was no act of bankruptcy till the advertisement had been inserted. In the next place, the payment to the sheriff, or his officer, was not a payment to the defendants; and there is no pretence for saying that the identical money received by the sheriff's officer was handed over to the defendants, and it was not shown that the sheriff's officer gave notice to the defendants that he had been informed of the act of bankruptcy. Therefore an action for money had and received will not be against the defendants. The sheriff is himself responsible if any wrongful act was done. He was not the agent of the defendants, and he might have refused to take the money — Drury v. Hounsfield (3). Lastly, the money, having been paid by compulsion of law, cannot be recovered back—Belcher v. Mills (4), Foster v. Allanson (5), Reynolds v. Wedd (6), Teale v. Younge (7), Cox v. Morgan (8), Whitmore v. Green (9).

Badeley, in reply.—Conway v. Nall was a case under the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 6, whereas the present case is under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 22, which does not require an advertisement to make the filing of a declaration of insolvency an act of bankruptcy, but makes it a complete act in itself. At all events, the statute of Victoria, which was prior to that case, was not referred to in the discussion. In the present case, by virtue of the latter statute, the act of bankruptcy was complete before the notice, and the notice was good. Indeed, the notice was more specific than is requisite, for it stated the nature of the act of bankruptcy which had been committed, whereas, in several cases, a general notice that an act of bankruptcy had been committed, without specifying the manner, has been held sufficient—Ramsay v. Eaton (10), Arthur v. Whitworth (11), Udal v. Walton (12). In the next place, there are direct authorities to shew that the action for money had and received, at the suit of the assignees, will lie under such circumstances—Allanson v. Atkinson (13), Hitchin v. Campbell (14), Reed v. James (15). It appears from the case of Noiley v. Buck (16), that the sheriff himself, when he has improperly paid over money, is accountable to the assignees; but that is no reason why they should not have an action against the parties into whose hands the money has come.

done away with the necessity for advertising in the London Gazette, under the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 6; and Conway v. Nall having come after the statute of Victoria, must be taken as an authority to shew that since that statute the advertisement is necessary to complete the act of bankruptcy, and that therefore a notice, such as was given in the present case, is not sufficient.

WILDE, C.J.—There is no real difficulty in this case. It is stated that certain monies, being part of the assets of the bankrupt, were paid over to the defendants after they had received notice that an act of bankruptcy had been committed by the bankrupt. The notice is stated to have been served on the defendants on the 9th of March 1846; and, on the 9th of April a writ of testatum fi. fa. was issued in the first action, and a ca. sa. in the second, and the bankrupt was then arrested on the ca. sa., and to procure his discharge he paid the amount indorsed on the writ to the sheriff's officer, who paid it over to the defendants. Under these circumstances the first question which arises is, whether this is a transaction coming under the statute of 2 & 3 Vict., which establishes executions bond fide executed against, and contracts bond fide entered into with bankrupts, before the date of their fiats, provided no notice has been given of a prior act of bankruptcy. In this case the execution was executed, and the levy made before the fiat, and the defendants are entitled to retain the money unless they had received notice at the time when it was paid over to them. The notice here is much more explicit than that which was given in any one of the cases cited, for it not only states that an act of bankruptcy had been committed, but it mentions the nature of that act. It is objected that this is not a sufficient notice of an act of bankruptcy, because, by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 6, the filing of such a declaration of insolvency as that mentioned in this notice is an act of bankruptcy only if an advertisement thereof is inserted in the London Gazette; and it does not appear that there has been any such advertisement in the present case. To this it was answered, that by the stat. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 22, the filing by a trader of such a declaration of insolvency is of itself an act of bankruptcy from the time of its being filed. It is said, on the other hand, that this statute does not repeal the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16; but I think the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. repeals all statutes, so far as they are inconsistent with its provisions; and it may be contended that it repeals so much of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. as requires anything to be done besides what is required by its own provisions. At all events, the statute of Victoria enacts that a certain thing shall be an act of bankruptcy, and that has been done here; and the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to say that the declaration filed in this case does now operate as an act of bankruptcy, and that the notice was therefore sufficient. The next objection raised in the case is, that the action was wrong in form, because it was not shewn that the money paid over to the defendants or their attorney was the identical money received by the sheriff's officer from the bankrupt. The answer to this is, that it is not necessary to shew in this form of action that the money is the same, as in trover or detinue, which are brought for the recovery of a specific chattel. The action for money had and received will lie wherever a certain amount of money belonging to one person has improperly come into the hands of another. The same objection was made ineffectually in the case of Allanson v. Atkinson. The third objection made to the right of the plaintiffs to recover is, that this money was paid under the compulsion of process of law. Allanson v. Atkinson is an express decision on this point, for there the money was paid by the bankrupt, to procure his discharge from custody under a ca. sa., and the assignees were held entitled to recover back the money. Several cases were cited to shew that payments by compulsion are within the statute protecting payments made in the ordinary course of trade, but the present payment was not under that statute. The defendants, therefore, having had notice of the act of bankruptcy, had no right to receive money from the bankrupt out of his assets. It is said that it has not been shewn that the defendants had notice that the sheriff's officer had been informed of the act of bankruptcy; but it was not necessary that they should, as they had received notice themselves, and received money, which was part of the assets of the bankrupt's estate. They adopted the act of the sheriff's officer by receiving the money; and it then became money had and received to the use of the bankrupt's assignees. The cases on this point are collected in Atkinson's Treatise on Sheriff Law, p. 541. I am of opinion, for the reasons which I have just given, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

COLTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was contended, in the first place, that the notice was not sufficient, and the case of Conway v. Nall was cited in support of that view. Mr. Badeley said, that that case arose under a different statute from the present; but I do not think so, although the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. was not alluded to in the argument; and the objection taken to the notice was equally applicable whether the case came under the one statute or the other. The 22nd section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. makes the filing of the declaration of insolvency, as stated in this notice, a sufficient act of bankruptcy. The next two objections are, that the action for money had and received does not lie in a case like this, where there was no privity between the parties, and it cannot be maintained when the money was paid under compulsion of law. The cases cited sufficiently answer these objections, for there can be no difference as to these points between a fi. fa. and a ca. sa. Allanson v. Atkinson is expressly in point, and is quite satisfactory on principle.

MAULE, J.—In general, where money, which belongs to one person, has been received by another, without that person's authority, the action for money had and received will lie to recover it back. It is contended that this principle is not applicable in the present case. There is really no question as to the identity of the money, for it sufficiently appears from the case that the same money which the sheriff's officer received was paid over to the defendants. That which is relied upon as an answer to the prima facie case is derived from the bankrupt law, and from the principle that money paid under legal process cannot be recovered back. The process here was process to which the bankrupt and the defendants were parties, but the plaintiffs were not parties or privy to them; and I cannot conceive how such proceedings can bind third parties. The transaction in this case was, as regards the plaintiffs, "res inter alios acta." The assignees do not claim under the bankrupt any more than a lessee does under a lessor, or a grantee under a grantor, but their claims are adverse to the bankrupt's. It is clear that the act of Victoria is to stand alone, and there was, therefore, a good act of bankruptcy, and a good notice of it. The payment was, therefore, out of the protection of the bankrupt laws; and being made by the bankrupt out of his assets, to which the plaintiffs were entitled, and having passed into the hands of the defendants, without the authority of the plaintiffs, it became money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs, and they were therefore entitled to recover it in this form of action.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case of Whitmore v. Green does not shew that there is a want here of that kind of privity which is necessary to sustain this form of action. I think the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 22. is to be taken as a substitute for the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16.

1847. } DUKE OF BRUNSWICK v. SLOMAN

Practice.—Amendment of Issue.

The Reg. Gen. Hil. term, 4 Will. 4., give certain forms of issues, &c., and provide that, in case of non-compliance, the Court or a Judge may give leave to amend:—Held, that the application to amend should be made to a Judge at chambers.

Byles, Serj. had obtained five rules on behalf of the five several defendants in this case, who had severed in pleading, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the issues delivered should not be set aside for irregularity, or amended at the cost of the plaintiff.

Lush shewed cause.—There can be no doubt that, according to the rules of court, (Hil. term, 4 Will. 4.) the issues should be made out in compliance with the forms there given, provided that, in the case of non-compliance, the Court or a Judge shall amend. There is an irregularity here in the date of the writ of summons,—the 15th is inserted instead of the 16th; and there is an affidavit, which states that the attorney of the plaintiff offered the attorney of the several defendants to amend at chambers, and pay the costs incident to that amendment. The case of Ikin v. Plevin (1) shews that amendments such as those asked for by this rule ought to be made at chambers, and the Court will not burden themselves with applications of this nature. The object of this rule is to oppress the plaintiff. The pleadings are very lengthy, and the defendants have obtained five rules, and have filed five copies of the issue, and five sets of affidavits, in order to put him to as much expense as possible; but there is in reality only one issue, because there is only one action, and one rule would have been sufficient; here there are five rules to amend one document.

Unihank, contra.—The defendants are entitled to apply to the Court; it is expressly so provided by the Reg. Gen. just referred to, and they are not bound to go to chambers. The mistake is one of the plaintiff's own commission, and the particular circumstances of the length of the issues, &c. do not at all affect the absolute rights of the defendants. It is always usual for defendants who plead separately to the action to obtain separate rules in all matters connected with the action.

Per Curiam.—The defendants are entitled to have the amendments made; and therefore the rule must be absolute, to correct the issues now delivered. The defendants might have accomplished this object by going before a Judge at chambers, where at a slight expense, and as a matter of course (as they perfectly well knew), the amendments would have been made; instead of doing this they endeavour to put the plaintiff to as much expense as possible, and apply to the Court to order the amendments. The Court therefore makes in each case the rule absolute to amend on payment of costs by each of the defendants: to such as do not consent to amend on those terms, the rule is discharged with costs.

Nov. 29, 30. } WILLIAMS v. ARCHER.

Detinue—Re-delivery after Action and before Verdict—Measure of Damages—Judgment, Form of—Railway Scrip.

In detinue for the detention of certain railway scrip re-delivered to the plaintiff after action brought and before verdict, the jury may as a measure of damages take into consideration the difference between the value of such scrip at the time of the demand and their value at the time of such re-delivery.

In such action, when by reason of a re-delivery before verdict a subsequent delivery becomes impossible, the jury may find the facts specially, and so confine themselves to an assessment of damages; and in such case the form of judgment may be simply that the plaintiff do recover his said damages and costs.

Error from the Court of Common Pleas.

Declaration in detinue for the detention of 250 scrip certificates in the North Wales Railway Company.

Plea—Non detinet. Issue thereon.

At the trial, which took place before Cresswell, J., at the London Sittings after Hilary term, 1845, it appeared that the scrip certificates in question had been demanded of the defendant by the plaintiff on the 17th of May in that year, and that the defendant then refused to deliver them up. On that day the scrip certificates in question were worth 3*l.* 5*s.* each. The plaintiff gave in evidence an order of Cresswell, J., whereby it was ordered that on delivery of the articles claimed in this action, and payment of costs to be taxed, including the costs of the application, the plaintiff should be subject to the costs of this action unless he should recover more than nominal damages. In obedience to this order, the scrip certificates were delivered up to the plaintiff. On the day of such delivery they were worth 1*l.* per share. Upon this state of facts, the learned Judge directed the jury that the true measure of damages was the loss that the plaintiff sustained by not having the certificates when demanded, and that the jury might if they pleased measure that loss by the difference between the price at the time of the refusal and the price at the time when the said certificates were delivered up.

A bill of exceptions was tendered by the defendant's counsel to this direction, upon the ground that "the loss of the contingent profit which the plaintiff might have made and gained by the sale of the said scrip certificates, if he had been in possession thereof as aforesaid, was not and is not recoverable in this action, and the said Justice ought to have directed the jury aforesaid that upon the evidence aforesaid nominal damages only were and could be recovered."

The finding of the jury and the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas were set out upon the record as follows:—"That the within-named defendant did detain the chattels and writings in the declaration mentioned, &c., before, and at the commencement of this suit, and from thence continually, until, and at the respective times of pleading the within declaration and the within plea, and from thence, until the 25th day of November, A.D. 1845, when the said defendant delivered the said writings and chattels to the said plaintiff, under and by virtue of an order of the Hon. Sir Cresswell Cresswell, Knt., one of the Justices, &c., in that behalf made, whereby the said Justice ordered that, upon delivery of the articles claimed in this action, and payment of the costs to be taxed, including the costs of the said application, the said plaintiff should be subject to the costs of this action, unless he recovered more than nominal damages for the detention; and they assess the damages of the plaintiff, on occasion of the detention of the said writings and chattels, over and above his costs and charges by him about his suit in this behalf expended, to 562*l.* 10*s.*, and for these costs and charges to 40*s.* Therefore, it is considered that the said H. Archer do recover against the said D. Williams his said damages, costs and charges, by the sums aforesaid, in form aforesaid assessed, and also 138*l.* for his costs and charges of the said Court here adjudged of increase to the said H. Archer, with his assent, which said damages, costs, and charges in the whole amount to 703*l.*; and the said D. Williams in mercy," &c.

A writ of error having been brought, the case was argued (Nov. 29.) by—the direction of the learned Judge was wrong in the manner pointed out by the latter portion of the bill of exceptions. Substantial damages cannot be recovered in an action of detinue, but nominal damages only can be assessed by the jury. It may well be that, at the time of judgment given, the value of the scrip certificates in question was equal to what they bore at the time of the demand. There is no case to be found in which substantial damages have been awarded. The finding by the jury of the value of the goods is a matter altogether apart from the finding of damages for their detention. Secondly, the form of the judgment is erroneous. It varies from the common form, inasmuch as it is not in the alternative that the plaintiff below do recover the goods in question or their value, and his damages; but it is, simply, that he do recover the damages assessed. Non detinet puts in issue only the detention before action brought—Jones v. Dowle (1), Selwyn's Nisi Prius, vol. 1, p. 670. There is no precedent for a judgment in such a form.

Willes, for the plaintiff in error.—First,

Peacock, for the defendant in error.—First, the plaintiff, in an action of detinue, is entitled to recover the goods themselves, or their value, and also damages for their detention. In the present instance he could not recover the goods or their value, for they were re-delivered to him before verdict: he could only recover damages for their detention; the right estimate of which was the difference in price of the scrip certificates at the time of the demand, and at the time of such re-delivery. The direction, therefore, of the learned Judge was correct. Secondly, the form of the judgment in this case is correct. Since the scrip had been already delivered up, a judgment, that the plaintiff should recover the said scrip or its value, would have been improper.

[PARKE, B.—The jury seem to have involved themselves in some difficulty by departing from the ordinary course, and making a special finding as to the Judge's order.]

In effect they find that the scrip had been re-delivered; and, after such a finding, their course was to assess the damages only. The form of the judgment is in accordance with such finding.

(1) 9 Mee. & Wels. 19; s.c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 52.

[PARKE, B.—At present, Mr. Willes, we have none of us any doubt that the direction of the learned Judge upon the question of damages was perfectly correct.]

Willes, in reply. — The plaintiff has chosen to bring detinue, and he must abide therefore by all the consequences resulting from that form of action. In that action the jury are required to assess the value of the goods, and the defendant has the option either of delivering them up or to pay their value: the jury are also to find damages for the detention; but it is obvious that they ought not to assess as damages any part of the value of the goods. With respect to the form in which the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas has been entered upon the record, it is impossible to sustain it without varying the old established forms.

PARKE, B. now (Nov. 30.) delivered the judgment of the Court (2).—In this case we intimated our opinion yesterday, that the direction of the learned Judge was correct in telling the jury that they might take into consideration the difference in value between the scrip certificates at the time of the demand and of the delivery of them to the plaintiff; but a doubt occurred to us whether the finding of the jury and the judgment thereupon for damages only was correct. It differs from the ordinary modern form of verdict in detinue (3), which finds the value of the chattels and damages for the detention, whereupon the judgment is, that the plaintiff recover the chattels, or the sum expressed as their value if he cannot have the chattels again, and also his damages and costs. Here there can be no such judgment; and a doubt arose whether the special facts could be found as is done in the present case on the issue on non detinet; the only question on such issue apparently being, whether the chattels were detained, and if so, what are the damages for the detention. We do not think, on reference to the old authorities, that the objection ought to prevail. In Roll. Abr. 'Detinue,' it is said, that in detinue of charters on an issue on the detinet, if it be found that the defendant has burned the charters, judgment shall not be to recover the charters, for it appears that he cannot have them, but he shall recover the value of the land in damages. A reference is, however, made to a contrary decision in the Year Book, 17 Edw. 3. 45, b. In that case, the jury found that the charters were burned by the defendant. Shardlow, J. said, that the issue was only on the detinet, which detinue was found, and the judgment, it was agreed by the Court, should be to recover the charters and damages to ten marks, and that the defendant should be distrained to return them.

By analogy to this case, the judgment given for the plaintiff on the record would be wrong. But the case does not appear to be law; for Brooke, in his Abridgment, 'Detinue de Biens,' pl. 25, says, that Newton and Paston, in 21 Hen. 6, 36, (both Justices of Common Pleas) say that, if in detinue of charters the charters are burnt, he, the plaintiff, shall recover all in damages. The like is laid down in 3 Hen. 6. p. 19. pl. 13; and Brooke, and also Rolle, in their Abridgments, evidently adopt that position as good law. If that be so, and it seems to us that it is, we may, on the authority of that case, hold that the jury may find the facts specially, whereby a re-delivery of the goods to the plaintiff becomes impossible, and so confine themselves to an assessment of damages. If the jury can do so where the destruction of the chattel takes place, and so it cannot be recovered in specie, they may do so also where its previous re-delivery renders the recovery of the chattel useless.

Our judgment rests on the fact of re-delivery, and we do not take into consideration my Brother Cresswell's order.

Case, for seducing servants from the service of the plaintiff, and for harbouring servants who had wrongfully left the plaintiff's service.

Plea—Not guilty.

At the trial, before Erle, J., at the Sittings in London, after Trinity term, 1846, the following agreement, made between the plaintiff and one of his servants (which was in the form generally used between the plaintiff and his workmen), was put in and read, for the purpose of proving the service; and it was proved that the defendants had seduced the servants while they were in the plaintiff's service under such agreements.

"An agreement, made this 14th of June, A.D. 1841, between Thomas Pike, glass maker, on the one part, and James Hartley, of Sunderland, in the county of Durham, glass and alkali manufacturer, of the other part, as follows:—And first, the said Thomas Pike, for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, doth hereby promise and agree to and with the said James Hartley, his executors, administrators, and assigns, in manner and form following (that is to say), that he, the said Thomas Pike, shall and will, from time to time, and at all times, for and during the term of seven years, to be computed from the day of the date of these presents, well, faithfully and diligently, and according to the best of his skill and ability, work for and serve the said James Hartley and his partner or partners for the time being, or either or such of them as shall carry on the trade or business now carried on by him as a glass and alkali manufacturer; and also that he, the said Thomas Pike, shall and will, from time to time, and at all times during the said term, do his best endeavours and use his utmost care, diligence, and industry in and about the glass house, glass works, or alkali works, and service of the said James Hartley, and the person or persons aforesaid, for his and their benefit and advantage and behalf, and shall not and will not cause to be done any matter or thing whatsoever that may be or tend to the hurt, damage, or prejudice of the said James Hartley, or his partner or partners, or such of them as shall carry on the business now carried on by him; and shall not and will not at any time or times during the said term neglect or absent himself from the said work and service, without the licence and consent of the said James Hartley, or his partner or partners for the time being, or either or such of them as shall carry on the business now carried on by him, in writing, under his or their hand or hands, for that purpose first had and obtained, and shall not nor will at any time during the said term work with, or for, or serve any other person or persons whomsoever at any other glass house or place whatsoever, nor join any workman's union or any club, without such licence and consent as aforesaid; and further, that he, the said Thomas Pike, shall and will teach and instruct gratis any person or persons whom the said James Hartley or his partner or partners for the time being, or either or such of them as shall carry on the business now carried on by him, shall from time to time name or appoint, but no other person or persons whomsoever, in the art, mystery, or employment of pontysticker, gatherer, blower, piece-warmer, flasher, piler, kiln-assister, or any other department, which the said James Hartley shall direct; and also shall and will at all times when thereunto required, attend, and with his best endeavours help and assist in the setting of pots and doing all other matters and things relating to or concerning his business or station as aforesaid, or the business of the said James Hartley, or his

Hartley agrees to find the said Thomas Pike some other description of work, provided the said James Hartley does not require 1,200 tables, so that the wages of the said Thomas Pike shall not be less than 24s. per week, except when a furnace shall be out, when he, the said Thomas Pike, engages to work for 21s. per week,—no payment to be made for bad or unmerchantable tables; and it is agreed, that in case the said Thomas Pike shall be sick or lame, or shall otherwise be incapacitated to perform, or shall not perform, the work and service aforesaid, and his engagement with the said James Hartley, or his partner or partners for the time being, or either or such of them as shall carry on the business now carried on by him, or in case he shall not, in his or in any of their opinions, have conducted himself properly, or as he ought to do, or if the said James Hartley, or his partner or partners for the time being, or either or such of them as shall carry on the trade or business now carried on by him, shall discontinue the said trade or business during the said term of seven years, then, in either of such cases, the said James Hartley, or his partner or partners for the time being, or either or such of them as shall carry on the business now carried on by him, shall and may be at liberty to retain and employ any other person or persons in the room or stead of the said Thomas Pike, and therefore shall not be obliged to make any payment, duty, wages, or other satisfaction to the said Thomas Pike.

(Signed) "Thomas Pike,
"James Hartley."

The defendants' counsel insisted that this agreement did not prove a valid contract of service, because it was bad for want of mutuality, and as being in restraint of trade. The jury, by the direction of the learned Judge, found a verdict for the plaintiff; but leave was reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit on the above-mentioned ground.

A rule nisi having been obtained pursuant to the leave so reserved,—

E. James (Dec. 5th, 1847) shewed cause. —This case is not distinguishable in principle from the case of Pilkington v. Scott (1), the contract in which was exactly like the present one, and was held good. It is said that there is no mutuality in the contract, because there is no contract on the part of the master to employ; that the consideration disclosed is insufficient; and that the plaintiff did not bind himself to supply materials for the work. Looking at the whole of the agreement, it is evident that the servant during the continuance of the term was to earn not less than 21s. per week, and that work to that amount was to be provided for him; indeed, in case of the suspension of the usual business, the plaintiff was obliged to find him some other work. Supposing this case can be distinguished from Pilkington v. Scott, and that the agreement is not valid, yet the defendant, who was a wrong-doer, had no right to avail himself of its invalidity, as the servant was de facto employed, and was seduced by him from actual service—Keane v. Boycott (2).

Allen, Serj., and Fry, in support of the rule.—It is clear that the defendants had a right to avail themselves of the invalidity of the agreement as an answer to the action. The case of Sykes v. Dixon (3) is precisely in point. There, in an action for harbouring a servant, the defendant was allowed to take advantage of the objection, that the contract of service was invalid under the Statute of Frauds. Keane v. Boycott was not a case of a void, but one of a voidable, agreement. The contract there was with a person who was an infant and a slave, and the Court said that the effect of the contract might be the manumission of the slave, and therefore, as such a contract was for the benefit of the infant, it was only voidable. The contract in the present case is void as being in restraint of trade, because it contains a restriction with regard to the servant's employment larger than is necessary for the protection of the master. It comes within the principle laid down in the cases of Hutchcock v. Coker (4), Mallan v. May (5), and Price v. Green (6). Again, there is no mutuality. The servant binds himself to serve the plaintiff, and afterwards other persons, who are to have the controul of masters over him, although he has no corresponding rights against them. Then the servant is bound to serve for seven years, although in case of the discontinuance of the business, the plaintiff is not bound to employ him. If during a suspension of the business within the seven years, the servant went into the service of a rival company, he would be guilty of a breach of this contract. If there is not a contract to employ during the whole term, the present case cannot be brought within the authority of Pilkington v. Scott. At all events, it is distinguishable from that case, because there was a provision there for dismissal of the servant on giving him a month's notice or a month's wages. Here, if there had been a discontinuance of the business, the servant would not have been entitled to employment, or notice, or wages. In the case of Aspdin v. Austin (7), although by the terms of the agreement the defendant was bound to pay the plaintiff wages for two or for three years if the plaintiff was willing to perform a condition precedent, it was held that no covenant could be implied thence that the defendant was to employ the plaintiff in the business. So in this case no reciprocal obligation on the part of the plaintiff can be inferred from the obligation cast on the servant. The case then comes within the principle laid down in Young v. Timmins (8), that a partial restraint of trade without an adequate consideration is illegal.

MAULE, J.—I think this rule ought to be discharged. — This was an action for seducing a servant from the service of the plaintiff as a glass manufacturer. The objection raised in the case is, that the plaintiff had entered into an agreement with Pike, a servant alleged to have been seduced, by which he could not oblige him to serve, because it was void either for want of mutuality or as being in restraint of trade. On the other side, it is contended, that the defendant, being a wrong-doer, is not entitled to take advantage of this objection; and in answer to that, a case in the Queen's Bench—Sykes v. Dixon—was cited to shew that the objection might be taken. It is not necessary to say whether that case was correctly decided, because it did not appear there, as it does here, that there was an actual service subsisting at the time, which was determined by the act of the defendant. I think that in the present case there was a valid and binding contract between Hartley and Pike, notwithstanding the objections raised. The person with whom Pike contracted was James Hartley alone; the thing agreed to be done was to serve him or his partners, or those of them who should subsequently carry on the trade or business which he was then carrying on. The contract goes on to provide that Pike during the term of service shall do his best endeavours and use his utmost care and diligence about the glass works, and that he shall not cause anything to be done to the damage of Hartley or his partners, or such of them as shall carry on the business then carried on by him. The whole of the provisions in the contract shew that the existence and carrying on of the business was the substratum, and a condition precedent to anything that was to be done, because the things which they require to be done are such as could not be done unless the business continued to be carried on. It follows that, if the business is not carried on, the agreement on both sides falls to the ground. Hartley undertakes to pay Pike 24s. per week for 1,200 tables, and certain prices for additional tables; and further on he engages, if he does not require 1,200 tables per week, to provide him with some other description of work, so that his wages shall never be less than 24s. per week, except when a furnace is out, when he is to have 21s. It is then provided that in case of the incapacity or misconduct of Pike, or of the discontinuance of the business during the term, Hartley may employ any other person in his stead, and shall not be obliged to pay anything to Pike. It seems to me that these provisions afford an answer to the objection raised on the ground of the restraint of trade. Whether an agreement between a master and a workman to keep him out of work for seven years would be void, it is not necessary to say, for here the master agrees to employ the workman, except in certain cases, namely, sickness, lameness, and under the other circumstances mentioned. I think this is not by any means an agreement in restraint of trade. It is an agreement on one side to find work with wages of, at least,

21s. per week, and on the other side to serve for seven years unless certain excepted cases arise, and there is therefore no want of mutuality. With regard to what has been said about taking in partners, there is nothing whatever in that to prevent Hartley and Pike from suing and being sued. Then it is said that Pike has put it out of his power to avail himself of some summary advantages which he might otherwise have had. There is no reason why he should not agree to do so if he chose.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the substantial contract on the part of Pike was to serve Hartley, or the persons who should become his partners, and the contract by Hartley was to find him work at 24s. per week, except when a furnace was out, at which times he was to have 21s. With respect to the stipulation to serve those who should be taken into partnership, it would be a grievous restraint of trade, and a very great injury to workmen also, if contracts were to be dissolved every time a new partner is taken into a firm. Hartley here stipulates to make himself personally responsible for finding work. With regard to the restraint of trade, I agree with my Brother Rolfe in the case of Pilkington v. Scott, when he says, "The case depends not so much on any principle relating to contracts in restraint of trade, as upon the principles relating to contracts in general; because if it was a contract with the workman to work for the plaintiffs for seven years, and by the plaintiffs to employ him for that time, it clearly was not void as being in restraint of trade." With regard to the position of the workman on the discontinuance of the business, I apprehend that if the works had been substantially and bona fide discontinued, Pike would have wanted no leave to work elsewhere, the leave contemplated in the agreement being leave to be given by the persons carrying on the work.

WILLIAMS, J.—I think that the contract does not shew any restraint of trade such as to make it void. I think also that there is nothing in the objection which has been made as to the introduction of new partners.

Rule discharged.

Dec. 7. } PLASKITT.

*Railway Shares—Joint Stock Company,
Formation of—7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. s. 26—
Pleading—Evidence.*

To an action for not accepting railway shares, the defendant pleaded that they were shares in a joint-stock company in England, exceeding, in the number of partners, twenty-five persons, and formed for the purpose of executing works which did not require the authority of parliament; that the company had not been "formed or established" in any way whatsoever on or before the 1st of November 1844; and that, at the time of the contract, the company had not been completely registered, according to the provisions of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. The 26th section of that act restrains the sale of shares in such a company until complete registration, if the formation of it had not been commenced before the 1st of November 1844. At the trial, it was shewn that S. went to India, at his own expense, in 1843, and examined the country; that he proposed a railway between M. and D, and that he spoke of it to persons who agreed to become connected with it; that he got a draft deed in July 1844, and brought it with him to England, where he arrived after the 3rd of November 1844; and that the company was provisionally registered in May 1845. The Judge left it to the jury to say whether the company had been commenced to be formed before the 1st of November 1844, and they found for the plaintiffs.

Semble—That the plea would have been bad on demurrer for not stating that the company had not been commenced to be formed before the 1st of November 1844, but was good on being pleaded over to.

Held, that whether the plea was good or bad, the above facts were not sufficient evidence to go to the jury that the formation of the company was commenced before the 1st of November 1844.

Assumpsit for not accepting scrip receipts of the East India Railway Company, and on the common money counts.

The ninth plea, founded on the provisions of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, was as follows:—
And for a further plea in this behalf, as to the first count of the declaration, the defendant says, that before the making of the said alleged contract and promise in the said first count mentioned, and before the accruing of the alleged causes of action in the said first count mentioned, or any of them, or any part thereof, and after the said 1st day of November, A.D. 1844 (to wit), on the 31st day of December, A.D. 1845, divers persons, whose names are to the defendant unknown, exceeding the number of twenty-five (without including any admission into the partnership hereinafter mentioned, subsequent to the formation thereof, on devolution or other act in law), consisting (to wit) of the number of thirty persons, had been and then were united in partnership, and established as a joint-stock company, in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called England, for the purpose of executing for profit to the said partnership certain works which then might and could and still can be carried into execution without obtaining the authority of parliament, that is to say, for the purpose of making a certain railway in that part of her Majesty's dominions called India (to wit), a railway, to be called the East India Railway. And the defendant further saith, that the said partnership and company hath not been formed or established either by or in the names of any other person or persons whatsoever, or in any way howsoever, on or before the 1st day of November, A.D. 1844, nor hath the said partnership or company ever at any time been incorporated by statute or charter, or authorized by statute or letters patent to sue or to be sued in the name of any officer or person. And the defendant further saith, that the aforesaid partnership or company had not, at the time of the making of the alleged contract and promise in the first count mentioned, or at the time of the settlement, purchase, or payments by the plaintiffs, as in the first count mentioned, or at any time before the commencement of this suit, obtained any certificate of complete registration under or in pursuance of the provisions of a certain act of parliament, made and passed in a session of parliament, holden in the 7th and 8th years of the reign of her Majesty Queen Victoria, for the registration, incorporation, and regulation of joint-stock companies.

N

And the defendant further saith, that the said shares in the said count mentioned and all and every of them were, at the time of the making of the contract and promise in the first count mentioned, and of the said settlement, purchase, and payments by the plaintiffs as in the first count mentioned, shares and interests in the aforesaid partnership and company claimed by divers persons, whose names and number are to the defendant unknown. And the defendant further saith, that the said scrip receipts, in the said first count mentioned and all and every of them were scrip receipt spurious to entitle the holder thereof to the said last-mentioned claimed shares and interests in the said partnership and company. And the defendant further says, that the said shares and scrip receipts, in the said first count mentioned, were not nor were any or either of them other or different shares or scrip receipts than as last aforesaid. And this the defendant is ready to verify.

Replication, de injuriâ.

At the trial, at Guildhall, before Erle, J., at the Sittings after Trinity term, 1846, a Mr. Stephenson stated that he had gone out to India in the year 1843, for the purpose of introducing steam navigation and railways generally into India. That during his stay he made inquiries about a line between Mirzapoor and Delhi, and that certain persons met together for the purpose of assisting him in getting up a company; and that he spoke of the matter to several persons, who agreed to take part in the company when formed. That about July 1844 he got a draft deed of settlement for a company prepared by counsel in India, and took it to England with him. That he left India in September 1844, and arrived in England after the 3rd of November, and on his way home he drew up a report on the line; that he gave a prospectus to Capes & Stuart in November 1844; that in the same month prospectuses were printed; and that the company was provisionally registered in May 1845. That he returned to India in 1845, for the purpose of examining the country through which the line was to pass. That on the first occasion he went to India on his private account and at his own expense. Under these circumstances, the defendant contended that the ninth plea was proved, the company not having been formed or established before the 1st of November 1844. The learned Judge, in summing up, left it to the jury to say whether the formation of the company had commenced before the 1st of November 1844, stating that it was not necessary that the company should have been formed before that day, and pointing out to the jury the several things which had been done before that day, and which, he said, were strong evidence to shew that the company had been commenced. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs.

A rule nisi having been obtained for a new trial, on the grounds of misdirection, and that the verdict was against evidence,

Byles, Serj. and Unthank now shewed cause.—The 9th plea is founded on the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. s. 26, which restricts the disposal of shares in any joint-stock company coming within the descriptions mentioned in the act, the formation of which was “commenced after the 1st day of November 1844,” until the company has obtained a certificate of complete registration. The words of the plea differ from those of the statute: the plea alleging that the company was not “formed and established” before the day in question. It is submitted that the word “commenced” in the act is in some degree equivocal, and that the “formation of the company,” mentioned in the plea, may mean the same thing as the “commencement of formation” mentioned in the act. It was, therefore, no misdirection in the Judge to leave the question to the jury according to the meaning of the words which support the pleading. Chambers v. Jones (1) is an authority shewing that where there is an ambiguity in a plea, that construction of it will be adopted which will make it good.

[WILLIAMS, J.—Supposing this plea had been left to the jury in its terms, then, probably, they would have found for the defendant.]

It must be admitted, that if the plea is not equivocal in its terms, the Judge should have left the question to the jury as to the formation, not as to the commencement of the formation of the company. The word "formed" cannot mean "completely formed," because, if so, a company could not be said to be formed till all the shares were taken and it was completely registered,—which is inconsistent with the provisions of the act. Taking it for granted then, that the plea can be read so as to be good, the Judge left the question to the jury in the language of the act; and it is submitted that there was abundant evidence to shew that the formation had commenced before the 1st of November 1844, and the Judge would have been wrong if he had not left that question to the jury. If the formation mentioned in the plea, and the commencement of formation spoken of in the act, are not the same thing, then the plea, deviating from the words of the act, is bad upon the face of it; and as the defendant must, therefore, be eventually unsuccessful, the Court, in its discretion, will not grant a new trial.

Whitehurst and F. Edwards, in support of the rule, were stopped by the Court.

MAULE, J.—It appears to me that the Judge was right in putting that construction on the plea which is now complained of. The plea says, that the company was not formed or established in any manner whatever before the 1st of November 1844. Although, upon special demurrer, that might have been held to be a plea which did not sufficiently follow the act of parliament, yet, as it has been pleaded over to by the plaintiffs, it is good. The proper question therefore for the jury upon this plea would have been, whether the formation of the company had been commenced before the 1st of November 1844. But I do not think that the evidence raised that question. There was an indisputable prima facie case that this company was begun after November 1844, and there was no evidence on the part of the plaintiff to rebut that case. The evidence of Stephenson shewed that he had thought about the railway, and had spoken of it to many persons, some of whom had agreed to become connected with the company when formed. Having obtained a draft deed in India, he arrived in England after the 3rd of November 1844, and it was not till some time after that that the formation of the company actually commenced:

at what time it does not appear, but some time between the 4th of November and the month of May when the provisional registration took place. I therefore think that there was not evidence of any commencement of formation of the company before the 1st of November, and that the Judge should not have left that question to the jury. The rule should therefore be made absolute, whether the plea is good or not. My impression is, that the plea is good, having been pleaded over to.

CRESSWELL, J.—I quite agree with the view of the evidence taken by my Brother Maule. There certainly was evidence of the formation after November 1844, and none of the commencement of it before.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. My only doubt has been, whether the plea was not bad, so that the plaintiffs might be entitled to judgment notwithstanding a verdict for the defendant. There is no doubt at all that the plea would have been bad if it had been demurred to. On pleading over, if the Court can construe a plea so as to make it good, it will do so. The averment here may be considered as tantamount to an averment that the formation of the company had not been commenced before the 1st of November 1844.

Rule absolute.

Nov. 19. } NASH v. COLLIER.

Practice.—F frivolous Demurrer—Name—Initial.

Where a declaration was demurred to on the ground that the defendant was therein described as "William Henry W. Collier," the initial letter W. being used for an unexpressed name, the Court held that the demurrer was not frivolous.

Semble—That such a demurrer is good.

Assumpsit on a bill of exchange by an indorsee against the acceptor. The declaration described the defendant as "William Henry W. Collier."

To this the defendant demurred specially, the chief ground of demurrer being that the declaration was uncertain for describing the defendant by the initial letter only of one of his names.

Unthank moved for a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause why the demurrer should not be set aside as frivolous.—This can be no ground for demurrer either at common law or by statute. Persons are sometimes baptized by initials. This is misnomer only.

[MAULE, J.—This "W." is certainly not a name. It stands for some unexpressed name.]

The right course for the defendant was to have the declaration amended by inserting the right name at the plaintiff's cost.

MAULE, J.—I do not think this is a misnomer. In the case of a misnomer there is nothing on the face of the declaration to shew a defect. I rather think that the demurrer is a good one, and that the plaintiff, on argument, would be obliged to amend. At all events, I cannot say that it is frivolous.

1847. }
Nov. 12. } JONES v. SAWKINS.

Pleading — Immaterial Issue — Plea of Accord and Satisfaction, Material part of.

To an action for use and occupation, the defendant pleaded, first, that the plaintiff seized goods of the defendant sufficient to pay the rent and costs, and detained them for two years, and it was then agreed between them that the plaintiff should retain the goods in satisfaction of the debt, and that he did so accordingly. Secondly, that after a wrongful seizure by the plaintiff of goods of sufficient value, &c. the plaintiff and the defendant agreed that the plaintiff should retain the goods, and that they should relinquish their claims on each other. Thirdly, that they agreed that the plaintiff should retain the goods so seized, and that they should relinquish their claims, and the defendant should give up possession. Replications, traversing the seizure of goods of sufficient value, &c.

On demurrer to the replications, held, that the pleas were good, and that the replications were bad for putting in issue matter which was only inducement to the acceptance in satisfaction, such acceptance being the material part of the pleas.

Debt for the use and occupation of certain rooms and apartments, and for meat, drink, and necessities; with counts for money paid, and on an account stated.

Besides the general issue, the defendant pleaded pleas to the following effect. Second plea, as to the first and third counts so far as they relate to 6*l.*, that the defendant occupied the rooms, &c. for one quarter of a year, viz. from the 25th of December 1844 until the 25th of March 1845, under a demise from the plaintiff for one quarter, and so on from quarter to quarter at the quarterly rent of 6*l.*; that the defendant became indebted in 6*l.* to the plaintiff in respect of the above-mentioned quarter's rent, and that the account in the third count as to 6*l.* parcel, &c. was stated concerning the same sum; that the plaintiff during the continuance of the demise, and nearly two years before the commencement of this suit, took the defendant's goods as a distress, they being of sufficient value to satisfy the rent and the costs of the distress and appraisement; that he never sold the goods, but retained them to his own use, till just before the commencement of this suit, when he, with the assent of the defendant, received and accepted them, and hath hitherto retained them in satisfaction and discharge of the said sum of 6*l.*

Third plea, that after the accruing of the causes of action, and before the commencement of the suit, the plaintiff wrongfully seized the defendant's goods, being of value more than sufficient to satisfy the causes of action in the declaration mentioned, and retained them for an unreasonable time, to wit, nearly two years, and converted them to his own use, and that it was before the commencement of this suit agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that, for the termination of disputes between them concerning the causes of action in the declaration and claims made by the defendant in respect of the said seizure and conversion of the goods, that such demands and rights of action should be mutually relinquished, and that the plaintiff should retain the goods as a final settlement in full satisfaction and discharge of the said causes of action in the declaration mentioned; and that the plaintiff accepted and received and hath retained the said goods in such full satisfaction and discharge.

Fourth plea, as to 6*l.* parcel, &c. in the first and third counts, that before the accruing of the causes of action, to wit, on the 10th of April 1845, the defendant was tenant to the plaintiff of the said rooms and apartments, and during a certain tenancy which had commenced, to wit, on the 7th of December 1844, to wit, a tenancy for one month, and from month to month, at the rate of 1*l.* 4*s.* per month, under which tenancy the sum of 3*l.* 12*s.* had become due from the defendant to the plaintiff at the time of the accruing of the said causes of action for three months' rent, and before the commencement of the suit, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in 2*l.* 8*s.*, the residue of the 6*l.* for the meat, necessaries, &c. mentioned in the declaration; that the account in the third count was stated concerning the money in the first count; that after the accruing of the causes of action, and during the tenancy, and just after the expiration of the said first three months, to wit, on the day in this plea first mentioned, the plaintiff wrongfully seized the defendant's goods to the amount of the money in the first count mentioned, and detained them for an unreasonable time and converted them to his own use, and wrongfully disturbed the defendant in the peaceable possession of the rooms; that the plaintiff was desirous of regaining possession of the rooms, and after the accruing of the causes of action, and before the commencement of the suit, it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that to put an end to disputes in respect to the said causes of action in this plea mentioned, and other alleged causes of action on the part of the defendant, they should mutually relinquish their claims, and the plaintiff should retain the goods in full satisfaction and discharge of his claims, and the defendant should relinquish her right to and give up possession of the rooms, and she should be discharged by the plaintiff from all claims; that the plaintiff accordingly relinquished her claims and gave up possession during the tenancy, and the plaintiff resumed and hath hitherto retained possession of the rooms and retained the goods so seized in satisfaction and discharge of the said causes of action.
